"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	121
Comment I	122
Comment II	123
The Religion of Protestants	124
Editor's Chair	126
Reviews	128

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Northern Government Meets Cost of School.

The Most Rev. Dr. Daniel Mageean, Bishop of Down and Connor, yesterday in Belfast opened the £300,000 St. Patrick's Training School for the De La Salle Brothers.

The Northern Ireland Government has met the entire capital cost of the school which is after the pattern of the famous Boys' Town set up in the United States by the late Right Rev. Monsignor P. Flanagan. The building replaces the former school at Milltown, Falls Road, and accommodates about 200 boys in two self-contained sections, junior and senior. Each section has its own assembly hall, dining rooms and dormitories. In the senior section there is a technical school. For both sections there is a football pitch, basket ball and tennis courts, an indoor swimming pool and a gymnasium and a concert hall.

Dr. Mageean said that there had been some criticism about the amount of money spent on the training school but he thought that that was a particularly cruel type of criticism to make against the putting up of schools for that particular type of boy. Many of the boys had their faults but in most cases they were victims of circumstances.

The assistant Superior General of the De La Salle Order, the Very Rev. Brother Lawrence, said that the Northern Ministry of Home Affairs, "a liberal and benevolent Ministry" had acted towards them "as a fairy god-mother" in providing the money without which the Order could not carry on. He said that he had never seen such a palatial building before.

The Permanent Secretary to the Northern Ministry of Home Affairs, Mr. R. F. Dunbar, expressed the regret of the Minister, Mr. W. B. Topping, Q.C., at being unable to be present and praised the manner in which the De La Salle Order had succeeded in spite of the handicaps that had faced them.

The director of the school, the Rev. Brother Stephen, said that the new school would not have been possible except for the generous financial assistance from the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the local authorities.

—"Irish Times," 11/9/'57.

* * *

Better to get up earlier—Bishop.

Parents should make the fullest use of the facilities for secondary education for their sons and encourage them to study, said Most Rev. Dr. Browne, Bishop of Galway, speaking at the first annual prize day of Our Lady's College, Gort, yesterday.

He recalled that in the past the Irish people were ready to suffer sacrifices in order to give their children the advantages of higher education.

Boys at the secondary school age were very useful on a farm, but it would be much better, he said, for the father to get up at six o'clock and work late rather than keep his son from school.

Appealing for support for the school, Dr. Browne said that it was not only the well-to-do who appreciated and understood education.

Many farms could support only one son and it was a pity to see two or three sons staying at home waiting for the parents to die and leave them the farm and generally not marrying, but staying on as old bachelors.

Scientific Farmers.

Secondary education enabled the younger sons to make an honourable career for themselves in the world.

Moreover, it enabled the son who inherited the farm to become a scientific farmer who could understand all the techniques of modern agriculture.

Referring to the cost of establishing a secondary school, Dr. Browne said they had provided a building and equipment without one penny of a grant.

In the Six Counties, he said the Government provided sixty-five per cent. of the cost of approved Catholic secondary schools, while on this side of the Border the Government provided nothing for the cost of the building.

—"Irish Press," 11/9/'57.

[The two excerpts above voice the views of two Roman Catholic Bishops—both of them refer to the generous grants for education in Northern Ireland—what evidence of bigotry or discrimination is there here? To get schools free, or entire control for 35 per cent. of the cost is no sign of either].

* * *

Sholem Asch.

World Jewry lost a famous son, by the death of Sholem Asch. He was born in 1880, in Kutno, Poland. His parents, Orthodox Jews, gave their son every opportunity of a highly religious training. Early in life he developed a literary taste, and before 21 years of age, published a work in Hebrew. He soon attracted the interest of some Jewish intellectuals who advised him to make the Yiddish language his medium, since that language is more popular among East-European Jews. It was not till 1939 that Sholem Asch became universally renowned as a writer. In that year he published a Life of Christ, under the title "The Nazarene." This work caused a great stir among Jews, and roused considerable opposition. At the time he lived in U.S.A., and there experienced persecution to the extent that he was obliged to leave the States and make his home in this country. Subsequently he published a book under the title "The Apostle," its theme is the life and work of St. Paul, then followed "Mary" and "Salvation," among many others. In our estimation "The Apostle" is his finest work. These books written in Yiddish and translated into many languages, contain a fine appreciation of the Christian faith. Indeed it is difficult to understand how he could write about Christian truths with such warm sympathy without being a Christian. In life, he was persecuted as a Christian, in death he was claimed a Jew. We consider, by his writings, he has done a great service for the Christian cause among the Jews.

—"Immanuel's Witness, Sept., 1957.

* * *

Marriage in Spain.

A new decree affecting the marriage of non-Catholics has been issued in Spain. The decree, which was published in the official State Bulletin on 13th November, 1956, states that Civil Marriage will be authorised for those who can prove that they do not profess the Catholic Religion. Persons wishing to avail themselves of this facility must produce the necessary documents, together with certificates showing where they have resided during the last two years. Upon receiving their petition, the Judge must order the personal ratification of their declaration. As soon as this ratification is carried through, he must publish the banns according to existing regulations.

(Continued on p. 131.)

COMMENT I. HOLY ORDERS.

We take these cuttings from the Church of Ireland Monthly of August 1957—Referring to the Roman Catholic criticism of Church of England ordinations that "the Chalice is not delivered to the priest (the Matter), and that the authority to offer sacrifice is not given (the Form)" the writer says—

"It does not yet appear to be generally known amongst our detractors that in 1948 the Pope himself killed this criticism by his decree that "the laying-on-of-hands are, and always have been, in themselves a sufficient and appropriate sign of the sacramental effects of Order." And he added that the Form which validates an ordination in the Roman rite is: "Give, we beseech Thee, Almighty Father, to this Thy servant, the dignity of the Presbyterate: renew within him the spirit of holiness, that accepted by Thee, O God, he may hold the office worthily, and win a good report by the example of his life and conversation."

He goes on to say—

"We claim that our Ministry is a valid Priesthood, correct in the essentials of Matter and Form. No break in its Catholic continuity was made in the sixteenth century or since. On the contrary, the Anglican Reformers compiled an Ordinal which brings our Priesthood into line with the belief and practice of the first thousand years of Catholic Christianity. —W.L.M.G."

(The initials are those of a former contributor to our pages whose articles were much valued when they appeared some years ago.)

We heartily endorse the words of the second of these cuttings. The "valid priesthood" of the Church is not what was thought to be "priesthood" in Western Europe in the sixteenth century, but what was the real ministry of Apostolic times, and for long after. The Anglican Reformers effected a real reform when as "W.L.M.G." writes they "compiled an Ordinal which brings our priesthood into line with the belief and practice of the first thousand years of Christianity."

That means that our reformers discarded the false ideas which had attached themselves to the order during the five centuries preceding the Reformation. Little wonder then that Roman Catholic critics of the Reformed Church in England have said that the Anglican Ordinal not only does not make sacrificing priests, but deliberately excludes the intention of making them.

But of course the fact is that you cannot repeat Calvary; so you cannot empower anyone to offer Christ afresh, even in a bloodless manner. We offer commemorative sacrifices; sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving; sacrifices of ourselves, our souls and bodies; but we know that there cannot be renewed offerings to God of the Body and Blood of His Son. The sacrament looks back to the Cross, and draws its significance and virtue thence. It cannot add to the efficacy of the Cross, and it cannot transform God's creatures of Bread and Wine into another Substance.

Having restored the primitive or ancient Catholic conception of priesthood in place of the late mediaeval one, it is plain that the Church of England and the Church of Rome hold different views of the powers conferred at Ordination. We believe that the Church of England Ordinal displays the true nature of Christian priesthood, and was intended to do so, in contrast with the unreformed view which teaches a theory of the ministry we gave up.

When it is claimed by some extremists in Anglicanism that the English and Roman Ordinals convey precisely the same powers the blunder lies in the assumption that the powers are truly integral to Christian priesthood as illustrated in the New Testament, and that they are real.

COMMENT II.

About two months ago Ireland was visited by a distinguished American Churchman, Cardinal Stritch, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Chicago. The Cardinal is of Irish ancestry, so his visit to this country was welcome to his co-religionists here.

In the "Sunday Press" of 11/8/'57 Cardinal Stritch is quoted—

"Irish people," he said "were the spiritual guardians and the bulwarks of human freedom all over the English-speaking world."

The newspaper elaborates this statement, and we agree heartily with this recognition of the liberal and democratic influence of the majority of Irishmen in their world-wide Diaspora. We don't of course limit our agreement to a recognition of the work of Roman Catholic Irishmen. We wish the "Press" had emphasised also the work of Protestant Irishmen in creating and building up the great republic of the United States, for it was the Ulster Protestant Settlers in America who were in the van of America's fight for Independence, and who for over a hundred years gave the States many most distinguished Presidents.

We wish the "Press" had dwelt on the great contribution of Irish Protestants to the building of the vast enlightened dominion of Canada. Most of what is progressive, liberal, and promising for the future wellbeing of Canada (and to a real though less extent of Australia) has its roots in Irish and Scottish Protestant tradition. The principles of Reformed Christianity, and the truths of God's Word form an incalculably rich inheritance for the young people of the English-speaking world.

The "Sunday Press" articles continues—

"This Irish devotion to human liberties everywhere has given a recognition of the spiritual worth of man which has prevented even a short-lived permanence to the dictator."

In connection with this, we recall how steadily Eire declined to be influenced by any "Shirt" movement in the days before the Second World War. Very few intelligent Irishmen joined in the cry to belittle democracy in the same period.

Nevertheless we question whether it is possible to give true recognition to "the spiritual worth of man" if "spiritual worth" does not include non-Roman Catholic forms of religion. A boycott of Protestants such as we have had this year in a district of Co. Wexford is a manifest failure to exemplify the "Irish devotion to human liberties," as well as a failure to recognise the spiritual worth of a religious minority. Of course we shall not say that Fethard-on-Sea is a typically Irish scene. Thank God we have far more decency and far more Christianity and far more courage and independence elsewhere.

"They loved free institutions and the Christian dignity of man," said Cardinal Stritch, "and wherever they went they brought with them the ideal of social and political freedom which has helped to build up a great free world."

These are sound words, and generally true, but "the Christian dignity of man" does not, we fear, shine out everywhere. There is not much Christian dignity about men who plot to burn down a Protestant Church in Eire or a Protestant hall. Such crimes have been perpetrated recently in this country. Let our real virtues correct our lamentable follies and contemptible bigotries where they occur. Then we'll be grown-up men at home as well as overseas.

THE RELIGION OF PROTESTANTS.

By William Chillingworth, M.A.

(William Chillingworth's "Religion of Protestants" is a classic among books that examine the stupendous claims made by the Roman Catholic Church. The author was a scholar at Oxford during the reign of Charles I, where a Jesuit priest succeeded in winning him as a convert. He went to the English Jesuit College at Douai, France, determined to follow the advice of Anglican Archbishop Laud to make a thorough investigation of Roman Catholic claims. He left Douai in 1631 and six years later wrote the book from which this brief extract is taken. If, as he remarks in the conclusion, his argument is "rather tiring than difficult," yet his rapier thrusts of Scripture and reason give the quietus to Roman Catholic dogmas as few others have done.)

When I say the religion of protestants is in prudence to be preferred before yours, as, on the one side, I do not understand by your religion, the doctrine of Bellarmine or Baronius or any other private man amongst you; nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, or of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, "the doctrine of the council of Trent:" so accordingly on the other side, by the "religion of protestants," I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon; nor the confession of Augusta, or Geneva, nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England, no, nor the harmony of protestant confessions; but that wherein they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of their faith and actions; that is, the Bible. The Bible, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants! Whatsoever else they believe besides it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as a matter of opinion; but as matter of faith and religion, neither can they with coherence to their own grounds believe it themselves nor require the belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I for my part, after a long and (as I verily believe and hope) impartial search of "the true way to eternal happiness," do profess plainly that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only. I see plainly and with mine own eyes, that there are popes against popes, councils against councils, some fathers against other, the same fathers against themselves, a consent of fathers of one age against a consent of fathers of another age, the church of one age against the church of another age. Traditive interpretations of Scripture are pretended; but there are few or none to be found: no tradition, but only of Scripture, can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in, in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of Scripture only for any considering man to build upon. This therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe: this I will live, and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly but even gladly lose my life, though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me. Propose me anything out of this book, and require whether I believe it or not, and seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this; God hath said so, therefore it is true. In other things I will take no man's liberty of judgment from him, neither shall any man take mine from me. I will think no man the worse man, nor the worse Christian, I will love no man the less, for differing in opinion from me. And what measure I mete to others, I expect from them again. I am fully assured that God does not, and therefore that men ought not, to require any more of any man than this, to believe the Scripture to be God's Word, to endeavour to find the true sense of it, and to live according to it.

This is the religion which I have chosen after a long deliberation, and I am verily persuaded that I have chosen wisely, much more wisely than if I had guided myself according to your church's authority. For the Scripture being all true, I am secured by believing nothing else, that I shall believe no falsehood as matter of faith. And if I mistake the sense of Scripture, and so fall into error, yet I am secure from any danger thereby if but your grounds be true; because endeavouring to find the true sense of Scripture, I cannot but hold my error without pertinacity, and be ready to forsake it, when a more true and a more probable sense shall appear unto me. And then all necessary truth being, as I have proved, plainly set down in Scripture, I am certain by believing Scripture to believe all necessary truth; and he that does so, if his life be answerable to his faith, how is it possible he should fail of salvation?

Besides, whatever may be pretended to gain to your church the credit of a guide, all that and much more, may be said for the Scripture. Hath your church been ancient? the Scripture is more ancient. Is your church a means to keep men at unity? so is the Scripture to keep those that believe it, and will obey it, in unity of belief, in matters necessary or very profitable; and in unity of charity, in points unnecessary. Is your church universal for time or place? certainly the Scripture is more universal; for all the Christians in the world (those, I mean, that in truth deserve this name) do now and always have believed the Scripture to be the Word of God, so much of it at least as contains all things necessary; whereas only you say, that you only are the church of God, and all Christians besides you deny it.

Thirdly, following the Scripture, I follow that whereby you prove your church's infallibility, (whereof were it not for Scripture, what pretence could you have, or what notion could we have?) and by so doing tacitly confess, that yourselves are surer of the truth of the Scripture than of your church's authority.

Following your church, I must be servant of Christ, and a subject of the king, but only "ad placitum papae" (at the pleasure of the pope). I must be prepared in mind to renounce my allegiance to the king, when the pope shall declare him a heretic, and command me not to obey him; and I must be prepared in mind "to esteem virtue vice and vice, virtue if the pope shall so determine." Indeed, you say, it is impossible he should do the latter; but that, you know, is a great question, neither is it fit my obedience to God and the king should depend upon a questionable foundation. And howsoever, you must grant, that if by an impossible supposition the pope's commands should be contrary to the law of Christ, that they of your religion must resolve to obey rather the commands of the pope than the law of Christ; whereas, if I follow the Scripture, I may, nay, I must, obey my sovereign in lawful things, though a heretic, though a tyrant; and though, I do not say the pope, but the apostles themselves, nay an angel from heaven, should teach any thing against the gospel of Christ, I may, nay, I must, denounce anathema to him.

Following the Scripture, I shall believe a religion, which being contrary to flesh and blood, without any assistance from worldly power, wit, or policy, nay, against all the power and policy of the world, prevailed and enlarged itself in a very short time all the world over; whereas it is too apparent that your church hath got, and still maintains, her authority over men's consciences by counterfeiting false miracles, forging false stories, by obtruding on the world suppositious writings, by corrupting the monuments of former times, and defacing out of them all which any way makes against you, by wars, by persecutions, by massacres, by treasons, by rebellions; in short, by all manner of carnal means, whether violent or fraudulent.

Following the Scripture, I shall believe a religion, the first preachers and professors whereof, it is most certain, they could have no worldly ends upon the world; that they should not project to themselves by it any of the profits, or honours, or pleasures of this world, but rather were to expect the contrary, even all the miseries which the world could lay upon them. On the other side, the head of your church, the pretended successor of the apostles and guide of faith, it is even palpable that he makes your religion the instrument of his ambition, and by it seeks to entitle himself directly or indirectly to the monarchy of the world. And besides it is evident to any man that has but half an eye, that most of those doctrines which you add to the Scripture do make, one way or other, for the honour or temporal profit of the teachers of them.

Following the Scripture only, I shall embrace a religion of admirable simplicity, consisting in a manner wholly in the worship of God in spirit and in truth; whereas your church and doctrine is even loaded with an infinity of weak, childish, ridiculous, unsavoury superstitions and ceremonies, and full of that unrighteousness for which Christ shall judge the world . . .

If I follow the Scripture, I must not promise myself salvation without effectual dereliction and mortification of all vices, and the effectual practice of all Christian virtues: but your church opens an easier and a broader way to heaven, and though I continue all my life long in a course of sin, and without the practice of any virtue yet gives me assurance, that I may be let into heaven at a postern gate, even by an act of attrition at the hour of death, if it be joined with confession or by an act of contrition without confession.

[A summary in "Protestant Action," Toronto, July 1957. We commend it to the serious attention of our readers.]

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1957.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"MY PEOPLE DOTH NOT CONSIDER."

Some at least of our readers will recognise these words as part of verse 3 of the first chapter of the Prophet Isaiah. The word "consider" in our authorised version translates the Hebrew word "biyn" which means (in Gesenius's lexicon) "to observe" or "to understand." Other Hebrew words are translated "consider" also, but the word Isaiah uses is found several times, and its meaning is illustrated by parallel passages—In Psalm 50 we have "Consider this, ye that forget God," and the context shows that men are being urged to think seriously about God's rebukes. The word is also used of God—for in Psalm 5 the Psalmist prays that God will consider his meditation. The parallel usage of Hebrew poetry shows that, as applied to God, "consider" means "listen to." Again, in Psalm 37 the reader is told to consider the fate of the wicked. The idea is that study of such consequences of sin must be a deterrent. In Psalm 119 we have the sentence "The wicked have waited for me to destroy me, but I will consider Thy testimonies." God's testimony to man is that man should avoid the seductions of evil: in the words of Proverbs 1 "if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

Proverbs 23 says "consider diligently what is before thee"; and oddly enough the circumstance is the food on one's plate when dining with a ruler—the point of the precept seems to be that we are not to show greed, or to feast upon the more exotic dishes as though we had never had such opportunities before. We suppose restraint is called for, and modest behaviour. Quiet good manners may be the meaning intended. In the next chapter of Proverbs we have the word again applied to God, and we learn from verse 12 that God takes note of human cowardice or pusillanimity.

In Isaiah 14 we mark a reference to the downfall of Lucifer, and that those who see the fallen angel will consider him and ask "is this the man that made the earth to tremble"? (verse 16). Prudent reflection on the insolent challenge of pride to the wisdom and lordship of God over His universe, and the downfall of the challenger, may be profitable to all of us. It would have been specially profitable to those modern imitators of Lucifer, Mussolini and Hitler.

Other occurrences can be traced in the concordance, but it may be emphasised that sometimes the word "consider" represents a different Hebrew word, and one which, we think, indicates a less thorough moral and intellectual study of the topic concerned. The word in our text goes deeper than the others.

* * *

There can be little excuse among professing Christians for failing to consider the deep things of God, and the responsibilities of the spiritual life. We have little patience with the popular "gospel" preaching of to-day, for it tends to exact feeling, and rings the audience round with excitement. Fervour and enthusiasm are not the same as profound conviction of the sublime truths of the word of God. A faith which begins in an atmosphere of song and solos, of high pressure religious salesmanship, of dubious doctrine and erratic exposition, is not well calculated to endure the strain of daily humdrum routine, and the social claims of modern community living. We need to study our faith, and to keep it Biblical. We need to consider the patience and the fortitude of Christ's soldiers and servants, and to imitate them. We need constantly to review our minds and consciences to see that we are "in the faith," (2 Cor. 13. 5).

Little need be said in favour of the sort of ministry which seeks to treat of modern topics, and pays some small attention to the Christian faith by giving things "a Christian slant." The fact is that we are now a stage beyond this. We are seeing a world situation which approximates to that foreshown in Hebrews 12 "Now He hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire."

The urgent task is now to press upon all men the truths of the word of God: to warn against careless indifference: to remind men of how it was in the days of Noah—"But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away" (Matthew 24, 37); to say that the day of opportunity is fast drawing to its close, and that the sun of man's present day is westering; to urge that we must detach our thoughts and affections from the things of earth, and join ourselves to the eternal realities of heaven.

The call should be to real repentance; to profound conversion. A redirection of purpose: a new centre of existence: a different scale of values: an entirely different outlook—these are required, if we consider the things which are going to count increasingly in the light of the days to come.

* * *

We hope we are not too imaginative when we say that all phenomenal things should be teaching us spiritual lessons. We believe that this world is educational for the people of God, for young and old. Our poets have perceived this long since, and have meant more to us than the philosophers. But far more important than the poets are the prophets—with God's word to teach us, and to interpret this world to us, we can consider eternal things through the medium of time. This is, we think, the lesson of St. Paul who says of God "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. 1. 20).

* * *

Take a very simple illustration—"Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise" (Proverbs 6. 6). The ant, an insect which is normally unregarded by us is able to teach us prudence and foresight. We do not need to say that the lesson we are to learn is one of wordly wisdom—the time for that (if it ever existed) is passing. The lesson is preparedness for eternity: the laying up of treasure in heaven.

* * *

If the ant, an industrious insect, disciplined and dutiful, meticulously discharging the duties God has placed as a law in its nature, teaches us concern for our future spiritual well-being, another of God's creatures turns our thoughts to God's own provision for us—"Consider the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which have neither storehouse nor barn; and God feedeth them" (Luke 12. 24).

We need not argue that the raven's lessons contradict the ant's. Life does not involve us in that sort of logic! underlying both lessons is the fact of faith in God—"what hast thou that thou didst not receive?" (1 Cor. 4. 7.).

The Christian's trust is not an idle one. God has not given us abilities to be kept in abeyance. The parable of the talents is much to the point—"occupy till I come" (Luke 19. 13) is Christ's command, equally imperative with His "Watch and pray." There is no inconsistency here with His other words "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need . . . but seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6. 32).

God's providential care extends to His creatures according to the course of their nature. Of the sparrows Our Lord said "not one of them is forgotten before God" (Luke 12. 6). Nature as Tennyson wrote, may be "red in tooth and claw," but we are to remember that the blight of sin is upon creation, and the tincture of evil is universal—"the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain" (Romans 8. 22). If we cannot understand why or how, we may still believe that there is an explanation, and that some time we shall receive it, and be satisfied with it.

* * *

Then too, we may consider the lesson available from the flowers of the field. So much beauty, so much perfection of form and colour! To us it is inconceivable that it should be purposeless. The beauty of the lily may be for a moment; but it is also for eternity, as it is the expression in a moment of time of the beauty of the mind of the Creator. Lately we stood by a patch of gentian then opening into flower. The glory of that plant on a grey day of autumn spoke to us of more than transitory things. It spoke of God, and brought to mind Christ's words "Consider the lilies, how they grow: Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (Luke 12. 27). What can speak more clearly of the riches of God's gifts? The lilies remind us of what we receive from Him, and of the beauty which may be in us hereafter—yet with this difference, that the beauty of holiness, the beauty of Christ's righteousness, will be enduring.

* * *

"When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained." What do I learn? I learn how little a thing man is in comparison with the visible world and its cosmic power around him, and yet "Thou hast made him but a little lower than God"! (Psalm 8). The lesson of submission in face of the fact that man is the part of God's creation able to understand and appreciate the creative process is truly a precious lesson. To be able to share the thoughts of the Creator while knowing our creatureliness is a humbling honour. Yet it is ours. How can men be content and happy with merely base, trivial, and sordid thoughts in face of this?

* * *

If the realisation that we are "partakers of the divine nature" (2 Peter 1. 4) is not a sufficiently humbling thought we may turn to Galatians 6.1, and mark well what St. Paul has to say—

"Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." "Consider thyself"—recall also the familiar warning "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. 10. 12). Consider that we hold whatever spiritual treasure we possess in earthen vessels, and they are easily shattered, and rarely flawless. Is it becoming in us to be censorious? Have we any right to set up to be judges of our fellows? In every downfall ought we not to see ourselves? Have we not continually the sin of pride before us? Is there shoddier gratification anywhere than in the heart which suffers the delusion of superiority?

The detected wrongdoer may be far less of a sinner than the reputable person who has not so far been found out. Even the best of men may succumb to temptation. No wonder the apostle says that if we are to restore a sinner to fellowship, we must do it in a spirit of meekness. Let us never think we are being generous when we forgive: it is our duty.

"Walk in the light." Consider that our sins need the cleansing of the Precious Blood as much as anyone's. Then we shall be able the better to rejoice in "the common salvation" (Jude 3).

* * *

If this teaches the lesson of modesty and forbearance something else teaches the allied lesson of unselfishness—"Consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works" (Hebrews 10. 24), i.e. to urge on to love etc. We urge on by example and encouragement, by considerate conduct and by evidence we show of our genuine interest in the welfare of others. The man whose religion is self-contained is not irreligious, but it is a debatable question whether his religion is Christian. Our Lord was definite enough in His teaching that the faith He exemplified was a faith which showed its sincerity by love of God and man.

* * *

Finally, the great matter for consideration is Our Lord Jesus Himself. All that we have written may be brought to a short summary if we heed the words of Hebrews (12. 3) "Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be weary and faint in your minds." Contemplating Him is the great encouragement available to all of us to cheer us in the dark and evil day. No depression need last long if we turn our thoughts to Him. He is the bright and morning star, and as the true Light that lighteth everyman He can dispel the clouds of sorrow, and defeat the promptings of our lower selves.

We may at all times see Him as Richard Baxter saw Him, and in suffering find Him a companion who has suffered too—

"Christ leads me through no darker room

"Than He went through before;

"And he that to God's Kingdom comes

"Must enter by this door."

"Come, Lord, when grace hath made me meet

"Thy blessed face to see;

"For if Thy work on earth be sweet,

"What will Thy glory be?"

REVIEWS.

"The Faith, History, and Practice of the Church of England"

By Archdeacon W. P. Hares.

(In "The Churchman's Magazine")

I have read quite a number of books about what we should believe, and how, as Christians, we should live, but I give the palm to a book titled "The Faith, History, and Practice of the Church of England," written by Canon A. W. Eaton, vicar of St. Peter's Church, Leicester. It is commended in a Foreword by the Bishop of Leicester, and I would respectfully recommend it to everyone who desires to know what the Church of England teaches, and requires from her members.

The book is composed of a course of studies prepared originally for the instruction of members of the St. Peter's congregation, but the studies were so interesting and instructive they were adopted by the Leicester Diocesan Evangelistic Council, and have been published as a book by Hodder and Stoughton, and can be obtained from The Protestant Truth Society, 184 Fleet Street, London, E.C.4., in paper binding at 4/9d. or full cloth boards at 7/10d. post free.

The book is in three parts. 1. The Faith of the Churchman. 2. A synopsis of the History of the Church of England. 3. The Practice of the Churchman. The Course of the Instructions is based on the Bible and the Prayer Book, and those who are taking the course are asked to read the Instructions with a Bible and Prayer Book at hand for ready reference. The chapters on Baptism, Confirmation, and the Holy Communion are most instructive and practical. Part II gives a short account of the History of the Church of England, and pp. 81-89, dealing with the Reformation, are most valuable, and will help the reader to understand why the Reformation was needed, and what it effected.

Buy the book, carefully study it, and you will thank God that you are privileged to be a member of the Church of England, a Church that is Reformed, a Church that is Catholic and Apostolic, a Church that is true to the Bible, a Church that will enable the reader of the book to become established in the Faith, "prepared unto every good work, and ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh a reason for the hope that is in him."

"The Story of Clonmacnois"

"The Story of Clonmacnois" by W. L. M. Giff, M.Sc. A.P.C.K.; Dublin, Price 6d.

"In a quiet watered land, a land of roses, Stands St. Ciaran's city fair;

"And the warriors of Ireland in their famous generations,

"Slumber there."

* * *

"Many and many a son of Conn the hundred fighter,

"In the red earth lies at rest;

"Many a blue eye of Clan Colman the turf covers,

"Many a swan-white breast."

We wish Mr. Giff had given his readers the splendid poem of Angus O'Gillan, of which we quote two verses, but he gives not a line. Yet O'Gillan indicates the lasting significance of Clonmacnois, for it is the great Christian necropolis of Ireland.

Of course it had the living as well as the dead there near the very centre of Ireland on the eastern side of the river Shannon. St. Ciaran founded Clonmacnois as a monastery of distinctively Celtic type in the 6th century, and it was for centuries a famous seat of learning and religion. So strong was its founder's personality that the monastic Rule of St. Ciaran was widely adopted.

Like many other great centres of learning Clonmacnois suffered permanent injury from the Danish invaders, and later from the Normans. But its chief foes at all times seem to have been Irish clans. Time after time the monastery was pillaged and burnt by Irishmen. Time after time the faith and perseverance of Irishmen rebuilt it. Finally the monastery (then the centre of a diocese) was extinguished and the buildings ruined by an English force from the near at hand garrison town of Athlone in 1552.

Mr. Giff gives us a neat account of the history of the place and of the present antiquities—remains of about eight churches survive, and very numerous inscribed slabs.

Reference is also made to the literary remains of the monastery—the "Annals of Clonmacnois" are thought to have been compiled, in part at least there. We miss any mention of "Chronicon Scotorum," and of MacFirbis's valuable work. But this is a popular and simple booklet primarily meant as a rough guide for Church of Ireland laypeople who gather in very considerable numbers for an annual open-air service each summer.

Since the Reformation at least two of the little mediaeval buildings have been used for Church of Ireland worship in turn, and Church of Ireland worship is still continued.

Mr. Giff's booklet will be found very informative and therefore very useful indeed for visitors, and we hope that any who in holiday time travel across Ireland by Athlone or Portumna or elsewhere will not fail to turn aside to see

"St. Ciaran's city fair"

Mr. Giff will be an instructive guide,

"Things Present and Things To Come."

"Things Present and Things To Come" by Catherine Kirk, M.A., M.B., Ch.B., Edinburgh. Lindsay & Co. Two shillings. 48 p.p.

The purpose of this book, as stated by Dr. Kirk in the preface is "to bring courage and conviction to the hearts of sincere Christians who look for the coming of the King and His Kingdom." This is indeed a noble edifying and comforting object, and much that Dr. Kirk has written in these pages will effect what is intended. We value the honest readiness to recognise that some may differ from the author; and we believe that she sets out the one sound exegetical principle among Christians (sound, because it directs attention to the source of truth and not to human opinion) when she writes "readers may disagree, but if they are stimulated to study the Bible and the Scripture passages to which reference is made, then much good may result."

We believe it is a necessary thing to lay emphasis upon the promise of Our Lord's return, and not to dissipate the promise into vague ideas, aspirations towards lofty visions, and assumptions of moral and spiritual progress. We need something more substantial than those and something more rational. If, as we have often said (and Dr. Kirk says it too), we believe in the Incarnation which was a fulfilment of prophecy, we should be able to believe in the coming Advent, for it rests on the same grounds of hope and expectation.

It is groundless to suppose that men must go on improving. We may advance in material knowledge, but it is improbable that we shall grow steadily better. All past, and recent, history seems to be against the notion that spiritual progress is certain. Dr. Kirk reminds us that Our Lord Himself warned men "to watch and pray," an unnecessary word of warning if progress in moral and spiritual things was continuous.

We recall reading a statement of opinion (rather than of faith) put out some years ago by a denomination in our midst here in which it was claimed that man's course is "onward and upward for ever"! We infinitely prefer the words of the Creed "He shall come again with glory to judge the quick and the dead." We prefer them because they are far truer, and because they mean something; whereas the other phrase is in fact meaningless. It could only interest people who hesitate to believe that there are "mighty acts of God"; and who think, instead, of their own ideas about Him.

By God's appointment there is a historic process in time, and a historic divine programme man is able to recognise and in part to experience. The past records that some of that programme has actually been realised. God's faithfulness to His promises has already been demonstrated; so we need not hesitate to believe that other things He has promised will be fulfilled.

* * *

Dr. Kirk brings together relevant matter from the Gospels to show how definitely Our Lord spoke of the End, and of the Kingdom. This material, with passages of note from the prophets, gives us an impressive picture of the coming great Realities. The solemn fact of coming Judgment is given due emphasis.

In reference to the "Great Tribulation" Dr. Kirk says "It may be that much of this tribulation is past already." That is a point to think about, and not all will agree, but confident assertions that the Church will be taken away before the tribulation are scarcely justified by the general teaching of the New Testament.

* * *

We wish Dr. Kirk's firm statements on the ethical responsibility of professing Christians could be widely read. The Christian witness in relation to public conduct has been feeble, especially in our day. The result is that Western materialism has now well-nigh captured mankind.

We do not interpret some parts of the Revelation as Dr. Kirk does, but here we recognise the impossibility of all of us agreeing—we shall know soon enough what that book means! We are inclined to great caution in interpreting Old Testament prophecy by identifying place names etc. for we have known some who made sad mistakes in so doing, and during the Second World War we found an over-confident spirit which led to rash assurances in regard to imminent events. Time falsified much of that exposition, and consequent disappointment weakened faith. The recognition of the harm done to faith by interpretations of prophecy which the events have shown to be wrong has led orthodox Churches to be very reserved about such matters. They have been wise.

* * *

We are not in accord with Dr. Kirk's mention of the British-Israel theory, but it is only a few lines, and nothing in her book depends upon it.

We hope the book will be seriously considered and find many readers. It is indeed a 20th century "serious call to a Devout Life."

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 122.

Evangelicals in Spain have received this decree with deep gratitude to God. The Spanish Evangelical Alliance, in particular, is rejoicing that its constant prayers and endeavours have been crowned with this measure of relief from a situation which has been vexing believers for fifteen years and especially since 1949.

The one clause in the decree which might possibly create difficulties in some instances reads as follows: "If the contracting parties have been baptised in the Catholic Church, or if, having been converted to her, they have been apostatised at some future date, and should seek civil marriage, or if the marriage is to be between one baptised person and another non-Catholic, then the Judge will give circumstantial information of the petition to the Ecclesiastical Diocesan authority of his district, in the time limit of eight days. He will not marry the couple until a month has passed following this notification."

The way in which the decree is interpreted and applied by local authorities will give guidance for future prayer and action, especially in view of the fact that the preamble states that it is an interim step toward much-needed legislation on the subject within the framework of the Concordat with the Vatican.—JOHN SAVAGE, ("The Churchman's Magazine.").

* * *

French Disagreement with Vatican—Question of Religious Instruction.

From our own Correspondent

Paris, September 19.

And adverse judgment by the Holy Office on the work of the group of French priests entrusted by the French Episcopate with formulating modern methods of religious instruction is described in "Le Monde" to-night as the most painful of the difficulties that have arisen for the French Roman Catholic Church since the war.

The men whose work is condemned is a group of Sulpician Fathers led by Canon Colomb, in whom the French Episcopate has expressed explicit confidence. Several books by Canon Colomb have been condemned by the Holy Office and he has been ordered to withdraw them. Only a month ago the Archbishop of Aix-en-Provence published in the Paris Catholic evening paper "La Croix" a sharp rebuke to those responsible for an anonymous campaign alleging that the Sulpician Fathers' advice on methods of teaching the catechism was insufficiently orthodox. The Archbishop wrote that the priests criticised showed "a very remarkable preoccupation with the supernatural and with the originality of the message of God. The accusation of naturalism appears to be particularly unjust."

To-day "La Croix" published a communiqué of the Episcopal Commission for Religious Instruction, over which Mgr. de Provençères presides, stating that serious errors and insufficiencies had crept into the system of religious instruction adopted. The idea of progressive instruction had led to the omission during the first years of a child's instruction of sufficient teaching of supernatural truths.

While the catechist must be pre-occupied with the formation of the child's conscience he would always give priority to religious instruction properly so called. Religious experience, the communiqué went on, was not in itself a sufficient criterion for a moral conscience. Therefore while taking care to accustom the child to listen to the voice of conscience it must be explained that the conscience of the Christian is always informed by the teachings of the Church. In other words, the anonymous critics of the French catechists have been approved by the Vatican and not the French Episcopate. "Le Monde" comments:

"This reveals a serious disagreement between the Vatican and the French Episcopate, not as in the case of the priests of the worker mission on questions of apostolate but on the manner itself of presenting the Christian doctrine—that is on a fundamental point for the Church. In other words it is no longer this or that priest taken individually who feels himself touched but the whole Episcopate of France, which had officially renewed the confidence in the Sulpicians.

"However, the manner in which the blame of the Holy Office has been prepared, formulated, and transmitted supposes an authoritarianism such as the French mentality has difficulty in accepting. It is not for us to judge the doctrinal reasons which have determined the Vatican's decision. But the impartial observer cannot fail to observe the tension revealed by an incident of this kind.

—"Manchester Guardian," 21/9/57.

* * *

Spain—Roman "Opus Dei" Plays New Vital Role in Politics.

The growing influence in Spanish politics of the Roman Catholic lay group Opus Dei has become a subject of widespread comment in Madrid.

Members of Opus Dei have attained key positions in the newly formed Spanish Government and other members of the group have been gradually named to important subsidiary posts.

Opus Dei was founded in 1928 by Jose Maria Escriva, a Spanish priest now living in Rome. The movement is regarded as one of potential significance in the immediate future of Spain. Among its chief aims is the spread of Christian ethics in government, business and educational circles. The consensus is that it represents a conservative force of middle class origin, partial to an eventual restoration of a constitutional monarchy, and ready to combat any signs of a return to the left-wing anticlericalism that pervaded Spanish university and intellectual circles during the Nineteen Thirties.

The influence of the movement over the strictly censored Spanish press and inside the government agencies that control public opinion is steadily growing, reliable sources declare. This influence is expected to emerge in coming months in combating the Falange, which many Catholic circles increasingly believe to be going to the left.

—“The Vigilant,” Melbourne, June 1957.

* * *

Presbyterian Mission Work in Ireland.

We reprint (from the September issue of “The Christian Irishman”) the statement of the Rev. S. G. L. Young of Dublin, seconding the report of “The Irish Mission” of the Presbyterian Church.

“In seconding the adoption of the Report I should like to add my tribute to the work and worth of colporteurs of our Church; some of them of long experience, others more recent recruits. Theirs is often a lonely, discouraging job, far from Christian fellowship, a job which takes much courage and grace. They do it well. I am not optimistic enough to believe that all who purchase copies of the Scriptures read them any more than many people read the books and pamphlets of Jehovah’s Witnesses; but we have got to accept a certain wastage and we believe that many do read the Scriptures they buy, especially when the Word is explained to them by the colporteurs in their own homes.

This we do know, that a “great door and effectual is opened” to our ambassadors. But it is also true that “there are many adversaries.”

As I have reason to know, there are many generous-minded people in the Roman Church:

but there are such organisations as the Legion of Mary which are increasingly aggressive. The Martin Luther film was not shown in Southern cinemas, but sometimes where it was shown privately, as in the Abbey Church, Dublin, patrons were met coming out of the Church Hall by members of the Legion of Mary distributing scurrilous leaflets purporting to contain extracts from the works of Luther. I understand that the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, however, apologised for the impoliteness shown by the Legion’s agents.

In the cities it is different, but in the countryside I fear that any attempt of a Roman Catholic to change his religion is liable to be stubbornly resisted. For example, in Fethard-on-Sea in Co. Wexford, the small Protestant community is being boycotted because the Protestant wife of a Roman Catholic has taken her two children away from home and the influence of the Roman Catholic Church, and the local Protestants have been suspected of aiding and abetting and are unjustly suffering the consequences. And the Roman Catholic Church is tackling her Church Extension problem with great energy and effectiveness, following up the population in the newly built-up areas and erecting huge and often beautiful new Chapels, costing many times the price of our new Churches in the North, and using its ample resources also to buy up estates and properties.

I fear that I am not hopeful of any early Reformation—and when, and if, it comes it may not substantially increase the numbers in our own Church: indeed it is not our aim to make Presbyterians at all. It will have to be a Reformation from within the Roman Church and the publishing of the Scriptures among the people will no doubt help on that day.

I submit then to you that our Irish Mission is worthy of your support and that the Superintendent, the Rev. Rupert Gibson, and Rev. Dr. W. P. Young and the colporteurs and office staff are worthy of your confidence. I think our colporteurs go about their work with the right methods and in the right spirit—would there were more of them. They go forth with love in their hearts, bearing the precious seed of the Truth and we believe that they are not going forth in vain. The result may not be an hundred-fold, nor sixty-fold; it may even be less than thirty-fold but the Reformation we long for depends not on numbers but on the power of the LIVING GOD.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH

*"If I take the wings of the morning,
and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea. Even there shall Thy hand lead me."*

Just published:

Selections from the Scriptures in Arë-
Arë for the Arë-Arë, Koio, and Dorio
peoples.

This little book of 193 pages contains selected chapters and portions from the Old and New Testaments in the language of people of the Solomon Islands. It is the first issue of the Scriptures in these dialects. The Solomon Islands are off the N.E. coast of Australia.

Produced by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

For interpretation see "Wylands" artist diagram.
Enlarged photo-copies: 2/9; 3/9; small prints, 1/3.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR, LONDON, W.C.1

"Things Present and Things to Come"

*A small book on the Coming of Christ and
His Kingdom*

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND THREEPENCE

Post Free (Single Copy).

Copies from C. KIRK,

51 SALISBURY ROAD, EDINBURGH, 9.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 12—LXVI.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1957.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	133
"And Was Made Man"	136
Editor's Chair	138
The Story of a Priest	140
Correspondence	141
Index	143

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Fethard on Sea.

The following letter was in the Church of Ireland "Gazette" of 15th November, 1957. It will interest readers to know that the suffering Protestants of Fethard were not neglected.

Fethard

Sir,—I shall be most grateful if you will allow me through the medium of the "Gazette" to express my profound thankfulness to those kind people all over the country who have sent me most generous help towards the relief of my people in the Parish of Fethard-on-Sea who have suffered so severely through the boycott that was imposed upon them in the month of May last, and which I am thankful to say is now showing signs of improvement.

Generous help has come to me and to the Relief Committee that was formed in the parish to assist the needy cases. I have already acknowledged individually our great indebtedness to those who have helped us so well, and can assure them that their sympathy and prayers and generosity will not be forgotten.

It has been a very trying experience for those who have been involved, but their cheerful spirit, and their Christian courage and behaviour have made a deep impression and have shown that the Church of Ireland has an important contribution to make towards the happiness and well-being of our country.

There has been no bitterness, only Christian love and charity. Thus have they tried to promote the only spirit that will turn Ireland into a Christian nation.

On behalf of my people in that little parish I thank those who have stood beside us in this day of testing. I would mention especially the clergy and people of the North, and members of the Presbyterian and Methodist Communions, who by their sympathy and helpfulness, have emphasised the truth that the Church, both North and South, is bound together in one communion and fellowship.

—John Ossory, The Palace, Kilkenny.

[The Right Revd. Dr. Phair, Church of Ireland Bishop of Ossory, Ferns and Leighlin, himself did much to prevent recrimination and bitterness. He constantly sought to encourage his flock to bear their troubles as Christians should. In that "day of visitation" in Fethard many saw our people's "good works," and may yet "glorify Our Father in Heaven."]

* * *

Anglican and Presbyterian Plan Opposed—"Disturbing" Report.

By Our Ecclesiastical Correspondent

The Annunciation Group which focussed resistance to the Church of South India scheme is now rallying opinion against the proposals for a merger between the Anglican and Presbyterian Churches.

In a statement prepared by the Rev. Mervyn Pendleton, vicar of Woollaston, Northants, the report on the conversations between representatives of the Churches concerned, which is to have an important place in the agenda of the Lambeth Conference next year, is described as "a highly disturbing document."

The document, the statement says, discloses "how far official representatives of the Church of England are prepared to go in sacrificing the essentials of the Catholic faith for the sake of intercommunion with non-Catholic bodies."

The principal recommendation of the report, already summarised in "The Daily Telegraph," is that the Presbyterians should have "bishops of a sort" and the Anglicans "elders of a sort."

"Episcopal Handshake"

The statement deals trenchantly with the reduced conception of the divine commission function and confirmation from a sacrament of the Episcopate to that of an ecclesiastical to "the equivalent of an episcopal handshake."

"One of the worst features of the report is that the order of the priesthood, so far from forming an indispensable part of the proposed scheme, is passed over in total silence, as if it were of no consequence."

The fundamental error of the report is said to be "its assumption that unity depends, not on the one only holy bond of truth, but on the mutual adoption of a similar organisation, even though it is combined with mutually contradictory doctrines and beliefs."

The Annunciation Group is composed mainly of London priests who first met in 1951 in the Church of the Annunciation, Bryanston Street, London, W.1. "to give uncompromising witness to the catholicity of the Church of England and staunchly to uphold its Catholic faith and order."

—"Daily Telegraph," 23/9/'57.

[It may be noted that this group is of an extreme character and is not representative of the Church of England.]

* * *

Converts from Rome.

Addressing the 60th Synod of the Anglican Church of Rupert's Land, the presiding Archbishop, in speaking of his episcopal acts since the last Synod, said that he had received 56 Roman Catholics into the Anglican Church. There are 28 Anglican dioceses in Canada, many of them larger than that of Rupert's Land, and the Anglican Church as a whole, seems to have received a substantial number of converts from Rome during the past year. The other Protestant Churches also claim many Roman converts, so the total must be large.

—"The Protestant Woman," September 1957.

* * *

Persecution—Argentine Bishop Reports Roman Oppression.

The reports about the oppression of Protestants in Colombia are, in most cases, absolutely true, Bishop Sante Uberto Barbieri of the Argentine said recently in an interview in Geneva.

Protestant schools, mission stations and churches have been closed by the authorities, services interrupted, Protestants arrested, he said. At times, church buildings have been destroyed and outrages committed against Protestants and missionaries.

Bishop Barbieri accused the Roman Catholic hierarchy of using the political situation to wage a campaign against Protestants and of ignoring the papal encyclicals urging moderation. The Roman Catholics have said that the purity of the Christian faith in Colombia must be protected against Protestant sects, mostly of North American origin. However, Bishop Barbieri pointed out in Colombia the Protestant church work was not carried out by the so-called "sects," but by churches of long standing, such as The Reformed Church of Colombia, which has a century of tradition behind it. Bishop Barbieri noted disunity among the Roman Catholics, and said the Colombian clergy are opposed not only to the Protestant missionaries from North America but also to missionaries sent by Roman Catholic mission groups in North America.

Protestant churches in most other South American countries are more or less free—at any rate there is no open persecutions, Bishop Barbieri said. In Mexico, Peru and Venezuela there are certain restrictions on Protestant work. In some places Protestants have no access to radio stations or have not received permits to set up their own transmitting stations.—E.P.S.

[E.P.S. is the Ecumenical Press Service. What we quote is from "The Vigilant" of June 1957.

We cannot say that Bishop Barbieri is a Roman Catholic bishop. From the nature of the above we take him to be evangelical, and probably a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church of U.S.A. working in S. America.]

* * *

Scottish Reformation Society.

We are glad to have the 106th annual report of this Society. It is an encouraging report, and in these days of much self-centredness we are indeed glad to read that "there is every indication of more interest being taken in the Society." We are pleased to read also "more subscribers have been added this year."

The Western Committee reports very interesting activities, and we hope that the general Christian public of Scotland will bestir itself and develop fresh and lasting concern for the supremacy of the Gospel.

* * *

The Wolfenden Report. Sanity at Last

Since the Wolfenden Report hit the headlines we have been regaled with sporadic effusions from a great variety of moral theologians and authorities. To be really Irish about it let us say that the only thing they had in common was that they were all different—and all such a mixture of subtlety and confusion that the plain man may well have given up the chase for truth long ago. Again and again at the end of a long read we have left the paper down and said with a sigh, "Will some kind gentleman please tell us what all this is about? Is it really so very difficult to tell the ordinary man what is right and what is wrong?" But out of a Babel of voices nothing but increasing confusion came.

On 8th October the Diocesan Synod met in Armagh, and in his address His Grace made a reference to the Wolfenden Report. You may have seen it. If so you will condone repetition of such excellence. If not, you may be glad to have some light in a place where others have left it badly needed.

"I am very glad," said Dr. Gregg, "that one member of the Commission stood out firmly against the proposal to remove the penalty upon homo-sexual practices between consenting adults. To remove this penalty is not merely a negative act but a positive one. The existence of the penalty reflects the determined public judgment upon a certain line of un-natural conduct. This line of conduct is not simply private and personal. It involves of necessity a second person, and so becomes social. Quite apart from its religious aspect, history has judged this line of conduct to be anti-social and corrupting. The removal of penalty upon detection substitutes condonation for condemnation. It suggests that the individual's choice (involving as it does more than himself alone) is a matter of indifference to the community. He may go as he pleases, he may lead others to share in his anti-social practices. There is no object in self-control. Too much would be sacrificed to the so-called liberty of the individual—a liberty for which too many are un-ripe, and which they do not know how to use when it is granted to them."

If I had been able to read this weeks ago I could have saved a lot of time laboriously lost in trying to make sense of various Anglican pronouncements. And if those responsible for these pronouncements had been able to read it, what they had to say might have been a good deal more valuable to the world.

With this thought at the back of my mind I saw a special aptness in a speech made later in the Synod by the Archdeacon of Armagh where he referred to the Archbishop's "wise counsel and wholesome advice which is not infrequently sought and readily given throughout the Anglican Communion."

—"Church of Ireland Gazette," 18/10/1957.

[We believe the Archbishop of Armagh has made a plain and essential moral principle clear in this very unpleasant discussion].

* * *

A Newspaper Advertisement—"The truth about the Catholic Church."

"Catholics go to Confession to tell God they are sorry for their sins and to get His forgiveness. If you would like to know more about Confession and other points of Catholic teaching, the Catholic Enquiry Centre will gladly send you a free course of leaflets.

"The Catholic Enquiry Centre has been set up because many of our non-Catholic friends want to know us better. Tens of thousands have already replied to these advertisements. Daily they tell us of their gratitude. Perhaps we can help you too. Only God can give you the gift of Faith, but we can give you facts about the Faith and remove misunderstandings. You may never intend to become a Catholic. But we can still help you. Send today for free explanatory brochure."

[This advertisement appears in many newspapers in Great Britain. It is well drafted, well planned, and accompanied by an attractive picture. We can readily recognise its appeal, and how it can attract the interest (or curiosity) of many of the churchless, and indeed Christless, hordes of newspaper readers.

But, let it be noted that all men everywhere can tell God that they are sorry for their sins. There is no need whatever to employ a priest as the intermediary, or to engage in 'auricular confession! Still less is it necessary that Divine forgiveness should be conveyed to the penitent by a judicial absolution pronounced by a priest of any church.

We do not deny the moral and psychological advantages in particular instances of confessing or confiding one's sins to another—but (1.) He need not be a priest, and (2.) the assurance of God's forgiveness is given in God's Words thus—"If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." I John, 1, 9.

God is the one to Whom we must confess, and from Whom we must receive forgiveness. We can believe in forgiveness because He has promised it, and it is free. Our Lord Jesus Christ by His offering of Himself for us on Calvary secured that inestimable benefit for His people].

* * *

Why the Injunction?

The injunction of the Rev. John Kelly of Washington, D.C., bidding Roman Catholics to stay away from Billy Graham's mission in Madison Square Garden in New York, is not strange, and any significance it has is that the warning was issued at all. It is the general principle, established by canon law, that Roman Catholics are forbidden to read, listen or to lend their presence to what the church holds to be doctrine contrary to that held by their church. For instance, participation in a Protestant service, or even in a common service in which a Protestant minister would have a part, is banned by the Roman Church. That also applies to radio and television, and it is assumed all devout and practising Roman Catholics are well aware of, and observe, these restrictions.

That being so, the publication of this injunction in connection with the Graham mission must have some special reason. And we venture to say that it is well known to the hierarchy that many Roman Catholics have been converted through listening to the evangelist's message. That can only be the cause of this warning. Even the priest admits that Billy Graham attracts many of the Roman faith and there is no doubt that an appreciable number, hearing the Gospel preached in its scriptural purity for the first time, have responded. The issuing of the injunction reveals once more the restriction of freedom that goes with membership in the Roman Catholic Church. Here it is laid down what the church thinks one ought not to hear. The human mind is not permitted to decide the conduct of the individual. Other injunctions refer to what shall be read, how children shall be reared, what shall be eaten, and in a multitude of ways the Church reaches right into the life of the individual, both in the family and social spheres and dictates what shall or shall not be done.

It is difficult to see how intelligent people submit to this limitation of liberty in so many natural channels of life. Discipline can be useful, so long as it does not dull the activity of the mind and produce a slavish sense of obedience that ignores reason and sanity. That many Roman Catholics in the United States have formed the habit of thinking for themselves is evident from this warning, and that is the only hope for that great country. May many more than the usual number of them flock to Madison Square Garden and learn what freedom on a Christian basis really is. It is clear that the Gospel, as preached by Billy Graham, still has the power to stir the hearts of men.

—"The Sentinel," Toronto.

* * *

What is happening in China?

News emanating from China is often confused and contradictory, and in consequence difficult to assess. It is plain, however, that there is considerable political tension. Some time ago the Peking Government decided to allow greater freedom to "discussion forums," with the result

(Continued on p. 142.)

"AND WAS MADE MAN."

These words from the Nicene Creed, which is the one universal Creed of the Christian Church, say what the centre of Christianity is. It is the Incarnation.

"The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory (glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth" (St. John).

Here is expressed the greatest of all mysteries. We can never exhaust the wonder of that event in which the Eternal Word was made in the likeness of men. People may dispute about it, but Charles Kingsley was wise indeed when he wrote about Christ's coming into men's life that it is "the one great bright pathway which I find, more and more, to be the only escape from infinite depression and aberration, the only explanation of a thousand human mysteries."

Wise too was the Irishman George Tyrrell in saying that "the truth of Christ's humanity, taken in connection with that of His Divinity, is one, that more than all others, has renewed the face of the earth."

It is God the Son "who, for us men and for our salvation, came down from Heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man."

In His earthly life Our Lord was ever conscious of His eternal life with God. Though we say of Him that He was "a man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief" we must allow that He had a personal knowledge of what makes human happiness. He knew the joys of family life: the simple pleasures of simple people: the innocent cheerfulness and modest festivities of a wedding-party.—Why not? He loved His people and His fellowmen and love has its own special happiness. Thought of His wonderful Birth at Bethlehem, as told to us in the most exquisite lines ever written, should bring to mind that childhood, boyhood and manhood were passed by our Emmanuel in a home in Nazareth. It could not have been other than a home of peace and love—in it dwelt "the Handmaid of the Lord" who treasured the words of the Annunciation in her heart. In it dwelt "the altogether Lovely One, the fairest among ten thousand"—not only "the Mighty God and everlasting Lord," but "the Prince of Peace."

* * *

The Gospel says He was "born of the Virgin Mary." So the prophet had foretold, so the Archangel had declared, and so it was. We sing "Magnificat," for it is the song of Mary, but more significantly, it is part of the spirit-breathed Word of God. The Christian gladly acknowledging the Providence of God, and the choice of a Virgin of Israel to be the mother of Our Redeemer, need never go beyond the New Testament for spiritual truth. Our Lord who was made Man, and whose Birth was proclaimed to shepherds, and whose glories were greeted by star-led chiefs, the wise men from the East, is our sole and exclusive Redeemer. He is our Mediator at the Father's right hand. He in His glorified Humanity "of the seed of David," and He alone, "ever lives to make intercession for us."

* * *

We come boldly to the Throne of Grace because we are invited to. The invitation is from God Himself, not from mortal, however holy. The invitation excludes all intermediaries, for none can share the effective intercession sealed by the Precious Blood. The invitation is into the Presence of the King of Kings. The path to Him goes through no side-chambers or waiting-places, for the Incarnate Lord has "opened the kingdom of Heaven to all believers."

* * *

We sing "Nunc Dimittis" for our eyes have seen the glory of the Word-made-flesh as really as Simeon did—"a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel." "That was the true light which lighteth every man." Our yearly remembrance of the Nativity ought to be, in our hearts, an ever-present remembrance, for "if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin."

Our thoughts should dwell much in prayer for His own (after the flesh) who rejected Him—"He came unto His own, and His own received Him not" though He is their glory, the true Shekinah. The day of grace for them is not ended yet so we ought to pray that the eyes of the blind may be opened. But we must in profound humility thank God for this blessing that—"As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in His Name."

* * *

We sing "Benedictus"—let us always do it with the deepest sense of "the tender mercy of our God; whereby the Day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."

* * *

In the Incarnation God has "exalted them of low degree." His Son came on earth to dwell in a carpenter's house, not in Herod's or any other palace. He raised the shipmen of Galilee to the highest place in His Kingdom: and "this honour have all His saints" (Ps. 149). The common people heard the Christ gladly—He "spoke to their condition"—He speaks to ours, and we too may hear Him gladly if we put self into the second place. Sin is a barrier between us and Him, but self is the barrier which must first be thrown down.

* * *

The first who knew of Heaven's gift at Bethlehem were shepherds. They were not careless or sleepy-headed shepherds, but "keeping watch over their flock by night." In that silent star-lit world they alone were awake to see and awake to hear. Once, at the old creation, "all the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy": now at the new creation shepherds see "a multitude of the heavenly host," and hear them "praising God and saying 'Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace among men in whom He is well-pleased.'" Here again the sign is one to exalt "them of low degree." Is it not a better message for the world's proletariat than any given by Marx or Lenin?

* * *

In the wisdom of God, His last appeal to man is made through a little child. We recall the words of Christ in the parable of the Husbandmen—"They will reverence My Son." The prophet had foretold "a little child shall lead them." The Babe of Bethlehem is humanity's last chance; its last, its only Hope. God spoke to men repeatedly in the past—"Because ye have done all these works, saith the Lord, and I spake unto you, rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called you, but ye answered not"—"I sent unto you all My servants the prophets, rising early and sending them, saying, oh, do not this abominable thing that I hate, but they hearkened not" (Jeremiah 7, 13 and 44, 4). Now He has spoken in these last days "in His Son . . . the Brightness of His glory, and the Express Image of His Person" (Heb. 1, 3).

The message of the Nativity is therefore supremely the message of the love of God. The Son of God is made the Son of man—not for His sake, but for our's.

He came to them of low degree, and at length He had not where to lay His head, until at last it rested in Joseph's New Sepulchre. Now that He has gone into Heaven the mighty He put down may have resumed their seats, but the victory is not theirs. He is coming again "the second time unto salvation," and at that Second Advent we may be sure of this one thing, that He, who for us men and for our salvation came down from Heaven; endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself; and suffered death upon the Cross, "shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied." Isaiah 53, 11.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1957.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

I. THE ROSARY.

We are not very familiar with the Rosary though we have heard it recited on many occasions. We do not suppose the majority of our readers is better acquainted with it than we are. The ordinary feeling about it among non-Roman Catholics is that there is too much repetition in it. It is also felt that the request to the Blessed Virgin Mary to pray for us now and at the hour of our death goes beyond the knowledge of God's will and truth as revealed to us. The first criticism may not amount to much, but the second is serious. Raising, as it does, the old problem of the saints interceding for us, it compels us to say that we have no knowledge that the dead in Christ can or do listen to us so as to hear our requests; or that they act as intercessors on our behalf.

If God intended His people to address themselves to the blessed dead we believe that His Word could not be silent on such an important matter. If He intended that the Blessed Virgin in particular should be our intercessor He would have directed us through His servants the writers of the New Testament to ask her assistance. We would gladly pray to her if the Word of God told us to do so.

But the plain fact is that no command, request, suggestion or implication is to be found in the New Testament. No word of Christ is there to guide us. It is not as if the New Testament had nothing to say about prayer. Our Lord taught

His disciples to pray—"When ye pray, say 'Our Father.'" He told us to ask the Father in His Name. He assured us that "if ye shall ask anything in My Name I will do it" (John 14, 14.)—"Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My Name He will give it you" (John 16, 23.)—"At that day ye shall ask in My Name" (John 16, 26.).

In the Epistle to the Hebrews we read that Our Lord Himself "ever liveth to make intercession for us." Access to God is impressively described in the following words of Chapter 10—"Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, His flesh; and having a high priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith."

Elsewhere the same epistle tells us to "Come boldly to the throne of Grace," and assures us of Christ now in the presence of God, that "He ever liveth to make intercession for them" whom "He is able to save to the uttermost."

The continual emphasis of Holy Scripture on prayer to God, to the Tri-une Jehovah, seems to us to be of such force and command as to exclude the thought that we may pray to others, now gone from this world, in order to seek their assistance.

Now it may be answered "Did not St. Paul write 'brethren, pray for us'?" and do we not constantly ask our friends, our clergymen, our correspondents, to pray for us? Yes, these are facts indeed. The explanation is that we, like St. Paul, are asking the prayers of those we know to be able to hear us and to respond. We do not know that the blessed saints, now in the presence of God, enjoying the Beatific Vision, hear us. We have no revelation that God has given them either the power to hear or the vocation to intercede.

A reader may say "does not St. John in the Revelation (ch. 22, 3.) say of heaven that there 'His servants shall serve Him,' and how can they serve but by prayer?" The answer is in the word translated "serve" in the English Authorised Version—it means "to worship." The servants of God offer in heaven perpetual adoration.

Another may ask "what of the 'golden vials full of odours which are the prayers of saints'?" (Rev. 5, 8.). This verse concerns the prayers of the people of God who belong to the Church on earth: who are still "in the body." So also in parallel verses in chapter 8 (vv. 3 and 4). It may be noted that the prayers of believers are brought before God by angels, not by the faithful who are in glory.

Much then as we love and honour the memory of the earthly Mother who bore Our Lord, and through whom the Word was made flesh we cannot admit that it is a Christian duty or a Christian privilege to address her in prayer or to seek her aid.

* * *

We have before us a leaflet on the subject of Protestants and the Rosary, issued from a Dominican house. The Dominican Order has always been closely identified with the Rosary as is well known. One phrase or sentence in the leaflet says "The Rosary is not for Catholics [i.e. Roman Catholics] only. It is for all men." We simply cannot imagine a non-Roman Catholic who is properly aware of his faith using the Rosary in its present form, for the reasons we have given above. All emphasis in non-Roman churches has been upon the privilege of direct and immediate access to God through His Son. We have no teaching such as is associated with St. Alphonsus Liguori, that prayer to Christ through His Mother is more effective than prayer addressed to Him without intermediary.

Reference is made to the saying of the Rosary in factories, workrooms etc. The proper course would be for any Protestants to withdraw quietly beforehand, or if that is not feasible, to preserve a respectful silence. We say "respectful," for a Christian ought not to hurt the religious convictions or susceptibilities of others. This holds even if the recitation is unfair in certain circumstances to our convictions. Our point is that a devotional act should not be permitted to cause strife—not even in such a situation as that in which a tiny minority of Roman Catholics say the Rosary in a workroom where the big majority is Protestant. The faithful Protestants are free to read aloud a little of God's Word and to unite in saying the Lord's Prayer.

* * *

Our leaflet tells us that the "Hail Mary" is from the first chapter of the Gospel of St. Luke. That is of course correct except that the words of the Angel "Hail Mary, full of grace" ought to be "thou that art highly favoured." But we pause at the next piece of information.

"To the Hail Mary the piety of later ages has added 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death.' To the Our Father the Anglican Prayer Book has added a doxology not to be found in the original text of the Our Father."

The suggestion seems to be that the one addition is as reasonable and well-founded as the other! What are the facts? The doxology added to the Lord's Prayer—"For Thine is the Kingdom, the power, and the glory for ever," is scripturally and doctrinally true. The addition to the Hail Mary is not scriptural in character, and is doctrinally incorrect. The doxology was not added to the Book of Common Prayer's version of Our Father by mere caprice: it was added because it was in the best known Greek text of the Gospel available. It was believed to be part of the original prayer and for that sole reason was re-introduced. It is true that modern scholarship and the great range of Greek MSS. show that this doxology is not original. But there is no just comparison to be made between these two additions: the one made because it was thought to be original, the other created by "the piety of later ages."

* * *

The leaflet seems to be intended for distribution among Protestants—A little story is told of a girl whose boy-friend is a Roman Catholic and explains to her the Rosary devotion. It begins by saying "Jean was a Protestant, and like all her good co-religionists she had a deep love of the inspired Word of God." We appreciate this tribute to good Protestants, and wish it were more deserved. May it be understood that this very love for the inspired Word of God is the reason why Protestants do not accept the Rosary devotion or several other Roman Catholic observances which are the outcome of "the piety of later ages"?

II. BOYCOTT.

When reflecting on the history of Ireland, as we frequently do, and trying to grow better acquainted with the recent past, we wondered if there had been any authoritative word on the ethical aspect of that Irish form of social and economic ostracism called boycotting. Our readers are aware, of course, that the practice of this sort of ostracism ("sending to Coventry" is what schoolboys call it) draws its name from a Captain Boycott, a Western land-agent and farmer, whose crops could not be harvested because some local patriotic and agrarian organisation forbade men to work for him, or any to trade with him. The Boycott episode was some seventy or more years ago. The practice has not died out. Many decent people at different times and in different places have suffered from it. Lately, as we know, it was enforced against Protestants at Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford.

It seems to us that the procedure might be urged on political grounds by interested parties, but that spiritual and moral aspects must have called for clear examination at the time when the Land League and other organisations were extremely active. We searched various sources and at length came on the following document which we briefly transcribe—

Rome, 23 April, 1888.

Congregation of Propaganda,

"The Holy See has often addressed the Irish people for whom it has always testified a special affection, in words of advice and warning when the affairs of Ireland made intervention necessary. Now our Holy Father, Pope Leo XIII fears that the true idea of justice and charity may be perverted among them by consequence of a form of proscription known as the Boycott. Consequently he has charged the Congregation of the Inquisition to examine this matter seriously.

"The question has been put to the very eminent Fathers who share with me the duties of Inquisitors General—"Is it lawful to have recourse to the Boycott in the struggle between land-owners and tenants?" And their Eminences have answered 'No.'

"It is contrary to natural justice and Christian charity that a new form of persecution and proscription may be pitilessly operated against individuals who are satisfied with the farm-rent which they undertook to pay; or against persons who in exercise of their rights take up vacant farms.

"You will urge your clergy and people and require them to observe Christian charity and not to exceed the limits of justice."

R. CARD. MONACO.

"To the Irish Bishops."

* * *

At the present day, Papal letters and encyclicals are very highly esteemed. The letters of Pope Leo XIII are greatly valued. Here then is one of Pope Leo's letters on Boycott. The circumstances of 1957 are not, of course, those of 1888—the question of landlord and tenant does not arise: but what of the principle underlying the specific instances? Has not that principle laid down on behalf of the Pope a bearing upon Ireland to-day?

Ought this letter, which for the people of Ireland came from a source inferior only to Heaven itself, to be forgotten?

THE STORY OF A PRIEST.

The Revd. Manuel Aldama.

From time to time we have published in our pages accounts of Roman Catholic clergymen who have joined reformed churches. It will have been noticed that many of these men live and minister in the United States of America. The reason for this predominance of America is not obscure. North America is the land of the free. In contrast with it the Roman Catholic countries of Europe are awkward places for the ex-Roman Catholic ecclesiastic. In Spain or Italy life would be difficult indeed. In France a convert might find secular employment, but might not easily have opportunity of carrying on an evangelical ministry. But in North America a man can stand on his own feet. He can enter (if suitable) into the ministry of a reformed church. Very many have done so. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States (it is in communion with the Church of England and the Church of Ireland) has, we are informed, numerous former Roman Catholics in its ministry. So has the Presbyterian Church. The same may be said of the Baptist Church also.

A far greater number is dispersed through secular employment, and there is no reason to think that they are other than industrious, responsible and honourable men.

It is often said, as though it were at one and the same time an explanation and a reproach, that the motive of such conversions (or lapses) is the desire to be married. We see nothing discreditable in that. Holy Scripture says "marriage is honourable in all" (Heb. 13. 4). Of course, for entrance into an evangelical ministry more is needed than disagreement with the disciplinary rules of the Church and Canon Law. There is need of a definite conversion; of a rejection of unscriptural and un-Catholic dogmas; of an acceptance of gospel precepts and the testimony of the Reformation. Many men are now giving loyal and much valued service in non-Roman Catholic churches, and rejoice in Christian intellectual liberty, as well as in evangelical faith.

* * *

The same is true to a smaller extent in South America. Some republics in that continent have a great tradition of liberty although their European roots are Spanish or Portuguese. In Brazil, for example, the reformed cause flourishes and is growing remarkably. We ought to think and pray more for the advance of the light of truth in Latin America.

* * *

What of the Revd. Manuel Aldama whose name heads this article? He is a native of Spain, and was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood in Madrid. As he advanced in his studies he found himself becoming less enthusiastic for the dogmas enforced by the Church, especially the nineteenth century ones—the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin and the Infallibility of the Pope. Indeed anyone studying the history of these two doctrines must find it hard to accept them in contrast with such truly Catholic dogmas as the Incarnation and the Atonement and the Resurrection of Our Lord. Little wonder that the Professor of Dogmatic Theology thought it necessary to warn this student of the danger of falling into heresy.

* * *

When the time of Senor Aldama's ordination came he was able to suggest to his bishop that he wished to teach rather than to follow a pastoral course in charge of a parish. The bishop allowed the young priest to teach secular subjects in a college at Santander in Northern Spain. The intellectual and spiritual problems remained.

As time went on Fr. Aldama's hold on religion weakened, and reaction from excess of ill-founded dogmas led to almost a denial of religious truth. Doubt seemed to beset every article of belief.

For such a man, in such a frame of mind, and half convinced that he should give up the priesthood, Spain was not a tolerable country. He therefore left his native land, and eventually settled in London. After some time there he wrote to the Roman Catholic Archbishop at Westminster to say that he would celebrate the Mass no more. Having thus simply released himself from ecclesiastical ties, which he could no longer conscientiously submit to, Mr. Aldama determined to follow a secular calling, and be bothered no more by religious matters.

One might say that it was not right for a man with doubts to enter upon the duties of the priesthood. That is of course true; but if one has been prepared for, and conditioned to, such a way of life from boyhood it is hard to relinquish it, and to disappoint the hopes of friends and near relations. Also, it may be expected that a few years of practical experience may result in the conquest of doubt, and in settling down to the usual routine.

* * *

When Mr. Aldama thought he had done with God, God was making plans for him. A certain Church of England clergyman heard of him and his spiritual situation, and invited him to talk over his spiritual problems. He accepted the invitation, and as a result learnt that his real need had always been a living faith in Christ. Far from being able to maintain a sense of superiority to the Protestant clergyman, (which he had tried to do), he found that he had to become a learner, and reach an understanding of how the sinner is justified by faith in Christ.

At length the clergyman brought the Spaniard to a prayer-meeting and told him that the few people present knew of his problems and were about to pray for him. He was sure that they prayed most sincerely, and that that evening was a turning-point in his life. On the following Sunday he attended a Protestant Church for the first time, and the impression made was profound. He realised his spiritual needs, and learnt how they could be met.

Convinced and converted by divine Grace, the next step followed on a request to meet the evangelical mission which had work in South America. As Mr. Aldama was now prepared to become an evangelist among Spanish speaking peoples, he was asked to go to Peru. He was willing and after a course in Glasgow under the late Dr. McIntyre of the Bible Institute he went to Lima.

Twelve years were spent in Lima in connection with preparation of gospel literature in Spanish. Then the British and Foreign Bible Society sent him to Quito in Ecuador where the pioneer missionary broadcasting station "The Voice of the Andes" had begun. He was asked to broadcast a few gospel messages, and was astonished at the result, for numerous letters and telephone calls came, revealing to him the extent of spiritual hunger and enquiry.

Since then the broadcasting "The Voice of the Andes" grew till it was working on five wave-lengths, and using many other languages as well as Spanish.

This ministry has untold possibilities and no one can estimate the effect of wireless ministries. Whether it be from Quito, or Tangier, or Monte Carlo, or Luxemburg, or anywhere else, the message of the Gospel can enter innumerable homes where an evangelical may not. The Word may be heard by vast numbers who would not venture into a Protestant church service. We know that not all such broadcasts are evangelical and orthodox, but the majority may be, and the seed so sown may bear much fruit among those who are "ignorant and out of the way" as well as among those who are "in darkness and in the shadow of death."

CORRESPONDENCE.

"When Paul wrote his epistles, he didn't have the divided state of the Churches in 1957 in mind. As far as the future was concerned, Paul didn't look very far ahead, because he expected the world to end very soon, (perhaps before he himself died).”—Quoted from D. R. Davies's article in "The Bible Speaks to Britain," September '57.

I do not like to correct a professor!

Apparently the Apostles and early Christians expected a comparatively early return of Christ. They had no knowledge of the centuries which would eventuate.

Is it correct to say that they expected that coming "very soon"? ("Soon" is a hymn-book word.)

Paul wrote: "I know that after my departure grievous wolves will come in, not sparing the flock."

Peter wrote of the certainty of fulfilment of His Master's words as to his own (Peter's) death. And wrote "False teachers and prophets shall arise."

The grievous wolves have come. The false prophets and teachers have arisen. Hundreds of thousands of them in the course of the centuries.

Hence the great need to read the Scriptures themselves.

Careful reading in Services is the best part. The blessedness and blessings of the Bread of Life are not appreciated.

W. H. HARRIS,
BM/Labr.,
London, W.C.1.

Sept. 15th, 1957.

[We are grateful to Mr. Harris for his comment on Mr. D. R. Davies's article which we reproduced. The interesting word used by St. Paul "departure" (A.V. is "departing") "Aphixis" in its classical use generally means "arrival"; but "arrival" in Acts 20, 29 would make nonsense. The sense must be the rarer significance "departing." Here we ought not to assume that St. Paul refers to his death, but to the sequel in Ephesus. As his future course of life would render it unlikely that he would revisit Ephesus ("They would see his face no more") he warned his followers there to be on their guard against false teachers who might appear at any moment (as they did in Galatia as soon as St. Paul's back was turned).

In Heb. 3. 12 "departing" means "apostasy." In Mark 6. 33 it means "going away." In Heb. 11. 22 it is "exodus."

In 2 Tim. 4. 6 "departure" translates a quite different Greek word from any above. It is the word used for a vessel being loosed from its moorings. It means departure out of life, and may have suggested to Tennyson the impressive imagery of his poem "Crossing the Bar."

Probably D. R. Davies had in mind the passage 1 Thessalonians 4, 13-18, especially v. 15 which claims "the Word of the Lord" as its source.]

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 136.

that many intellectuals, educationalists and business leaders took advantage of the concession to criticize policies of the régime. This has provoked a fierce reaction in the Communist Party press, which has denounced the critics as "enemies of the people." A report from a French source, states that Mao Tse-Tung is adopting a middle course, and has rebuked "deviationists" of both the right and the left. His moderation may be dictated as much by an economic crisis, as by political considerations. It is estimated that more than eleven million acres of the most fruitful soil in China are inundated as a result of the Yellow River, proverbially known as "China's Sorrow," having once again burst its banks. Officials, soldiers and peasants are labouring night and day in an attempt to mitigate the disaster. But more heavy rains are forecast, and millions of peasants are confronting what may well prove to be one of the worst flood disasters in China's history. The most hopeful news is concerned with the life and activities of the Christian Church in China. According to Lady Stansgate, who has recently visited the country, the Christian Churches in China, under their own leaders, are very much alive, and in many places are growing in numbers. She reports that in Peking alone there are sixty churches, all open and still using their old denominational names. Sales of Bibles are mounting. Four theological seminaries are training students for the ministry and for the teaching profession. The Churches in China are said to publish twenty-six Christian magazines and periodicals, including a number for young people, an indication that in China youth is not so closely guarded from Christian teaching outside their own homes as in Russia. All this is distinctly hopeful, and may be taken as evidence that once again God is overruling a crisis in China for the furtherance of the Gospel in that land.

—"The Christian," 2/8/1957.

INDEX.

	PAGE		PAGE
A		E
Asia, S. E.	4	Emigrants, Irish	14
Authority of Bible	6	Education in Eire	37
"Authentic New Testament"	12	England, R.C. Church in	38
Anglican Orders	21
"Apostolicae Curae"	21	F
Alcohol and Marriage	55
Africa, South	62
Augustine, St.	65
Austria	72	French Canadians	16
Angola	85	Fathers, Consent of	19
Asch, Sholem	122	France	35
Armagh, Archbishop of	134	Fear of Rome	37
Aldama, Rev. M.	140	Fethard on Sea	73, 87, 95, 100, 105, 133, 139
		"Filled with the Spirit"	90
B		Fernandes, Rev. J. A.	112
Book Reviews	4, 12, 36, 57, 128, 130	France and the Vatican	131
Bible's Authority	6, 61
"Belief of Catholics"	8	G
Bible Society, British and Foreign	13, 26
Bodkin, Rev. M., S.J.	14	Gibson, Rev. F. R.	1, 32, 96
Beatifications	26	Gutenberg	13
Bible or Pope?	35	Giguere, Rev. J. A.	16
Blakeney's Catechism	42	Gaelic Speakers	24
Bartoli, Dr. G.	45	Gambling	62
Bruree Church Burned	49	Giff, Rev. W. L. M.	129
Broderick, Fr., on Luther	50	Graham, Dr. W.	135
Boycott in Co. Wexford	74, 139
Browne, Most Rev. Dr.	86, 121	H
Benedictines at Whitby	92
Belgian Protestants	95	Hungary	2, 61
Brussels Exhibition	96	Heretics	15
Brazil	98, 109	Hall Set on Fire	38
Bible, Reading	105	Hymn, St. Patrick's	50
Benedictine Joins Church of England	108	Hammond, Archdeacon	81
Bird, Late Canon Richard	118	Holy Spirit Promised	93
		Hares, Archdeacon	128
C
Colombia	3, 84, 134	I
Canon of Bible	7
Correspondence	11, 32, 46, 104, 141	Irish Language	16
"Church and State"	15, 59	Israel	25, 48, 97, 98, 107, 110
Confessions and Creeds	18	Infallibility	27, 39
Creed of Pope Pius	18	Intention	44, 78
Christ as Man	30	Individual and the Holy Spirit	54
Chile, Protestant Progress in	33	India and Alcohol	60
China	49, 136	"I know Why"	68
Confession, Habitual	98	Irish Presbyterians	75, 132
Cowderoy, Rt. Rev. Dr.	114	Irish Nationalism	75
Christ Pleads for us	116	Ireland's Minority	97
Chillingworth, William	124	Incarnation	136
"Church of England, The"	128
"Clonmacnois, Story of"	129	J
D		Jesuits in U.S.A.	1
		Jewel, Bishop	23
Derg, Lough	1	James, Professor E. O.	57
Dix, Rev. Dr. Gregory	23	"Jocism"	70
Detroit	70	Joseph the Carpenter	89
Deck, J. G.	103
Dickinson, Mr. J. A.	102, 103
Davies, D. R.	105, 141
Deity of Christ	111

	PAGE		PAGE
K		Philbin, Most Rev. Dr.	97, 109
Knox, Rt. Revd. R.	8	Proselytism	115
Kerry Church Attacked	26, 85
Kirk, Dr. C.	33, 130	R
Kenrick, Archbishop	45	Rome and Marriage	4, 13
Kensit, the late Mr. J. A.	46	R.C. Clergy and Politics	15
Kidnapping Alleged	86	Rome, Converts to	21, 135
Kilmore, Bishop of	87, 109	Rome and Anglican Orders	21
		R.C. Propaganda	63
L		Romanism and Anglicanism	69, 134
Lutheran Church	15	Reformation Festival	70
Leo XIII, Pope	22, 140	"Revolt Against Reason"	102
Luther Film	50, 58, 71	Rome and Unity	114
Luther, An Enquiry	102	"Religion of Protestants"	124
Lunn, Sir Arnold	102	Rosary, The	138
M		S
Martyrs, Protestant	3	Spanish Protestants	2, 39, 47, 76, 109, 122
Marriage & Rome	4, 13, 120	Sanday, Dr.	7
Mary, Legion of	6, 8	Story of a Priest	16, 112, 140
Moffatt, Dr. James	7	Salmon, Dr. G.	28, 41
Mitchell, Rev. Professor G.	41	Spain To-day	38, 131
Moravian Church	47	Salvation, Exclusive	43
Mass and Reformation	81	Sinai, Mount	48
de Mendicta, Rev. Fr.	108, 109	Schweitzer, Dr.	62
Marriage Age in Eire	110	Stritch, Cardinal	123
"My People Doth Not Consider"	126
Mission, The Irish	132	T
		Tanganyika	2
N		Trinity College, Dublin	9
Nash, Rev. R., S.J.	14	"Thou Art Peter"	43, 45
Nicene Creed	18	True Church, The	63
Nuclear Tests	62	Trinity, The Holy	66
New Reformation	96	Trinitarian Bible Society	85
"Ne Temere"	120	"Things Present and Things To Come"	130
"Nativity, The"	136
		U
O		U.S.A.	1, 13, 15, 70
O'Rahilly, Rev. Fr.	15, 37	University Scholarships	9
Outrage in Protestant Church	26, 49	"Uilenspiegel, Tyl"	25
Observances, Holy Week	56	Unity, Christian	49, 115, 133
Owen, Dr. John	63	Ulster, R.C. Schools in	121
Orders, Holy	122
"Opus Dei"	131	V
		Viet Nam	4
P		Vaughan, Bishop	6
Purgatory	11, 80	Virgin Mary, Blessed	76
Parnell, C. S.	12	Vatican	131
Politics, Irish	15
Protestants and Heresy	15	W
Priest, Story of a	16	"Walled Garden"	4
Profession of Faith, R.C.	19	Williamson, H. R.	4, 68
Protestants and Pressure	25	Wales, R.C. Church in	38
Protestant Progress	33, 59	Week, Holy	56
Peter and the Church	45	World's Population	61
Priesthood, Its Nature	57	Whitby Abbey	92
Protestants in Hungary	61	Weir, Late Rev. R. E.	118
Premillennarianism	63	Wolfenden Report	134

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

INDIA

One of India's most ancient languages in a new dress.

Just issued

The New Testament and Psalms in roman Tamil

Much of the illiteracy in India is owing to the complications of the native scripts. Without any change in the Spoken language the introduction of this easier type prepares the way for progress to literacy.

Published by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Contributions toward the cost of this production will be much appreciated.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

For interpretation see "Wylands" artist diagram. Enlarged photo-copies: 2/9; 3/9; small prints, 1/3.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR, LONDON, W.C.1

"Things Present and Things to Come"

*A small book on the Coming of Christ and
His Kingdom*

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND THREEPENCE

Post Free (Single Copy).

Copies from C. KIRK,

51 SALISBURY ROAD, EDINBURGH, 9.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

LEVEL
ONE

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 2—LXVII.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	13
The Russian Bible Society	14
The Editor's Chair	18
Infallibility	20
Fethard on Sea, Village of the Boycott, Recent News	21

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Church And Humanism

When he addressed the Catholic Association for International Relations in Ely Place, Dublin, the Rev. James Kavanagh, M.A., S.T.L., said that a great deal of modern philosophy denied the possibility of arriving at absolute truth; the Church's calm serenity and her championing of the power of the human reason annoyed a good many of these philosophers.

The paradox was that the Church was truly humanist—she tried to safeguard and uphold reverence for the mind and body of men, while those who labelled themselves "humanist" were so often trying to prove that men were something less than human.

—"Irish Times," 6/12/57.

[When we read the words "the Church . . . tried to safeguard and uphold reverence for the mind and body of men" our thoughts immediately turned to the problem of religious intolerance and persecution. In the days of the Holy Inquisition the Church condemned heretics and handed them to "the secular arm" for punishment, and they were then usually burnt to death. Such was the reverence that church had for men's bodies. The Holy Inquisition also employed torturers: were they taught to reverence men's bodies?

The Church's theologians still teach that the Church has the right to employ physical force upon heretics.

These are the real facts, not the misleading theories, and in Colombia, South America, today, decent godly people have suffered torture and death.]

* * *

Borstal For Youth Who Set Fire To Parish Church—Companion Bound Over.

"While I accept what the rector has stated—that there was no widespread animosity against his flock—there is one aspect I cannot overlook, and that is we are not the paragon of religious tolerance that we think we are."

Judge Barra O Briain, S.C., stated this in the Limerick Circuit yesterday when two youths, who pleaded guilty to setting fire to the Church of Ireland church in Bruree, Co. Limerick, on April 6th last, were put forward for sentence.

They are Michael Burke and Thomas Wallace, both of Ballynoe, Bruree. Last Tuesday, they had pleaded guilty to setting fire to the church and causing malicious damage to the extent of £35.

Wallace was sent to Borstal for two years, and Burke was given the benefit of the Probation Act, and was bound over in his own bond of £50 and two sureties of £50 each for two years.

Mr. William Binchy, barrister-at-law, for the State, said that Burke was the elder of the boys and was 18 years of age. He was a baker who had just completed his apprenticeship. He lived in a County Council cottage with his parents, and had never come under unfavourable notice by the guards previously. Wallace, who was nearly 17 years of age, resided with an aunt on a farm at Bruree.

Home For Trial

Superintendent J. Rabbite said that since the offence was committed, Burke had got employment in England, and had returned home to stand trial. His character and reputation were good. Wallace's house adjoined Burke's and all Wallace's family lived in England. Wallace went to England in 1954, but did not stay there very long. Witness understood that Wallace returned to his aunt's house, in Bruree, without his parents' consent. He thought that it was very hard for his aunt to control him. It was Wallace who had suggested the burning of the church.

The Rev. Hugh Guernsey, rector of Kilmallock and Bruree, said that he believed there was no malice in the burning of the church. He would like to plead with the judge to give both boys a chance. They were two young men starting out in life, and any decision given against them might change the entire course of their careers.

Having heard pleas for leniency by Mr. C. Kenny, barrister-at-law, on behalf of Wallace, and Mr. Maurice Fitzgerald, barrister-at-law, on behalf of Burke, the judge said that the two youth had tried to brazen the matter out by pleading not guilty to the charges when they were first brought to the court last October. They had also tried at that period to persuade the jury by pleading not guilty, suggesting on the evidence that the guards had taken an improper advantage of them.

"You should be thoroughly ashamed of yourselves," said the judge, addressing the youths. "What you did was utterly contemptible. Two young fellows like you proceed to attack and damage a church of a very small religious minority, living in a district and place where they could not look after themselves. If it was a different place, and they were in the majority, I would regard the offence as less serious. The idea was entirely contemptible. One aspect which I cannot overlook," continued the judge, "is that, accepting what the rector has said, there was no animosity against his flock, I have to have regard to the fact that in this State we are not the paragons of religious tolerance that we are said to be.

"Some Intolerance"

Incidents have occurred in various parts of the country which suggest that the case is quite the contrary. There is always the danger that people outside this country will very readily misconstrue and misrepresent such incidents, and consider that they are characteristic of the people and conditions here. It might be represented elsewhere that there was widespread religious intolerance. That is not so, but sometimes there is some intolerance. It is very significant that it was a Protestant church that was burned, and not a Catholic church."

"Chief Mover"

Giving his decision, Judge O Briain said that he was satisfied that Wallace was the chief mover of the two, and took a very prominent part in suggesting the burning of the church, which would seem to show that he was not of a very reputable character.

He would direct that he be sent to Borstal for two years, where he might learn some trade and undergo some sort of discipline. Burke had no previous conviction against his character, and he would apply the Probation Act and bind him over in his own bond of £50 and two sureties of £50 each to be of good behaviour for two years.

Mr. Kenny made a final plea to the judge to give Wallace a chance but he refused to do so.

A third defendant, jointly charged, named Patrick Sheehan, of 4 St. Munchin's Terrace, Bruree, was returned for trial to the next sitting of the Central Criminal Court in Dublin, when, on Tuesday, he pleaded not guilty.

—"Irish Times," 18/1/'58.

(Continued on p. 23.)

THE RUSSIAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

From 1812 to its suppression 1826.

Late in the year 1812 there arrived in Russia a Scotsman of the name of Paterson. He had been encouraged by Baron Nicolai the Russian Ambassador to Sweden to journey to Petersburg and examine for himself what opportunities existed for the formation of a Bible Society for the selling and distribution of the Scriptures.

Paterson arrived in Petersburg early in August (1812) and interviewed a few friends like minded with himself, but they counselled him to abandon his project till after the war

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—O—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

the times with the Napoleonic invasion being inauspicious. He then suggested journeying on to Moscow with the same intention, but they earnestly urged on him the risk he would be encountering and with Napoleon approaching the antient capital his mission would be a failure. However Paterson secured a passport and went, taking with him a servant and an interpreter. A few friends accompanied him as far as Novgorod, but as he continued travelling along the Moscow Road the difficulties and dangers of the journey increased. The roads were execrable, the post Houses without beds and very dirty, the Post boys disobliging and impertinent and for the merest trifle exorbitant prices were demanded.

Moscow on arrival he found half deserted, all who could leave had done so or were preparing to go. The exits of the city were jammed with an endless stream of carriages and carts, riders on horseback and pedestrians, shelterless nomads fleeing from the unhappy city.

Paterson reported to the Governor, Count Rostopchin who with Gen. Platoff the Hetman of the Cossacks were in attendance at a war council, but came out and spoke kindly and civil words to him. Later he took tea with Princess Metocharsky and her sister Princess Galitzin who were interested in his Mission but could only assure him that with Napoleon at the gates of Moscow anything in the way of forming Bible societies was out of the question.

Confusion reigned in the city. The streets were dangerous to walk, murder lurked at every corner, and hatred against foreigners was general consequent of Bonaparte's invasion. Rostopchin the Governor had had posters printed and distributed pamphlets assuring the populace that Napoleon would never be able to enter the city, that the Government had a secret weapon in the form of a balloon that would be ascending and drop destruction on the Grand Army, indeed that the Czar had commissioned him to have made a huge balloon that would carry 50 people wherever they wished, with or against the wind. The Governor walked about the city contacting with the merchants and assuring them that "he would answer with his life that the scoundrel will never enter Moscow." However the gates were to be closed on the 6th September, and Paterson wisely arranged to leave the previous day.

He had sufficient roubles for his return journey by observing a strict economy, but two young men he wished to take with him had to be left behind, their remittance not reaching them in time and coming later they lost all they had in the destruction of Moscow. Some friends accompanied him to the outskirts where all partook of a hurried meal, none knowing what was in store for those who remained or for those who were leaving. At Klinn where the road from Smolensk meets that from Petersburg and Moscow, Paterson ran into the crowd of refugees fleeing from the former city and the intervening towns and villages. Mixed in the general exodus were vehicles of every description, foot passengers, droves of oxen, sheep, and other domestic animals. In a closed carriage was the Archbishop of Smolensk with the Ikon of the Mother of God, said to have been painted by St. Luke and brought to Russia by Anne the daughter of Constantine the Great. The Archbishop had left the burning city of Smolensk with the retreating Russian Army in the twilight of August 18th and at the Battle of Borodeno the Ikon had been paraded before the Army for their encouragement. Passing on, Paterson met French prisoners, these surprised him by their lightheartedness, they being up to all sorts of fun and frolic.

The post boys were both lawless and rude and in their careless driving over the bad roads broke Paterson's carriage. However on the 13th of September he reached Petersburg, and after weighing matters in his mind he was satisfied that no good would result from remaining longer in Russia consequent of the war, so he obtained a passport for Sweden. Then his wife was stricken down with a fever that made it imperative for him to remain in Petersburg irrespective of the prevailing confusion. Unwilling to be idle he wrote out a circular calling on all who loved the Bible to form a Society for its distribution in Russia and forwarded it to a few influential men whose interest he was told was likely to be aroused, among these was Count Hablitz of the Moravian Brethren.

One day when standing on the steps of Sarepta House, the Headquarters of the Moravian Brethren, he overheard one of their number refer to Count Hablitz in such a way that convinced him the Count was the very man to help him. After being introduced to the Count he was invited to dine with him, and when a day had been fixed the Count asked a few friends to meet Paterson when the sacred cause of a Bible Society for the Foreign confessions in Russia was discussed. While all were agreed on the importance of this, none could say how it was to be formed.

Now it was usual for Count Hablitz to call on His Excellency, Count Kotschubey every week and tell him the gossip of the town, but on this occasion having nothing in particular to report, Hablitz casually informed him of Paterson's presence in Petersburg and the object that brought him to Russia. On hearing this His Excellency exclaimed "that is the very thing for Russia, send Mr. Patterson to me." Kotschubey had been Minister of the Interior under Paul and again under Alexander, but had resigned in 1807 after the Czar's treaty at Tilsit with Napoleon without losing the Imperial favour. He had once urged the Governor of Novgorod's claim to some recognition for signal service rendered, but Alexander declined stating that he would not honour a man that read the Bible.

Paterson when he called on Count Kotschubey was very kindly received and was asked how he intended to proceed with his plans to which the Scotsman answered that he wanted to gain over a few of the leading men who would form themselves into a provisional committee, "We dare not form ourselves into a provisional committee until the Emperor's sanction is obtained" was Kotschubey's reply.

Paterson: At any rate you can apply for such sanction.

Kotschubey: We dare not.

Paterson: Then what is to be done?

Kotschubey: You must do the whole thing yourself. You must go to the Emperor in your own name and in the name of the British Society and ask to be allowed to form a Society for the like purpose. The very fact of you being a stranger and a foreigner warrants you doing what we dare not do.

Paterson: What am I to say to the Emperor? I am a perfect stranger, the Emperor knows nothing about me and will not listen to me.

Kotschubey: But what you have said in your address. You may alter it a little in some places but you can say nothing better. You must have Rules and Regulations drawn up setting forth the constitution of the Society to present along with the address. I shall draw them up for you. But there is one thing connected with your plan of which I cannot approve, you do not propose to do anything for the Russians, but only for the members of Foreign Confessions; now I cannot see why you exclude the Russians.

Paterson: Were I to include the members of the Greek Church the plan would have to go before the Holy Synod who would most probably negative it.

On December 6th, 1812 the plan for the formation of a Petersburg Bible Society was presented to the Emperor by Prince Golitzin. The Czar having read it, and observing that Paterson had commenced a translation of the New Testament for the Kalmuks remarked, "I am grieved to think that although the Kalmuks are to have the Scriptures in their language nothing is proposed to be done for my poor Russians; but let us see how the present plan succeeds and if it is well received we can afterwards have them included in the scheme." He then gave his sanction.

When it came before the Senate the members were taken completely by surprise and were astounded. It was at once evident that the plan could not be confined to the Foreign Confessions but must include the members of the Russian Church. The Metropolitan of the Roman Catholic Church was one of those who entered warmly into the scheme and promised to support it to the utmost of his power; a promise he faithfully kept. One senator only showed an unfriendly spirit and made an angry remark to Hablitz saying "What new thing is this?" Hablitz retorted "This is nothing to wonder at, wait a little and you will see something more wonderful still." The Imperial Ukase was made public January 2nd, 1813.

Saturday, January 11th, 1813, was the date of the inaugural meeting of the Society that met in Prince Golitzin's Hotel at 11 a'clock in the morning to which invitations had been sent to members of the Greek Church. Gathered there were leading men of the Russian Empire in full dress with the Stars of their Orders glittering on their breasts, nearly all were Ministers of State, together with the principal members of the Holy Synod headed by the Metropolitan of Petersburg and Novgorod, the Roman Catholic Metropolitan, and representatives of the Foreign Confessions resident in Russia. After the Imperial Ukase and rules had been read the Society was declared formed, Prince Galitzin was elected President and took the Chair and Count Kotschubey who had done so much for the creation of the Society was requested to become the first Vice-President. The Czar was asked to be the patron but declined on the plea that he had no claim, but he wished to be enrolled as a member of the Society.

Later a dejeuner was given in Prince Golitzin's magnificent Drawing Room, after which subscriptions were invited. The Emperor gave 25,000 Roubles and became an annual subscriber of 10,000. No less a sum than 16,000 roubles was subscribed at the dejeuner, the Prince heading the list with 1,000 roubles. Subscriptions now poured in from all quarters. The Russian Clergy enquired why their Church was not included in the scheme. The venerable Metropolitan Ambrosius went to Paterson and said, "Sir, you may think that you came to Russia in a very unpropitious time, but I assure you that you came at the right time. We have a proverb that when the thunder rolls the peasant crosses himself. Well! the thunder has been rolling over Russia and it has softened all hearts, and led us to reflect and now you reap the fruit of these troublous times." A resolution was passed "that every family and if possible every individual should be provided with a Bible, that invaluable gift of Heaven."

The Russian Clergy now vied with one another as to who could promote the objects of the Bible Society the most efficiently, nor were the Roman Catholic priests less active in the worthy cause, excepting the Jesuits who declined to assist on the ground that their Church did not allow the use of the Scriptures to the laity.

The Holy Synod being the only authority allowed to publish the Bible the Society secured their stocks at Moscow and Kieff. The sacred Book had been printed in 5 and 6 Vols. and sold at 30 roubles consequently the purchasers were largely confined to the opulent and the Synod's output was not more than 400 Bibles in a year. But such had been the demand created by the formation of the Bible Society that the shops that stocked them were now besieged by customers who willingly paid the price and cleared the stocks; those unable to complete their purchase left their passports as security for the balance. By the close of 1813 the calls on the Society for the Scriptures was so great that the presses of the Synod could not maintain the supply, the committee therefore through their President obtained permission to print their own Books. This they did by stereotype and were able to put on the market and sell at a small profit a Bible at 6 roubles that was better printed, in superior paper and in clearer type and with a superior binding, the result being that the Sales were often 400 a week instead of that number being the annual output.

Early in 1816, on the return of Alexander from Paris, where for months he had been in a state of religious exultation, he ordered the Holy Synod to translate the New Testament into modern Russ from the Greek. To this Ambrosius the Metropolitan of Petersburg and Novgorod together with some of the backward clergy objected. The Metropolitan Am-brosius who was now old and infirm was requested to retire to a Monastery, and Michael, a learned and truly pious evangelical became Metropolitan in his place.

When the annual report of the Russian Bible Society for the year 1816 was published, the Emperor expressed disappointment that not more progress had been made. "That it was with the greatest concern that they had failed to carry out and fully meet the urgent demands for the Holy Scriptures especially in the Slavonic" and requests the Society "to take the matter immediately under consideration to meet this demand and that if money or men were required he would see that they were supplied." The Committee were pleased to note the zeal of the Emperor for the spreading of the word of God throughout his dominion and immediately increased their stereotype presses from 6 to 16 and after a further two years were able to introduce machine printing which enabled them to furnish 200,000 copies of the Scriptures in Slavonic in a year, and by 1819 no less than 100,000 roubles worth of Bibles were being sent to every province in Russia. To Tiflis in Georgia 20 cartloads were sent in 3 days.

To do this everything had to be remodelled. The type that had been in use was abominable, so fresh type had to be cut and matrices to be procured from abroad. Lead and antimony were imported from England and Archimandrite Philaret undertook to superintend the cutting of the new type and by these means the Slavonic character of the letters was modernised.

Up to that time the Committee had rented a large warehouse in the Market Place in Petersburg where they stored the paper and stocks of printed matter; but it now became imperative to secure larger and more compact premises and making their requirements known through the Society's President to the Emperor, he gave them a house in the midst of the Imperial gardens worth more than 100,000 roubles which with a few alterations and additions gave accommodation for printing and storage rooms for offices as well as living space.

By 1819 the Gospels in modern Russian were printed, a few were handsomely bound and one specially so was presented by the President of the Bible Society to the Emperor, copies of which were also sent to the leading members of the Imperial Family.

It was not till 1856 that the complete Bible with all the Books was printed in modern Russ.

H. C. HILL.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the Manager Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE PRAISE OF GOD.

A glance at Cruden's Concordance will show that the word "praise" (as a substantive) is found about sixty times in the Old Testament and about seventeen times in the New. The word as a verb occurs about a hundred and twenty-four times in the Old Testament and six in the New. Variants of the word are found about fifty-four times in the Old and about eight times in the New—a rough total of two-hundred and seventy references.

Of these as a total almost a hundred and forty are from the Psalms. Seeing that the Psalms are a hymnbook expressing the worship of Israel over many generations this is what we would expect.

Comparing the length of the Old Testament with the length of the New (the Bible before us is the Brevier 16 mo., in verses with references, Revised Version) we estimate that "praise" is referred to twice as often in the New Testament as in the Old. We think this is just what ought to be anticipated. However exuberant the spiritual joys of the Psalter, they have less developed and experienced quality than the joys of the New Testament. The Old Testament worshippers might look forward eagerly to the expected Messiah and to the future Kingdom, but their anticipation was of necessity limited and indeed conjectural. The worshipper in the New Testament age can meditate upon the realised Messiah, and can rejoice in Redemption perfect, and eternal life secured. Praise, for the Christian, is lifted up to a height Israel never knew.

A closer count may be made in Strong's Concordance which is more detailed than the usual editions of Cruden. From it the number of occurrences may be increased, but the conclusion will still be that praise of God in the New Testament is on a richer nobler scale. than in the Old. The theme is far more glorious. We do not abstract from the glory and praise of Jehovah when we come to the clear light and true knowledge of Jehovah as the Triune God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

The English word "praise" is used to translate several Hebrew words—one suggests the outward gesture—the stretching out of the hands in worship. Another implies merry-making as a sort of thanksgiving to God; another a hymn, another an act of adoration; another a celebration; another the instrumental accompaniment of praise (for God's people in Old Testament times employed musicians and their instruments), another the sort of praise which is loud and strong. Perhaps among the Greek words of the New Testament there is less difference in shades of meaning; and it is well-known that the Greek of Holy Scripture was not precise academic Greek, but the popular speech.

Praise, generally, is marked by recognition of the Creator-creature relationship; by thankfulness for earthly and spiritual gifts and blessings; by gratitude for singular privileges; by that refined emotion which is best expressed by the exhortation "Lift up your hearts," and the response "We lift them up unto the Lord." This undoubtedly is in the holy tradition of Old Testament praise.

Praise is naturally transformed by knowledge of the Gospel. If in the Old Testament praise is at times national, in the New Testament it is individual. The Israelite might praise Jehovah for blessings on his nation "the chosen people," distinguished by race, tradition, faith, and covenant from the rest of the world. But the Christian in the first days was only "a stranger and sojourner." His citizenship was in heaven, and his praise was very much the outpouring of his personal faith, thanksgiving, and fellowship with God who in Christ had redeemed him as a person. The Christian's praise is therefore personal, rational, grateful, and humbly aware of the immeasurable debt to the love and grace of God.

* * *

Praise is something God expects from us. This does not mean that we are to think of God as enjoying our praise merely as a tribute to Himself. Such a view of God is scarcely in harmony with His nature. It suggests the Oriental idea of Kingship rather than the austere and holy and loving nature of "the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ." God expects praise from us because it is evidence of the divine life in us, and of the sense of sonship. To ignore or to forget God would be a denial of our own true nature. It would be a rejection of the best instincts we have. If they are the best, then they are the truest. The world to-day may take a view of man which is materialistic: if so, it is a view which is injurious to our best interests. The following words of Blaise Pascal, a man of the highest spiritual and intellectual attainment, are relevant—

"It is dangerous to prove to man too plainly how nearly he is on a level with the brute creation, without also showing him his greatness. It is also dangerous to show him his greatness apart from his vileness. Still more dangerous is it to leave him in ignorance of both."

The praise of God is man's affirmation to himself that he is a spiritual being. No wonder then that God's Word abounds in directions to offer praise.

"Ye that fear the Lord, praise Him"—Why? Because He has been compassionate, and is a God who answers prayer—Ps. 22, v. 23.

"Let the peoples praise Thee"—Why? Because earth is fertile; because God will judge it with equity; because He is governor; because He is our own God. Ps. 67.

"Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord." What is needed is a universal song for all creation. Not only man but every sentient being, should praise Him. It may be that God's creatures by ways unknown to us, praise Him. Perhaps their obedience to the laws of their nature might set us an example of obedience to our creator. But we may advance even further, for Joseph Addison has left us a remarkable hymn based on Ps. 19. "The spacious firmament on high." In this hymn Addison develops the Psalmist's theme that "the heavens declare the glory of God." Readers will recall the lines—

"In reason's ear they all rejoice,
"And utter forth a glorious voice;
"For ever singing as they shine,
"The hand that made us is Divine'."

* * *

Turning from the songs of creation to the song of redeemed men, we note the call of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who speaks of Christ and says "Through Him let us offer up the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of lips which make confession to His name." The avowal of God as our God is the sacrifice of praise, and it cannot be done rightly without taking account of the words of St. Paul in 2 Timothy 2—"Let everyone that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness."

* * *

"Whoso offereth praise glorifieth Me." The Psalmist (50, v. 23) sees that the praise of God enlarges and exalts our thought of God. Where there is a lack of praise man's thought of God must shrink to unimportance. Where there is a deliberate purpose allied with a degree of spontaneity God is honoured, and we are uplifted. Needless to say, the more enlightened and reasonable our faith, the more spiritual our thought of God will be. We can therefore say that the more scriptural our faith, the better our worship will be. Our Lord emphasised the highest requirement when He told us that the true worshipper will worship "in spirit and in truth." "The God of holiness is enthroned upon the praises of Israel" (Ps. 22, 3). In this wonderful phrase we mark our kinship with God. He is not far from us, for "in Him we live and move and have our being," and He is in our worship as well as being its object.

* * *

If we have emphasised the relationship of God to the worshipper, and indicated some of the reasons for praise, we turn now to a further discussion of the grounds upon which we ought to praise God.

We praise Him for being Himself. "I will praise Thy Name, O Lord, for it is good" (Ps. 54 v. 6).

We praise Him for His power (Ps. 21 v. 13). His power is effectively described by David (1 Chron. 29. v. 10-13).

"Blessed be Thou, O Lord, the God of Israel our father, for ever and ever.

"Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty; for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is Thine; Thine is the Kingdom, O Lord, and Thou art exalted as Head over all.

"Both riches and honour come of Thee, and Thou rulest over all; and in Thine hand is power and might; and in Thine hand it is to make great and to give strength unto all.

"Now therefore our God, we thank Thee and praise Thy glorious name."

These are words to meditate upon. We do not need to be Davids to study these verses and profit by them. We can praise God for giving strength to all His people according to their need.

* * *

How wise and salutary is this—"I will praise the Lord according to His righteousness" (Ps. 7, v. 17). That is a submission to His righteousness, not to our own. We may praise Him for "His mighty acts" (Ps. 150, v. 2), but we shall recall "all the righteous acts of the Lord" as well. They are still being experienced by His people as they were in the days of deliverance from Egypt.

"Because Thy loving kindness is better than life, my lips shall praise Thee" (Ps. 63, v. 3). What depth of spiritual experience led the Psalmist to this conviction! To realise the loving kindness of God in a world such as this in the mid-twentieth century is not easy for everyone. But if we are "in Christ" then there can be no doubt about it. If we will not "taste and see how gracious the Lord is" we shall scarcely believe it now on hearsay.

"Praise the Lord for He is good, for His mercy endureth for ever" (Ps. 106). That refrain, "His mercy endureth for ever," is memorable, for it involves our final perseverance. We do not suggest that the Psalmist himself had any very clear ideas about eternity. But that does not prevent his words having greater significance than he realised. Christians must bring to the study of the Old Testament their Christian understanding of God's revelation. We may examine and define the religious beliefs of Israel at various stages of its history. It is required by scholarship and good sense. But if the Israelites had only a dim perception and inadequate appreciation of the truths committed to their charge (Rom. 3, v. 2; 9, v. 4, 5), we have no right to say that we shall have nothing but a dim and inadequate appreciation. We must read the Bible as Christians, not as Jews of the time of the exile or restoration. Reading it thus, the thought that God's mercy "endureth for ever," is a mark of His faithfulness, and of the full salvation we have in Christ.

* * *

We have touched but the fringe of the subject of Praise, but we hope we have stimulated our readers to pursue the matter further. What is really to the point is that our hearts and lives should be full of the praise of God: that our daily round should be an act of worship: that prayer and thanksgiving should sweeten and lighten the common task: that all should be "to the praise of His grace."

INFALLIBILITY.

We have lately read a Roman Catholic essay on this subject and will endeavour to set down our thoughts about the essay.

The writer began by dividing the subject into two parts—

1. The existence of an infallible authority on earth.
2. The appointed organ of this infallibility—the Pope.

The first of these parts is introduced by the claim "the existence of an infallible authority on earth follows from admitting that there is any authority permanently commissioned by God to teach in His Name; and this seems necessarily to follow from admitting a "Revelation."

Here we have three steps—

- a. Revelation.
- b. A permanent authority to teach in God's name, i.e. to expound "Revelation."
- c. Such an authority must be infallible.

We do not deny the first, if by "Revelation" is meant Holy Scripture. Every non-Roman Catholic accepts it as God's Word. We do deny it if it is meant to include as equally instructive ecclesiastical tradition.

* * *

In regard to the second we accept the tradition of interpretation which has been the common property of Christians since the beginning. That interpretation is in the Creeds acknowledged by all orthodox churches. The fact that a large portion of Christendom does not recognise the Papacy has no bearing on the question for the truths of the Christian faith were well-known and accepted by Christians centuries before there was a great assumption of doctrinal authority on the part of the See of Rome. The teaching office of the Church existed wherever there was organised Christian faith, and no Christian evangelist could preach this faith without declaring what the faith is, and thus teaching it. Therefore in a very true sense "the permanent teaching authority" is implicit in the evangelistic activity of Christians.

The gradual co-ordination of the truths preached and the refutation of errors by general councils serve to show how the evangelistic office and the teaching office united. The councils which rendered the most necessary services to Christian truth were all Eastern, and their language was Greek, not Latin. No real and true general council was held in the West.

Further, it is to be understood that the New Testament itself is a permanent teaching authority, and the only teaching authority among Christians which has the seal of God upon it. The living voice which spoke the message of which the New Testament is the inspired interpretation was the voice of Our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom God the Father said "This is My Beloved Son, hear Him."

It can also be shown that the exposition of Holy Scripture in early centuries was largely the work of individual writers. For instance, St. Augustine made an immense contribution to Christian interpretation. His expositions over-ruled all others so that his doctrines dominated the church for centuries. Obviously the individual, not the Church, took the lead here.

Nearly a thousand years after Augustine, St. Thomas Aquinas had a great measure of success in imposing his theological views upon Western Christianity. As centuries passed there was a tendency to overlook him, till in the second half of the nineteenth century Pope Leo XIII revived his fame and directed that his theology should be the standard theology of the colleges. The present situation appears to be that Roman Catholic theology is Thomist rather than that Thomas's theology is Roman Catholic! We may not have put this point very clearly, but it seems plain that "the permanent authority" is far from being the sort of thing the words suggest. A "permanent authority" ought to mean a bureau or council or institute charged to expound truth on behalf of the Church. In fact, such truths, or better, such doctrines and expositions as are popular and accepted widely, come from individuals.

What a world of difference there is between the history of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity and the history of the doctrine of the Bodily Assumption of the Blessed Virgin into Heaven. The first is plain inference from Holy Scripture: the second has neither Holy Scripture nor ancient tradition in its favour. It has been worked up in comparatively recent centuries, and voices the will, not of the permanent authority, but of large masses of members of the Roman Catholic faith. Popular wishes were definitely emphasised seven years ago when the Pope enunciated the new dogma.

* * *

On the third point: that such an authority must be infallible, it seems to us that this is incapable of proof, and that in fact it is capable of disproof. Take the title of a chapter in Dr. Salmon's well-known book in "The Infallibility of the Church"—"The blunders of the infallible guide." That speaks volumes, rather than a single chapter. It may be possible to write of "the blunders of Dr. Salmon," but Dr. Salmon made no claim to infallibility. He was indeed remarkably accurate because he used his trained intelligence. He could show more than one error in "the infallible authority," and one error is enough to disprove the claim. The Council which cried "Anathema to Pope Honorius" was not much concerned with the Pope's infallibility. It took theologians a thousand years to decide that there were seven sacraments, no more, no less. What of all the notions which circulated about the question during several centuries? It took the infallible authority a long time before it gave an exposition which, when given, seems more concerned with the mystic number 'seven' than with the facts.

* * *

In face of these considerations we need not attach much importance to the often repeated argument that as the Roman Catholic Church is the only church to make the claim that it is infallible, it must be infallible. Such pieces of abstract logic do not convince us. We want facts, and when we get facts they point in another direction.

It is true that among non-Roman Catholic Christians there is divergence of interpretations of many things. But there has always been divergence of opinions in the Roman Catholic faith; and these have lasted centuries until Rome has decided what view to crystallise into a dogma. To-day it may be impressive enough to point to the great structure of dogma, but what of the people who lived in the centuries when there were divergent and indeed contradictory opinions? Further, if a matter is uncertain why make a dogma by coming down on one side or another? Could not many dogmas have been allowed to remain open questions? No one will forfeit Heaven by being unable to believe in the Immaculate Conception or in Transubstantiation.

In short, we do not believe the world was spiritually in a bad way before the dogmatic definitions of the nineteenth century, and we do not believe that these definitions have fostered a better spirit among men, or made the way of reconciliation with God a more frequented one.

FETHARD ON SEA, VILLAGE OF THE BOYCOTT, RECENT NEWS.

It was learned yesterday that Mrs. Sheila Cloney, the Protestant wife of Mr. Sean Cloney, of Dungulph Castle, Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford—who is a Roman Catholic—has returned to her home with their two children.

The disappearance of Mrs. Cloney and the children last May led to a boycott of Protestants in the tiny village by their Catholic neighbours.

The Catholics held that Protestants had helped Mrs. Cloney, financially and otherwise, to go away with the children. Although this was strenuously denied, Protestant shops were boycotted, the Catholic teacher at the local Protestant national school gave up her job and the Catholic bell-ringer and cleaner at the Protestant Parish church also gave up her job.

The boycott caused considerable controversy throughout Ireland and was condemned among others, by the Taoiseach, Mr. de Valera. A "truce" was declared last August on the understanding that Mrs. Cloney's relatives would do everything in their power to induce her to return home.

In The North?

Although it is not confirmed, it is understood that Mrs. Cloney spent part of last year in Northern Ireland and the remaining portion in England.

An "Irish Times" reporter writes:

Mrs. Cloney arrived home on New Year's Day. In the kitchen of their home last night both Mr. and Mrs. Cloney declined to make any statement, and they brushed aside reporters' questions with a smile or a "no comment." They also declined to be photographed and their two children played in the kitchen while they faced the reporters.

I asked Mrs. Cloney had she read in any newspapers while she was away about the furore which had taken place in Fethard-on-Sea and in Ireland generally. She replied, "I have heard about it since I came back. It was not my fault."

She was then asked if she was in Ireland or if she was out of the country, but she just laughed and declined to answer.

Asked if she had told her husband in advance that she was coming home or if she had informed anybody in Fethard-on-Sea, she said she had no comment to make on that question.

When Mr. Cloney was asked by photographers if he and his family would pose for a photograph, he declined. He said that he had personal reasons for not wishing to do so. These personal reasons applied also to his refusal to make any comments. "We have learnt quite a bit about people," he said.

Asked if Mrs. Cloney was back for good, he again said he would make no comment. "All we want to do is live in peace," he added. He was then asked about his intentions in the future and if he would remain in Fethard-on-Sea or move elsewhere, as emigration had been mentioned.

"No Comment"

He said that he did not want to comment either on the past or on the future. Mrs. Cloney also declined to comment when she was asked where she had spent Christmas.

The Fethard-on-Sea boycott began on May 13th last, when the local Catholics announced their intention of staying away from village shops owned by Protestants. Its cause was the disappearance of Mrs. Cloney and her two children.

The event first came to general public notice when Mr. Cloney was granted a writ of habeas corpus in the Northern Ireland High Court for the production of his two children. His wife's whereabouts were not located, but it was alleged that she had gone to Belfast.

On May 15th, the boycott in the village extended to the Church of Ireland school. The teacher was advised by local people to give up her job, and she sent a report to the Department of Education giving her reason for the closure as "a boycott in the area."

Help Alleged

The Catholics in the village justified their action by the allegation that Mrs. Cloney left with the financial assistance of local Protestants, but these assertions were strongly denied by the Protestants.

The boycott continued throughout the summer, and it gave rise to controversy and discussion in the Oireachtas and in the Northern Parliament. There were also pronouncements by Catholic and Protestant Churchmen.

In the Senate the absence of a teacher in the Fethard school was raised by Dr. Owen Sheehy Skeffington early in June, while towards the end of that month the boycott was mentioned at Stormont, where it was ruled that the matter was outside the purview of the House. A Unionist member suggested that the people affected should be given refuge in the North. Later Lord Brookeborough referred to it. He mentioned that a Catholic bishop had given his blessing to the boycott as a peaceful and moderate protest.

Taoiseach's Reply

Early in July, the Taoiseach, Mr. de Valera, when questioned in the Dail said that he regarded the boycott in Fethard as "ill-conceived, ill-considered and futile for the achievement of the purpose for which it seemed to have been intended." He made an appeal to all people who had regard for the fair name, good repute and well-being of the nation to use their influence to bring "this deplorable affair" to a speedy end.

When the Labour deputy from Wexford, Mr. Corish, asked Mr. de Valera if he would try to ensure that people would not conspire in this part of the country to kidnap Catholic children, Mr. de Valera remarked: "I do not think I should add to the considered statement I have made. I am not accepting the statement by the deputy."

Appeals for the ending of the boycott also came from many prominent individuals, including Northern Catholics.

Joint Meeting

In August a meeting of representative Catholics and members of the Church of Ireland was held in Dublin. A statement after the meeting was signed by Mrs. Cloney's father, Mr. Thomas Kelly and Mr. J. J. Kennedy, chairman of the Wexford County Council.

The statement said that an undertaking was given by Mrs. Cloney's father to do everything possible to ascertain the whereabouts of the children with the intention of their restoration to their home.

On behalf of the Catholics, Mr. Kennedy accepted the undertaking. This statement provided the path back to normal life in the village, and it was stated last night: "Things were slowly getting back to normal."

The Rev. Adrian Fisher, rector of Fethard Union, said yesterday that he was very happy that Mrs. Cloney and the children had come back home, and that a family reconciliation had taken place.

"Irish Times," 10/1/'58.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 14.

Evangelicals Are Divided On Vestments Canon.

The Vicar of Islington (the Rev. Maurice Wood), in his presidential address at the Islington Conference on Monday, made it clear beyond all doubt that, despite calls for moderation by some who share his theological position, opposition to the canon will be carried through even to Parliament.

There was a campaigning fervour about the 124th Islington Conference—a return to the Militancy that marked its history when the opposition to the New Prayer Book was in vogue.

The lay interest in Islington, although this year's conference was held in All Souls', Langham-place, is increasing, and the galleries of the church were filled by listeners to the papers, who were predominantly young.

Looking down, too, on the five hundred or so clergymen in the pews, the grey-heads are fewer. It is not without pride that Evangelicals are pointing to the number of young men entering their ranks. And twenty-two of the thirty-nine ordinands in St. Paul's at Advent were said to be of their school of thought.

The general atmosphere of the Islington Conference alters little with the passage of years—it still has three collections; prayers compiled by the Right Rev. Handley Moule, a Victorian Bishop of Durham, are still said; and the singing is as boisterous as ever.

Fundamentalism

Mr. Wood, at the beginning of his address, spoke of the extraordinary misconceptions which were prevalent about present-day Evangelical doctrine and practice.

"Let us humbly, but boldly, repudiate this unpleasant word 'fundamentalism,' which is being increasingly equated with Evangelicalism by those who do not like the tremendous growth of Evangelicalism in the universities, schools and parish churches of our land, with a corresponding growth in Evangelical ordination candidates and clergy."

The main burden of Mr. Wood's address not unnaturally concerned the controversial Canon XVII (Of the Vesture of the Ministers). Claiming that it was right to try and outline the reasons for continued opposition to legalizing eucharistic vestments, he said that there were three possible attitudes for proctors in Convocation who were not happy about this canon to take.

"Some feel that vestments have been worn for a long time, and so it is only common kindness to clergy who like that sort of thing to let them—even if the Privy Council in 1871, the Royal Commission in 1906, and the legal advisers to-day to the Steering Committee of Convocation say that they are against the law of the land, and although vestments are usually symptomatic of other High Church practices.

"Despite this, some feel they can allow the canon to go through, so long as the clause which will de-doctrinate vestments of any doctrines not now found in the formularies of the Church of England is passed. I respect the many Central and Evangelical proctors who hold this view. This clause is indeed a vital safeguard, but it may well lead to a very much interpretative argument.

"Others feel that they should oppose in Convocation the clause permitting vestments, but that, if it is passed, they ought to go no further in opposition.

Harmful To Unity

"The third course is to oppose the legalization of vestments through every step of the way from Convocation, via the Church Assembly and through to Parliament; and, after much prayer and consultation, I and a number of other Evangelical proctors feel that we ought to take this course, after carefully weighing the possible consequences."

In examining the grounds for opposition, the Vicar of Islington dealt briefly with the familiar historical and doctrinal grounds. He contended that, in the conversations held by the Church of England with the Church of Scotland and the Methodists, the legalizing of vestments would draw Anglicans and Nonconformists further apart.

"What will this canon do for the peace of the Church? If we oppose it, that may hurt the peace of the Church; but if we do not oppose it, and it is passed, it will still hurt the peace of the Church, because of the hurt to Evangelical and Protestant sympathies, not only within the Church but throughout the religious life of the nation.

Fifty Protests

"Apart from the immense sense of distress within the rank and file of the clergy and laity of the Church, over fifty Anglican, interdenominational and Free Church religious societies have sent formal protests to the Archbishop of Canterbury about this and other canons. The opposition is deep and wide and real throughout the country."

Mr. Wood warned Evangelicals to walk humbly and courteously in all they did, yet remembering that the truth of the Church was equally as important to maintain as the peace of the Church. He added that many felt the canon to be a retrograde step, which could open the flood-gates to further changes that could alter the balance of truth enshrined not only in the formularies of the Church, but also in its life to-day.

"If vestments mean nothing doctrinally, why allow them?" he asked. "If vestments are necessary to teach doctrine, what do they teach which is not already taught by the present order of Holy Communion in the Prayer Book, and the usual dress of the minister? Why then are vestments so important as to cause so much division in the Church?"

"Those who have introduced them, and now desire to legalize them, must share with those of us who oppose the legalization the responsibility for this controversy, distasteful as it is to all concerned. For none of us enjoys controversy, and spending time on matters which take us away from our regular pastoral and evangelical duties."

"Church Times," 17/1/'58.

* * *

Drama At Dublin Festival And Ecclesiastical Opinion—Dublin Festival Keeps Plays.

The Dublin Tostal Council has announced that no change is contemplated in the programme already announced for the Dublin Theatre Festival in May. The council had been made aware earlier in the week that the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, the Most Rev. Dr. McQuaid, disapproved of the two plays so far announced—an adaptation of James Joyce's "Ulysses" and a new play by Sean O'Casey, "The Drums of Father Ned."

It is understood that the council originally approached the Archbishop to ask him to allow a votive mass to be celebrated on the opening Sunday of the Tostal spring festival, as in previous years. The Archbishop asked the council to let one of his clergy read the plays. According to one report—and it must be understood that all reports of the matter are based on hearsay and are difficult to check—the censor found nothing objectionable in the plays. Nevertheless, the council was informed a day or two later that the Archbishop did not propose to permit a special mass.

Some members of the council immediately suggested that the two plays (the only items arranged so far) should be dropped, but at its meeting on Thursday night the council decided against this. It must be aware, however, that the incident will arouse opposition to the festival in a section of the public, and will not encourage the business houses to which it looks for financial support.

The adaptation of "Ulysses" has been made by the Belfast actor Alan McClelland. "Ulysses" is not, as is widely believed, among the books banned by the censorship board, and there is some reason to believe that it is rather the O'Casey play to which the Archbishop may object. According to the author, "The Drums of Father Ned" is a comedy about a festival in an Irish village, and is quite free from the vehement anti-clericalism that marked "The Bishop's Bonfire." In fact, it may be that Dr. McQuaid objects less to the play than to its author: a few days before news of the conflict became public O'Casey attacked the Church in a letter to the "Irish Times."

—"Manchester Guardian," 11/1/'58.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the
Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH

*"If I take the wings of the morning,
and dwell in the uttermost parts of the
sea. Even there shall Thy hand lead me."*

Just published:

Selections from the Scriptures in Arë-
Arë for the Arë-Arë, Koio, and Dorio
peoples.

This little book of 193 pages contains selected chapters and portions from the Old and New Testaments in the language of people of the Solomon Islands. It is the first issue of the Scriptures in these dialects. The Solomon Islands are off the N.E. coast of Australia.

Produced by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 3—LXVII

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,
5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of auto-
biography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	25
St. Patrick	28
Editor's Chair	30
Irish Presbyterian Ministers and Rome	32
The Story of a Priest	34

Moscow On Dead Sea Scrolls—Christianity
"Mythical."

Moscow, January 8.

The official organ of the Russian Young Communist League, "Komsomolskaya Pravda," in the first Russian comment on the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, said to-day that they offered "conclusive proof" of "the mythical character of Moses and Jesus."

The newspaper says the scrolls were written in the first and second centuries before Christ and enabled scholars to conclude "that the image of the 'Divine Messenger' existed among the Essenes long before the New Testament writes of the birth of the mythical Christ. The principal traits of Jesus were, consequently, developed before the appearance of Christianity."

Describing the New Testament as a "new variant on old fables," the paper said:

"The so-called Holy Scriptures are of earthly, not divine origin. These books were not written by a mythical Moses under divine inspiration, nor by Christ's apostles under the dictation of their teacher. They were written on tablets or scrolls, and re-written and elaborated by the commonest people.

"The Dead Sea Scrolls have back-dated the Bible by no less than 1,000 years. This explains the list of contradictions and absurdities contained in the Holy Writ. These contradictions are so numerous that they evoked smiles from educated people, even in the Middle Ages.

"Religion has lost all foundation in our country, where only unpleasant memories remain of the exploiting classes. However, some part of our people retains faith in the holiness of the Bible. The new scientific discoveries have dealt a crushing blow to these backward views."—British United Press.

—"Manchester Guardian," 10/1/'58

* * *

The Gospel In The Belgian Congo.

It is less than eighty years since a handful of Protestant missionaries landed at the mouth of the River Congo in the first attempt to open up that vast region to the Gospel. To-day, it is estimated that the Christian message has reached more than half the population of the country's twelve million. It has done so through the various agencies—preaching, medical work, schools and in more recent times through literature, although there is a great lack of the latter in some of the native languages. Congolese Christians are taking an increasing part in missionary administration. At the last annual session of the Protestant Council of the Congo, no fewer than sixteen

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Church Membership In United States.

According to the "Yearbook of American Churches," just published, church membership in the United States has reached an all-time record. The 1956 total is 103,224,954, a gain of slightly more than three million over the previous year. This means that 62 out of every 100 Americans profess membership of some place of worship. These figures, of course, include all religions, there are, for instance, 5,500,000 Jews, 63,000 Buddhists and 20,000 Moslems. Of the Christian bodies, over 60,000,000 are Protestant, 34,563,000 are Roman Catholic, and 2,598,000 Eastern Orthodox. Thirty years ago 27 per cent. of the population was listed as having Protestant church membership. To-day, the figure is 35.9 per cent. Roman Catholics, who were 16 per cent. a generation ago, to-day represent 20.7 per cent. To appreciate the increase in church attendance in the United States, one needs to recall that a hundred years ago only 20 out of every 100 persons were church members. There are critics who seek to discount the figures by saying that church-going has once again become fashionable in the United States. What if it has? Is that not better than the fashion of not going to church, which is so largely true of Britain to-day?—1957.

native delegates participated with white delegates, having equal standing with them. Referring again to literature, a large Protestant illustrated review will soon appear in three languages, Kikongo, Lingala and Tschiluba.

—“The Christian.”

* * *

Festival Play Objection—Joyce Adaptation.

By A Sunday Times Representative

Dublin, Saturday.

Dublin's second International Theatre Festival, due to begin on May 11, almost came a cropper this week when the Dublin Tostal Council, which supports and promotes it, disagreed on whether or not to allow two plays to be included in its programme.

The two pieces, the only plays firmly booked for the festival so far, are a dramatisation of James Joyce's “Ulysses” and a new work by Sean O'Casey, “The Drums of Father Ned,” a play about organising a festival in an Irish country town. The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. McQuaid, was not prepared to allow the festival to be opened with a special mass because of the inclusion of these two plays. After it had been pointed out that the Joyce adaptation has aroused great interest in the United States, it was decided that the plays should go on.

Negotiations are going on between the festival director, Mr. Brendon Smith, and a number of British and Continental companies for other productions.

Last year, a festival play ran into trouble when the producer of “The Rose Tattoo,” by Tennessee Williams was charged with producing an indecent and obscene entertainment.

“Sunday Times,” 12/1/58.

* * *

Warnings Against Mixed Marriages in Germany.

Bielefeld, Germany—Roman Catholic and Protestant leaders in West Germany have issued warnings on successive Sundays about the dangers of mixed marriages between Protestants and Roman Catholics.

A pastoral letter from the Roman Catholic bishops read in all churches on January 12 was addressed mainly to unmarried Roman Catholics and to parents. It said that a “deep religious cleavage” runs through most mixed marriages and that statistics showed the marriages were inclined to be unstable.

The letter claimed that 50 per cent. of children of such unions were “lost to the church,” and the leakage was even more serious in the next generation.

Fellowship Menaced

A statement from the synod of the Evangelical Church in the Rhineland was read in the parishes of that church on January 19, urging church members not to be persuaded into marrying Roman Catholics. Calling certain features of Roman Catholic ecclesiastical law “contrary to the Gospel,” the statement said these ordinances menaced the fellowship which God intended to exist in marriage.

Since World War II the number of mixed marriages in West Germany has increased, partly because of an influx of Protestant refugees from East Germany into Catholic areas. In some places 50 per cent. of recent marriages are mixed.—(E.P.S., Geneva).

—“English Churchman,” 7/2/58.

* * *

Spanish Protestants' Marriage Difficulties.

Hopes that the Spanish Government decree of 1956 enabling Spanish couples who were non-Roman Catholics to contract a civil marriage, would remove all obstacles for Protestants, have not been fulfilled everywhere. A number of Protestant attempts made recently to gain permission for a civil marriage, where one of the parties is an ex-Roman Catholic, have been unsuccessful. It appears that a “supplementary note” issued by the registrar's department in April 1957, but not published as an official document by the government, declared that “legal obstacles” prevent the marriages because conversion to Protestantism is not considered sufficient proof of the “non-Catholicism” of people seeking civil marriage. The ruling of the department means that the issue as a whole has not been settled. Cases must be heard separately, and favourable findings referred to the registrar's office for final approval. A group of Spanish jurists has informally stated its opinion that the new administrative measures nullify the 1956 ministerial decree, and are contrary to Spanish law. Final judgments by local courts towards the end of 1957 have in some cases reversed the earlier opinion of the magistrates in the same courts that the marriage could be contracted. Much sympathy will be extended to our Spanish brethren who are the victims of this despicable form of priestly persecution.

—“The Christian,” 24/1/58.

* * *

Dr. Rumble and Protestants.

The question: “Where two or three Protestants are gathered together in His Name, shall Christ be in the midst of them?” was recently asked of Dr. L. Rumble, Roman Catholic radio priest of Sydney.

In his reply Dr. Rumble declared that the Roman Catholic religion is the true religion and that "if others gather in ways prompted by their religious inclinations, but not in the name of the Catholic religion" Christ will "overlook their mistake" because of their sincerity and is "in the midst of their gatherings in the sense of granting them personal graces and blessings."

Protestants may feel particularly relieved at this information from Dr. Rumble, but before they rejoice too loudly we would point out that Dr. Rumble adds this important observation:

"But He is not with them (the Protestants) in the same way as He would be with them were they Catholics." And then comes this masterpiece:

"He is with Catholics as with those gathered together in His own home, the Catholic Church. He is with good Protestants in their various churches or religions as a visitor away from His own home and blessing with His presence those who, if they but knew it, are absent from their own real home by being absent from His, namely, the Catholic Church in this world."

—"Protestant World," Sydney, N.S.W., Dec. 1957.

* * *

Church Leaders to Confer.

A meeting of representatives of the Moscow Patriarchate of the Russian Orthodox Church and the World Council of Churches next Aug. was agreed yesterday at the meeting in London of the executive committee of the World Council.

Dr. Franklin Fry, President of the United Lutheran Church in America, and chairman of the executive committee, said: "It is assumed that this will be of the nature of a first exploratory consultation to exchange information and to get acquainted. We have looked forward for two years to this new opportunity to discover ways in which fellowship in Christ may be shared by those who profess Him, although in the lights of drastically differing historical situations."

The conversations were originally arranged for January, 1957, but were delayed at the request of the Moscow Patriarchate.

—"Irish Times," 12/2/'58.

* * *

Uneasiness Over Malta's Protestants.

Pleading for religious toleration in Malta the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Geoffrey Fisher, told the Church Assembly at Church House, Westminster, yesterday that he was increasingly uneasy about the situation.

He disclosed that he had had discussions on the subject with the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Lennox-Boyd, and the Lord Chancellor, Lord Kilmuir. He also disclosed that on Monday, Sir Kenneth Grubb, one of the members of the House of Laity representing the Diocese of London, and asked his leave to put on the agenda a resolution. This stated:

"That this Assembly, concerned at the extent to which the Anglican and other religious minorities in the island of Malta continue to suffer discriminating disabilities inconsistent with their right to tolerance, urges the authorities of the Church of England to make it clear beyond all doubt that no scheme for integration of Malta with Britain can be acceptable which does not include specific guarantees for religious freedom in Malta under the civil law."

Motion Withheld

Under the rules of the Assembly resolutions of this type are not taken until the last day. Many of them are often postponed to the next sessions because there is no time to discuss them. Although Dr. Fisher did not specifically mention that fact, he obviously had it in mind when he went on: "Coming at this late moment, the motion could only be put on the agenda if, as chairman, I admitted it as being a matter of sufficient importance and urgency to merit the earlier judgment of the Assembly."

"Sir Kenneth has agreed that it would be better to withhold his motion for the time being if I were able to make some statement instead. That I now propose to do," said Dr. Fisher. "It is not for me on this occasion to express any opinion or to make any comment about the political and constitutional aspects of the proposal to make Malta a part of the United Kingdom, but there is one aspect which directly concerns Christian people both in Malta and the United Kingdom."

"It need hardly be argued that, under any such proposal, there must be absolute security that the conditions of religious liberty which operate in Great Britain shall operate no less effectively in Malta also."

Dr. Fisher added that he had had discussions with Mr. Lennox-Boyd and the Lord Chancellor on the matter and he had submitted a full memorandum to them, which they were now considering. Returning to the resolution, he said: "We ought not to attempt a debate on the matter at short notice in this session of the Church Assembly."

—"Irish Times," 12/2/'58.

Unions To Protest At Tostal Plays—Archbishop's Letter Read To Dublin Unions.

A letter was read at a meeting of the Dublin Council of Irish Unions last night on behalf of the Most Rev. Dr. McQuaid, Archbishop of Dublin, giving his reasons for withdrawing permission for any religious ceremony to inaugurate the Dublin Tostal this year.

The council decided to send a strong protest to the Dublin Tostal Council against the production at the Tostal Drama Theatre Festival of plays of an objectionable nature.

Mr. John Dunne, secretary of the Dublin C.I.U. Council, said that as a result of a discussion at the previous meeting of the council, he had sent the following letter to Mr. T. A. Boyle, secretary of the Dublin Tostal Council. This read:

"I am directed to write and ask if it is the intention of An Tostal Council to have staged, as part of the festival programme, plays of an objectionable nature, as reported in Irish and English newspapers."

Reply Read

Mr. Dunne said that he had received a reply from Mr. Boyle which stated: "I am directed to inform you that Dublin Tostal Council will not produce plays the contents of which may be of an offensive nature. All matters concerning production for the 1958 festival are under strict examination."

He had also got in touch with Dr. McQuaid, and had received the following letter:

"I am asked by his Grace the Archbishop to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 15th, and to state in answer to your query the following facts:—

"The secretary of the Dublin Tostal Council requested permission for a Solemn Votive Mass to inaugurate the Tostal. His Grace gave permission to approach the Very Rev. Administrator of the Pro-Cathedral to have celebrated a Low Mass, as on previous occasions. Then, having learned from the Dublin Tostal Council that it had sanctioned the production in Dublin of a dramatisation of Joyce's 'Ulysses' and of a play by Sean O'Casey, his Grace, the Archbishop withdrew permission for any religious ceremony, more especially for the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in connection with the Dublin Tostal of 1958."

Boycott Urged

Mr. F. Quinn said a strong protest should be sent to the Tostal Council against the production of immoral and objectionable plays. The council and the unions should boycott the

(Continued on p. 35.)

ST. PATRICK.

Interest in the story of Ireland's national saint shows no sign of waning. In this century great works of scholarship have been published on what we may candidly call "the problem of St. Patrick." It is a real problem, for the scholars are nowadays in sharp conflict with each other. Early in the 1900's, Professor J. B. Bury (of Trinity College, Dublin and Cambridge) wrote a "Life of St. Patrick" which was an appendage to his other works on the later ages of the Roman Empire. He wished to associate Patrick and Ireland with the Empire. Dr. N. J. D. White of Trinity College, Dublin, did most useful work in editing St. Patrick's two acknowledged writings—his "Confession" and his "Letter to Coroticus." Dr. White carefully studied St. Patrick's quotations of Holy Scripture (from the Latin Bible, but not always from the Vulgate of St. Jerome) and his edition of the Latin St. Patrick wrote, and his translations are permanently valuable.

We may refer also to another useful little book, Dr. John McNeill's "Life of St. Patrick." Dr. John, or Eoin, McNeill was Professor in University College, Dublin, and had a great knowledge of early Irish Annals. At the present time another member of the staff of that College, Dr. Ludwig Bieler, is making valuable contributions to the knowledge of St. Patrick, particularly by investigating the surviving texts which supply the raw material for Patrician history. In addition, the staff of the School of Celtic studies in Dublin has been active, and the late Dr. Thos. O'Rahilly gave us some formidable works of his own, and trenchant criticisms of the works of other scholars.

The situation appears to be that the history of St. Patrick; his birthplace; his place of captivity in Ireland; his places of study on the continent; his travels outside Ireland; his consecration as a bishop; his fields of labour in Ireland; the date of his arrival and the length of his life and the scene of his burial, are all unsettled. By this we do not mean that he was never here, or never a student. We mean that exact and detailed information eludes us. As the late Dr. J. R. Ardill emphasised in his book on the saint—there is no literary evidence about St. Patrick which is not at least two hundred years after his generally accepted date in the fifth century. Of course it is reasonable to believe that the early lives contain some living traditions of Patrick, and therefore they are by no means entirely fictitious. Yet they belong to an age in which the critical faculty was at a discount, and belief in the sensational and miraculous was nourished by the ingenuity and inventiveness of the biographers. "Hagiography," i.e. the writing of lives of the saints, is a distinct branch of literature. Its object is to foster piety rather than to ascertain facts. The dominant motif is edification, not history. St. Patrick has suffered much from the hagiographers, past and present.

* * *

The only foundation for serious study of St. Patrick is what he wrote himself. We may be sure that he was in youth a captive in this country, and that the place of his detention and slavery was in the North-East: "by the Western Sea," which is nowadays called "the Irish Sea." We know that his father and grandfather were Christians and dwellers within the bounds of the Empire. We know that he escaped from Ireland, and after some years returned as a missionary. It is clear that he was never a cultivated scholar, for his Latin never rose to the heights of style and grace which scholars aim at, but was always marked by "rusticity." That does not mean "dog Latin" or even bad Latin, but provincial Latin, the Latin of this workaday world which was just beginning to move on the path of linguistic evolution which led to the "Romance" languages—in Patrick's case, we suppose, to French. That he was "a bishop, appointed by God, in Ireland" we know from his own statement. That he had made some study of theology we know from the passage he wrote concerning his religious beliefs, for that passage has been shown to be founded on a work of Victor of Pettau, a town on the river Danube.

In Ireland it is probable that Patrick was a missionary in Down, and that he made converts at Tara, the capital. It is probable also that he was as far south as Cashel, and as far west as the mountain in Mayo now called Croagh Patrick. He may have been at Armagh (i.e. in the district now called Armagh) but it need not be assumed that he founded an Archbishopric See there. But of course there were bishops, and metropolitan sees, and church order in St. Patrick's age, and he would have been eccentric indeed if he had ignored them completely. Only, we must remember that writings long after were composed in the interests of the Church of Armagh, and it was important to be able to claim Patrick as the founder, and to say that he constituted Armagh as the ecclesiastical capital.

The general picture we have is the picture of a persevering and effective evangelist who built his faith upon God's Word, and who was upheld by the confidence that God had designated him for the task in hand. He was earnest, energetic and unselfish. His faith was simple enough, pure and reasonable and experimental. We read his words and feel his kinship with missionaries of every age. His message is Christ, and if he had other things to say, they were subordinate. "To me to live is Christ" might have been for him, as it was for St. Paul, a complete biography.

* * *

Now the perennial question to be faced is how far Patrick was independent of Rome. The Protestant tries to show that he was not associated with Rome, and the Roman Catholic assumes that he was. Here we need to be reminded of the wise Archbishop James Usher who said that he himself would gladly have resorted to the Rome and the popes of the fifth century, for they were wise and godly men. He knew that the days of expanding papal claims had not yet come, and that worldly ambition and pride had not begun to rise like a tide with its floating burden of doctrinal errors, forged decretals, patrimonies and pretensions. That is the point to remember, the fact that Rome in the fifth century, that is, Rome ecclesiastical, was far different from Rome of the Middle Ages, of Nicholas, Gregory, Innocent, and Boniface. Far different too, from the Rome of the Lateran, Trent and Vatican Councils.

No serious person has asserted that Patrick was a Protestant. By that we mean that it has not been claimed that he was a Lutheran or a Baptist, or a Presbyterian, or an Anglican, or a Methodist. All that we mean is that he was a scriptural and evangelical missionary. He was a fifth century Catholic; not a twentieth century Roman Catholic. The faith he held and taught is not abhorrent to, or repugnant to the evangelical Christian of today. Modern Roman Catholicism is.

It is a pity that we still find writers who want to ascribe to St. Patrick doctrines which were not officially taught for many centuries, even for a thousand and more years, after he went to his heavenly rest. It is a pity that a sense of history, and a knowledge of dogmatic timetables, are lightly regarded. We have seen a most readable and attractive story of St. Patrick ("The Steadfast Man," Paul Gallico) rendered less convincing by its occasional assertions of the "Roman Catholicism" of the saint. The view of the non-Roman Catholic (the historical view) is misunderstood, and the nature of fifth-century Christianity in Western Europe is not distinguished from the faith and practice of much later times.

* * *

Nearly all writers on St. Patrick are in the same boat as his earliest biographer Muirchu, who wrote "My skill is small; my authorities are uncertain; my memory is treacherous; yet the feeling of my love is most pious."

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"IN CHRIST."

The Gospel message, now or at any other time of our mortal life, is Good News. The character of the Good News is that it is a promise of new life "in Christ." The Gospel is not a demonstration that there is a God, nor is it an argument for belief in a future life. Of course it implies these supreme truths; but in itself it is the proclamation of a new relationship to God which is effected, or brought into being, in and through Christ. Further, Christ is far more than the medium of that relationship. He is revealed as God the Son. The Godhead is not an isolated impersonality, but the essential Oneness of Father, Son and Holy Spirit—Our Tri-une Jehovah. Hence the Good News "in Christ" brings to us the fact of His atonement, the fact of His mediatorship, the fact of His continual intercession, the fact that we are justified freely through faith in Him, the fact that in Him is Life, and the Life is the Light of men. Good News "in Christ" tells us of redeeming love, of precious Blood, of risen Power, of the pledge "because I live ye shall live also."

We can express the present effect of the News by speaking of God the Father's provision for the needs of the Redeemed—Grace, ever available, and the Reconciliation ever operative. St. Paul (2 Tim. 1. 9) wrote thus of that grace—God "hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." Of the reconciliation he wrote (2 Cor. 5, 18 & 19)—"all things are of God who hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given unto us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation."

No statement of the Gospel should be accepted which does not incorporate these facts declared through the apostle Paul.

Grace and Reconciliation (the grace brings the reconciliation) are essential elements in the passing "from death unto life." Be it noted that Our Lord Jesus Christ is the key to both. He is the key because He is the embodiment of the truth that "God is Love," and that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

* * *

Our Lord Jesus Christ is the one through whom we receive the gifts of God.

1. We receive our redemption or salvation through Him. Mark the words of the 3rd chapter of the Epistle to the Romans—"all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by His Grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." The very fact that Our Lord came to declare the unalterable righteousness of God means that it is at once evident that we could not attain to that standard of righteousness ourselves. Christ therefore identified Himself with us, and met our need by offering Himself as the full perfect and sufficient sacrifice for sin. In that way, by His Cross, He obtained eternal redemption for us.

2. We required, and found, redemption in Him. But what has been redeemed is not necessarily better than it was before. In the Old Testament law the duty of redemption did not depend upon the moral and spiritual renovation of the person redeemed. When Our Lord redeemed us, that was the preliminary step to raising our spiritual level. He redeemed and renewed us. That is why we read in the 5th chapter the second Epistle to the Corinthians "if any man be in Christ he is a new creature: old things are passed away; all things are become new."

* * *

3. In Christ we receive a spiritual status. We are no longer unreconciled, or irreconcilable: As God's sons we have a new character, and will not be disinherited. The keeping power of God ensures that none of His sons goes off into a far country. A full atonement has been made for the sins of His people. Therefore, says St. Paul "there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8. 1.). "No condemnation"—is that not an assurance to stimulate us to the highest efforts in God's service? "No condemnation" is a greater incentive to goodness and holiness than the threat of condemnation and the fear of Hell could ever be.

* * *

4. We have emphasised the keeping power of God as marked by the new status we receive in Christ and by the fact that there is no longer condemnation. This fact is expressed in a succinct and practical way by St. Jude at the very beginning of his epistle—He uses this phrase to describe those who are to receive and profit by his letter—"to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ." Our preservation is no small thing. It means that we are not dependent on the resoluteness of our own wills, or on the strength of our characters (a strength which varies with individuals, and may vary with time and circumstance in any one individual). Preservation fosters in us a special trust in God. It does not produce smugness, or worldly security; for it does not deprive us of the awareness that even at our best we are but miserable sinners. When God kept St. Paul, He kept him in the faith, but He did not keep him in earthly comfort. Many a man, recording what he had gone through, as St. Paul does in 2 Cor. 11, 23-29 (beatings, stonings, shipwrecks, imprisonments, dangers of every sort, etc.) might be inclined to say that he had settled his debt to God, and maybe overpaid Him. Not so St. Paul, or any Christian—we look to the grace, not to our own cancelling of the sins to our account. Years ago, when Horatio Bottomley was released from prison when he had served a sentence for fraud, he tried to return to journalism and launched a new weekly paper. We remember the posters advertising it—a great portrait of the man himself with the caption "I have paid"! He might think he settled his debts to men in that fashion, but neither he nor anyone else can square accounts with God—

"There was no other good enough

"To pay the price of sin,

"He only could unlock the gate

"Of heaven, and let us in."

We are preserved—whatever we go through here, we shall continue in the faith. That is the triumphant note of Romans 8, 33-35 "Quis separabit?" "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" "Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

These are the facts: the Christian life is not a bank-holiday week-end; its slogan is not "Relax." It is a warfare, and its precept "Fight the good fight." We are guaranteed the ultimate victory, "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation" (1 Pet. 1: 5).

* * *

5. The Blessed Virgin Mary, as we read in St. Luke's Gospel (1. 46.), thought of the message of the Angel; the message we call the Annunciation. She expressed her sense of grandeur of her vocation and of the condescension of God in the words "He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and hath exalted them of low degree." St. Paul extends the significance of this grace when he writes "God . . . hath quickened us together with Christ, and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Ephesians 2. 6). There he states the Christian's true position. There we have the fact of the exaltation of them of low degree as the world judges them. To dwell in God is a present reality. The Saviour said "Come unto Me"—that is not only an invitation but an exaltation here and now.

* * *

6. In the Epistle to the Romans we read "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made us free from the law of sin and death." Here is deliverance, but like all other gifts of God it is "in Christ." Why? Because Our Lord has said "He that heareth My word, and believeth in Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is pass from death into life." "The law of sin and death" is a law of causality—"sin, when it is finished (i.e. completed) brings forth death" (James 1. 15). Only Christ has authority and power to break the chain of cause and effect. He only can make us free from the law of sin and death.

* * *

7. "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me"—"My God shall supply all your needs according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus." These assurances, the first personal to St. Paul, but of course true of all the children of God; and the second a matter of Christian experience, come to us with increasing power as life goes on. We do not say that as we grow older our physical resources continue at the level they had in youth, but undoubtedly we increase in the power to do Christ's will. One element or factor in this is the waning of merely human and earthly ambitions, and the fading interest in self-advancement of one sort or another. The setting aside of the dividing and confusing interests of worldly life enables us to give more wholehearted devotion to spiritual things. The service of God, which in youth had to compete for our energies with a multitude of other attractions, may, in advancing years take on fresh beauty, and find deeper response in heart and conscience and will. If we no longer look forward, in the dreams of ambition, we look upward in the rediscovery of our own spiritual nature, and find the ability to serve God with much more than mere contentment. We find the ability to enjoy His work and to perceive in it our real purpose at last. We do not always perceive the true meaning of life in our early days.

Having at length found our true direction and worthwhile concerns, need we question the promise that God "will supply all our need"? Isn't it a matter of asking in order that we may receive?

* * *

8. In the light of these great realities we may count on abundance of aid and upon victory in our warfare. The pity is that we often read the words of Holy Scripture without serious appreciation. We should not consider that in reading the Scriptures we are reading as we would read poetry. We read poetry for a combination of sound, rhythm, imagery, these are more than the quality of the thought expressed (though the thought may be pure wise and sublime). But the Bible is not to be read for the sake of the sound, rhythm, and beauty of the English Authorised Version. The Bible is not to be read because it is part of our literary heritage, but because it is the medium of God's communication with us, as well as the record of our sin, our Saviour and our Salvation.

For this reason (among others) we often use, and commend to others, the Revised Version, or one of the modern translations of the New Testament. We specially value Dr. Weymouth's New Testament which for over fifty years has been a valuable and trustworthy version. This, however, is beside the main point we wish to make: the point that when we read we should attend to the statements made and recognise that they were written to convey to us definite facts. When St. Paul (2 Cor. 2. 14) wrote "Thanks be unto God which always causeth us to triumph in Christ" he spoke of his success in the ministry. We know that he was many times defeated, but the cause of the Gospel was not extinguished. At one point we gather that he had doubts whether his preaching in Thessalonica had had more than a merely momentary effect; but Timothy was able to tell him that there was still a band of faithful people in Thessalonica. If there was triumph it was linked with the full blessing received. God has given us every spiritual blessing in Christ (Eph. 1. 3), and the blessing of triumph is ours if we will have it.

"More than conquerors through Him that loved us"—that is conquerors "in Christ."

* * *

If the above may be thought to be the effects of Christ in the individual believer, we have also to mark the fact that Christ has His gifts to confer upon His church. Briefly, we have God in Christ bestowing upon His Church "Unity,"—all are one in Him.

"Membership in Christ and with one another,"—one body in Christ, and members one of another.

"Resurrection"—The dead in Christ shall rise.

"Eternal Life"—In Christ shall all be made alive.

* * *

Finally, there is God's ultimate purpose. The reason for everything that was, is, and shall be, must be enquired into and demonstrated. St. Paul can put it no other way than this—God, in the dispensation of the fulness of the times, will gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in Him (Eph. 1. 10). That is the great finale and consummation of the ages—"All things in Christ."

IRISH PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERS AND ROME.

Lately, in the "Sunday Press," Dublin, the Rev. Fr. Nash, S.J. who is the paper's religious columnist expressed the view that there are ministers in the Irish Presbyterian Church who might readily join the Roman Catholic Church were it not for domestic circumstances. We may assume that this view might also be held about clergymen of the Church of Ireland, though the context of Fr. Nash's article was the Presbyterian Church. The Rev. G. B. McConnell of Donore Presbyterian Church, Dublin protested against this assumption and Fr. Nash's reply was mainly a criticism of the variety of doctrinal interpretations permitted in the Presbyterian Church. What Fr. Nash cannot see is that we shall never know fully or finally the truth of any dogma until we get to Heaven, so that honest thought and faith must tolerate some differences of emphasis and explanation. Mr. McConnell's subsequent letter is as follows:—

I challenged Father Nash to produce his "proof" that there are many ministers outside the Roman Catholic Church who are only prevented from entering it through lack of courage. I naturally resented this impugning the good faith of the clergy of other churches. I regret to see that Father Nash has neither offered any proof nor withdrawn his allegation.

The only real argument which he submits is that the converts to Roman Catholicism have before conversion passed through a period of "acute agony and instability" and that therefore "it would seem not extravagant to assume that there are others whose stories have not been told." In other words, what in his original article he described as "proof" is now merely "not extravagant assumption."

No doubt the hundreds of priests (including prominent leaders) who have come over to Protestantism from the Roman Catholic Church have passed through a similar period of uncertainty, but I would not say that this was a proof that there are many priests who remain inside the Church in the same state of mind. I would consider it quite wrong to start making assertions about the state of mind of people of whom I know nothing much less to accuse them of duplicity.

And now about "positive doctrine." Father Nash quotes the statements made in the General Assembly of 1955 about the doctrine of the Atonement and refers to the fact that varying interpretations of that doctrine may be held within my Church. He seems to regard this refusal to insist on a uniform interpretation as a "betrayal of Christianity."

Surely Father Nash knows perfectly well that there are theological discussions and differences of interpretation of doctrine within his Church also, and that there always have been. Some of the great leaders of the Catholic Church (such as Tertullian, Origen, St. Anselm, etc.) held widely differing views of the atonement. Did that constitute a "betrayal of Christianity"? Of course not.

Perhaps, however, the modern Roman Catholic Church has so far changed that it may now be trying to enforce complete uniformity in matters of this kind. If so, is this a good thing? This is a crucial point. I believe that unity must be primarily a unity of the spirit rather than of the law. This is the kind of unity that you find in a Christian family, where there may be many differences, and yet a spirit which binds them together. There is all the difference in the world between a united family and the enforced unity of a totalitarian dictatorship.

It is, I believe, one of the tragedies of the modern Roman Catholic Church that she seems to be travelling further and further along the way of dictatorship, just as it is one of the tragedies that she alone of the great branches of the Christian Church refuses to come into the family on the World Council of Churches, who, with all their differences, are one in Christ.

Infallible

Many people, of course, feel that the way of spiritual freedom, of a diversity with underlying unity, is too dangerous and too difficult. They prefer to seek an infallible guide whom they can follow blindfold. The Roman Catholic Church, I understand, claims to provide that guidance—an infallible Church with infallible teaching. But I have been trying for quite a long time to find out just what parts of Her doctrine are held to be infallibly true. Nobody seems able to tell me; I used to think that the Papal Encyclicals were supposed to be infallible, but I am told this is not so.

Could some one please give us a list of the infallible doctrines? Apart from the matters of the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption; how many infallible, ex cathedra utterances have been made by the Popes since 1870? The fact of the matter seems to be that the theologians of the Roman Catholic Church cannot themselves agree on which parts of the teaching are infallible. What is the good of an infallible Church if you cannot know when she is teaching infallibly?

I would very much like to comment on some of the other matters raised in Father Nash's article, but I do not want to make this letter too long. I would, however, thank him for the invitation to the symposium on "Adult Catholicism," a subject which would indeed be interesting. Unfortunately, my experience has been that when I attend gatherings to which I have been invited by those who want to convert me to the Roman Faith, I am expected to listen, but not to speak. Free discussion is not encouraged. Then, when Truth requires me to speak out against error, I feel that I am being rather rude.

For my part, I think that public discussion is an excellent thing, and not to be feared by those who believe that God is Truth; but I do not like being subjected to indoctrination or "brain-washing." Some years ago there was a society in Dublin wherein Protestant and Roman Catholic clergy met together for discussion. I think this was a very good thing; but it was stopped—by the Roman Catholic Archbishop.

G. B. G. McCONNELL,

Donore House,
83 South Circular Road, Dublin.

—"The Sunday Press," Dublin, 8/12/'57.

THE STORY OF A PRIEST

The Rev. Joseph Wittofski.

The Rev. Joseph Wittofski's name conveys an idea of his nationality and race. His nationality is in fact American, as he is a United States citizen, and his race is, we assume, Polish, belonging to the Latin branch of the Slav people of Europe.

Born in 1912, Fr. Wittofski was educated for the Roman Catholic ministry in the normal fashion, i.e. parochial schools, college, ecclesiastical seminary, university. He also received the special training associated with the North American order, the Maryknoll Fathers, and for a time taught in their seminary. He did advanced study at the well-known Roman Catholic University in New York, Fordham. All this is reasonably typical of his calling. We believe that the Maryknoll Fathers are held in high esteem in America, and the fact that Fr. Wittofski joined them shows that he was perhaps above the average in his sense of vocation. He worked for several years in the Eastern States, and then in 1944 left the Roman Catholic priesthood, and in due course entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church (Anglican). It may be of interest to record that we had a visit in Dublin recently from a Dr. Farrell, a former Roman Catholic clergyman who became a member of the same Anglican Church in the United States. Indeed, from the information we have, a surprisingly large number of the clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church were formerly Roman Catholic. In North America, as we have said before, a man can stand on his own feet, and find liberty to follow the dictates of conscience. He can leave one communion and join another without being pursued by vilification and slander. In the free society of American democracy over the vast area of the republic men and women need not be subject to spiritual dictatorship of any sort.

* * *

Fr. Wittofski has told us that as a student he had developed an interest in Anglicanism. (Anglicanism is not, we think, a very satisfactory word, but it designates all those churches which are in communion with the Church of England, and which derive their theology and polity and liturgy from the reformed Catholic faith of the British Isles). Large numbers of Roman Catholic scholars are interested in Anglicanism, and by no means all of them denounce it or dislike it. Of course the cultivated Roman Catholic scholar who is not so obsessed with his own way of thinking as to be unable to appreciate anything but ultramontaniam, can see the historic continuities, the virtues of vernacular worship, the value of Scriptural piety, and the supremacy of Scriptural truth. Such men find interest in studying the relations of Roman, Byzantine (or Orthodox) and Anglican teaching, and in noting the differences, and in trying to account for them in a rational way. This was the kind of study Fr. Wittofski took up, and he gradually found in his soul a sympathy for Anglicanism which he had not foreseen.

He does not engage in wholesale denunciation of Romanism, nor in uncritical admiration of Anglicanism—but his protest is against certain aspects of Rome which he believes have, through the centuries, hindered that Church from fulfilling the task it claims to have—"If the Roman Church could wipe away a thousand years of history and remember that Christ's Kingdom is not of this world, it would become a tremendous force to bring mankind to God." He considers the Pope as a temporal prince with his Secretary of State a contradiction of what ought to be. As a priest he noted Rome's activities in the U.S.A. and saw how little some of the authorities of the church valued the internal security of the nation. He found it hard to be a patriotic American and a dutiful servant of his church.

In this state of uncertainty he turned his thoughts to the primary function of the priest—his activities at the altar. As a means of union with the ascended Christ the Sacrament of His Body and Blood is most precious to all obedient Christians. But "surely" says Fr. Wittofski, "to receive this Sacrament properly, they must partake of both the consecrated bread and wine . . . as a priest of the Roman Church I could not give the consecrated cup to Roman Catholic people, and I found myself in the way, blocking the fulfilment of Our Lord's command. Any Roman priest knows that if he dares to press the chalice to the lips of the faithful, in the law of the Church he commits sacrilege. Surely, to make obedience to the command of Jesus into sacrilege approaches very near to blasphemy."

This denial of the cup to the communicants (with the special sacramental theology created to justify it) obviously contradicted earlier teaching, and Fr. Wittofski recalled that Pope Leo I in the fifth century condemned people who refused to receive the Cup as taking the Bread alone meant receiving unworthily, and Pope Gelasius I directed that persons are either to receive the Sacrament in its entirety or be repelled from it. Pope Urban II in 1095 said that no one was to communicate "without receiving both the Body and the Blood separately." Pope Pascal II in 1118 wrote that no one should make any departure "through a human and novel institution" from what Christ ordained and did.

We believe that here we have a very weighty problem, and that no amount of scholastic reasoning and theorising can justify the withdrawal of the cup from the laity: equally, that no amount of practical consideration can justify it. If the Cup was shared for nearly a millennium and a half, practical difficulties must have been realised early and effectively met. The Eastern part of Christendom in the Middle Ages and since must have understood every problem and difficulty alleged to warrant withholding the Cup in the West: yet Eastern Christianity has never done what Rome did.

* * *

Fr. Wittofski also studied the history and theology of the papal office, and concluded that "the Catholic Faith of the ancient church held no doctrine like the present-day theory of the Papacy." "Above the inner confusion which I came to experience, beyond the forces pulling now one way and then another, the life-giving truths more clearly printed themselves upon my consciousness—'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself.' To the extent that I am vitally united with the life of Christ, I find myself relieved of my spiritual disabilities. Purification through the Blood of Christ and by the operation of the Holy Spirit, creates a real, vital union with God. The unified society of the redeemed constitutes the Mystical Body of Jesus."

Since he became a Protestant, he has ministered in the diocese of Pittsburgh in a rapidly growing parish.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 23.

Tostal. Mr. John O'Brien also favoured a boycott, unless the plays were withdrawn. Mr. P. O'Keeffe said the Tostal gave employment, and they should not interfere with anything that did so. As representatives of working men, the council should think of the workers.

Mr. J. Lynam said that if the clergy took objection to the production of these plays, they would be quite safe in stepping in behind the clergy. If they disregarded the advice of the clergy, they were lost.

"Moral Censorship"

When a delegate suggested that a copy of the protest should also be sent to the Minister for Justice, Mr. Frank Robbins, chairman, said that there was no censorship of plays in this country, and no law to ban their production. If a play was obscene, the Minister for Justice could then step in.

The delegate—There is a moral law.

Mr. Robbins—Yes, there is a moral censorship, and that is what we are acting on.

The chairman said that the matter could be met by a strong letter of protest.

Mr. Quinn said that he was willing to withdraw his boycott suggestion.

—"Irish Times," 12/2/'58.

[In the same issue of the "Irish Times" it is announced that the play by Mr. O'Casey "will not be performed at Dublin's International Theatre Festival in May."]

* * *

A Convert.

A 48 year-old Spanish priest who left the Roman Catholic Church after 17 years, "because he favoured the Anglican doctrine," has been appointed assistant curate of St. Peter's Harton, South Shields. He is the Rev. Angel Rubio. He had been working as a Roman Catholic missionary in Venezuela. Mr. Rubio, who is a Doctor of Divinity, was received into the Anglican Church in Paris.

—"English Churchman," 7/2/'58.

* * *

Another Convert.

A recent visitor to Belfast was Rev. Giovanni Peano, who spoke at a meeting in the Y.M.C.A. Hall and gave an account of the reasons why he left the Roman Catholic Church. He was ordained to serve as a missionary in Eritrea, where he first came into contact with Protestant missionaries, and came to the conclusion that the Roman Church could not be the true Church of Christ. He hopes shortly to be licensed to serve in a church in the Manchester Diocese. Dr. J. Sydney McCann, who presided, said that during the last forty years no fewer than fourteen Roman Catholic priests had received instruction from Irish Church Missions, apart from the numerous converts to the Protestant faith.—Jan., 1958.

* * *

Israel and Christian Missions.

The religious situation in Israel is far from stable, for according to the Israel "Weekly Digest" there is growing tension between the religious and other parties in the country. Mr. Ben-Gurion, whose resignation as Prime Minister is announced at the moment of writing, has been trying to end the tension. He declared that the Israeli State was fully meeting its obligations to supply the religious population with all the services they required, but that he would not permit either the religious parties or the non-religious to impose their will on others. Large numbers of settlers in Israel do not own allegiance to the synagogue. This fact provides Christian workers with an exceptional opportunity, for it means that converts to the Christian faith from this class would not be involved in a fundamental break with Jewry. Reports from Christian missions at work in the country confirm that, on the whole, save from the extreme Orthodox section of Judaism, there is little opposition to their activities, and mission workers move freely about the country. Plans are under discussion for the publication in Israel of a Christian periodical and for the provision of Christian literature in modern Hebrew at a level designed to appeal to the educated Jew.

—"The Christian," 3/1/'58.

* * *

A Headline For Eire—New Attack Urged On Alcoholism.

Establishment of a State-wide organisation to promote and assist efforts to combat alcoholism was advocated recently by the director of the Australian Council for Educational Research (Dr. W. C. Radford).

Dr. Radford said there was a need for something far greater than the present avenues for curbing alcoholism.

"We are only touching the fringe of it," he told the social welfare conference organised by the Victorian Council of Social Service.

Dr. Radford said a State-wide organisation should endeavour to publish information on alcoholism and its general problems and to arouse community support for provision of treatment centres.

There was a need for carefully compiled and scientifically accurate information about the physiological, psychological and social effects of alcohol.

Provision should be made for education of children over 12 or 13 on the social problems of alcoholism, but until reliable information was available, education authorities would be unable to decide what information they could use.

One of the basic problems was to educate children to be mentally healthy.

They needed to be taught to go through life, living with and accepting their own deficiencies.

Many people took to drink, said Dr. Radford, because they felt inferior and were not prepared to accept the deficiencies which gave them this feeling.

—"The Vigilant," Melbourne, 14/11/'57.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the
Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

INDIA

One of India's most ancient languages in a new dress.

Just issued

The New Testament and Psalms in roman Tamil

Much of the illiteracy in India is owing to the complications of the native scripts. Without any change in the Spoken language the introduction of this easier type prepares the way for progress to literacy.

Published by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Contributions toward the cost of this production will be much appreciated.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 4—LXVII

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events.	37
"Protestantism in Ireland."	39
Editor's Chair.	42
"The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church."	45
Why Mixed Marriages Fail.	46

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Protestants in Italy.

Protestants in Italy, according to the Italian "Voce Metodiste," can now feel that their feet are on the highroad that leads to liberty. Early in 1957 the Constitutional Court, the supreme legal authority in the land, met to decide a case which might establish liberty at last. The verdict was given a month later of which the "Voce Metodista" correspondent writes: "When it came it was almost all they had hoped. The first of the Fascist restrictions (that which made it impossible to hold a service in a private house) was declared invalid. The sentence was promulgated in the middle of the greatest constitutional crisis that the Italian Government has had to face. The President of the Court resigned. He was himself an ex-President of the State. He felt that both the Government and the Vatican were not working with him."

"This courageous championing of liberal Italian Constitution against reactionary clerical influences and even against public criticisms of the Court from the lips of the Pope himself, provides the historical setting of this vital verdict."

—"The Protestant Woman," Jan., '58.

A View Of The Protestant Church in South America.

South America, with its 154 million people in a territory as large as Europe and the United States put together, is a tremendous challenge to the Churches, according to Dr. A. Rodriguez of Union Theological Seminary in Matanzas, Cuba.

Reporting to the Assembly of the International Missionary Council in Accra, Ghana, last month, he pointed out that the Protestant Church is comparatively small—five million members out of the total population of 154 million. At the same time, he said that the Roman Catholic Church claims 47 million members. "Hence, there remain 102 million Latin Americans beyond the reach of any Christian spiritual inspiration. It is not just the single question of seeing who gets the largest number first, but of giving Christian assistance to such a large number of people who, living without it, are losing contact with the real spiritual and moral values of life. They are falling prey to other movements which may lead them astray for ever."

Going on, Dr. Rodriguez said: "Protestant Christianity in South America is on the march! Undoubtedly, in the near future, the Protestant movement will be recognised by all as the most significant and transforming factor in the life of the Latin American people. Right now, the influence of the Protestant community in Latin America is far out of proportion to its numerical size."

Prayer and Sympathy

"Though much of the Protestant work in Latin America is already self-supporting and self-governing, it must be remembered that these young churches are just beginning to stand on their own feet. We must stand by them, with our prayers, our sympathy and with all kinds of assistance and help. The most urgent need is to enlarge and improve the theological institutions already in existence in Latin America. It is a fact that the Protestant work in our countries has extended so far that there are not enough trained leaders to care for it properly. The other great need is the production and distribution of Christian literature. We need to permeate the thought of Latin America with Christian ideas and ideals. Much has been accomplished along this line during the last fifteen or twenty years, mainly through the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America. But there is much to be done yet, and more liberal contributions would not only cause a larger production but a larger range of subjects, titles and authors. Help also is greatly needed in radio broadcasting, social service and student centres. Here we have an open door to a great area of service, but we lack manpower and material means."

"The extraordinary development of the Protestant movement in Latin America in recent years is, undoubtedly, a sign that in God's providence, on the clock of history, the hands are already pointing to the dawning of a new day in Latin America. But the very same hands are pointing also to an hour that raises many problems and creates new situations, calling for vision and long-range planning."
—(E.P.S., Geneva.)

* * *

Vatican Has Not Changed.

When Bishop Hanns Lilje, Lutheran leader in Europe, in an address to the Lutheran World Assembly in Minneapolis, U.S.A., recently, called for exploratory contacts with the Roman Catholic Church, we expected some criticism from sections of the church. One contrary view came from Bergen, Norway, where the Lutheran daily paper "Dagen" stated in regard to the Bishop's appeal: "Rome has not changed since the days of Luther and our only task is to urge the Church of Rome to turn away from her delusions."

We agree with the attitude of the Bergen paper, for it has been demonstrated time and again that there has been no weakening in the Church of Rome's unrelenting stand that she is the only true church and all other denominations are heretical and outside the Church of Christ. In any move toward Christian unity, must the Protestant churches make all the advances, compromises and submissions?

There can never be any real progress toward unity in Christendom until the Roman Church, along with all others, shows a disposition to approach the matter with sympathy, sincerity and a readiness to compromise, if necessary, to achieve this end. Until that happens, we feel little headway can be made.

There has been no change in the autocracy of Rome on this question since the Malines Conferences some 50 years ago when the High Church group of the Church of England, led by the former Lord Halifax, seeking unity, were bluntly informed that the only basis for union acceptable to the Vatican was for the members of the Anglican Church to submit completely as erring children and enter the Roman fold. And that is Rome's position to-day.

—"The Sentinel," Toronto, Dec. 1957.

* * *

Inquiry Centre.

The Church of England urgently needs a Protestant and Evangelical Inquiry Centre, to which inquiring Roman Catholics and others can turn for instruction and help. Whether the official inquiry centre will meet this need seems somewhat doubtful. It is not intended to be a counterstroke to propagandist activity of the Roman Catholic Church, says the centre's chairman, the Bishop of Croydon, the Rt. Rev. J. T. Hughes, in the official year book of the Church of England for 1958. Describing the centre as an office to which inquirers are invited to send questions about the Christian religion, the Bishop says some inquiries will be concerned with differences in doctrine and practice of the Anglican and Roman Churches, and these will be answered. "But the main stream of inquiries is expected to be concerned with the Christian religion. It will be the aim to provide correspondents with a central course of about 18 lessons on the Christian faith according to the doctrine of the Church of England." Courses may be supplemented. Personal problems are also expected to be put to the centre. No doubt much will depend upon the leader of the centre.

—"English Churchman," 7/2/58.

[This excerpt from the "English Churchman," 7/2/58, leads us to remind readers that this Office is often called on to answer enquiries on spiritual and ecclesiastical problems. We have also in Dublin now a Protestant Discussion Group. Its meetings are advertised in the "Dublin Evening Mail" each month, and it is conducted by several Protestant clergymen. The Irish Church Missions hold discussion classes in Dublin and Belfast.]

* * *

Colombia, S. America.

Obverse and Reverse

The obverse of a coin is the top side of it; the side which usually has the head or the figure on it. The reverse is the under side of it. We have of late heard much of the situation at Colombia, and of the persecution there which flares up and dies down, as the fires of hatred are blown upon, or allowed to subside. Whether that is the obverse or the reverse in Colombia I do not know, but it is one of the sides. You would think that a people who go the length of killing people, or burning their property, because they do not agree with their faith and will not allow them to exercise it, would themselves be models of goodness and propriety. The other side comes from the "Catholic Herald," of Medellin, which thinks that Colombia is in a bad way.

No Mean City

In case you think Medellin is a little one-horse place, whose opinion does not matter at all, let me set down what I can gather of the place. It is the chief town of the district of Antioquia, Colombia. It is the seat of a bishop, it has a university, and it is the second largest town of the Republic. Gold and silver, in large quantities, are found in the neighbourhood, and the townspeople are pretty generally engaged in manufacturing jewellery, porcelain and pottery. Coffee is grown for export, as are also silk, cotton, wool and chocolate. Communications are evidently good, for there is an air-line to Panama. The population is approaching a quarter of a million—224,200 to be exact. No, Medellin is not a place that can be pooh-poohed, or put down as a place of no importance.

On The Spot

The "Catholic Herald," of Medellin, is on the spot, and we are not. It quotes the situation in Colombia as a moral collapse, and says it is no secret to anybody. A string of vices, such as pornography, drunkenness, gambling, infidelity and so on, are pictured as roaring down on Colombia like a tempestuous wind, blotting out everything of worth and dignity. It is not for want of religion—of a kind—that this goes on. The land is full of images of the Virgin Mary. On occasion multitudes fill the plazas and the avenues, to show their love for the Pilgrim Lady of Fatima; and "in almost all homes the Immaculate Heart of Mary is enthroned." "All this is true, but all is external, fleeting, transitory. And it is precisely because of this indifference in the soul that the devastating breath of the crudest paganism is taking possession of our nation . . . But we cannot go on like this, because total ruin threatens us, material, spiritual and moral ruin."

(Continued on p. 47.)

"PROTESTANTISM IN IRELAND."

"The Furrow" a Roman Catholic monthly magazine published from Maynooth College, printed in its issue of February 1958, an article with the above title. The author is the Rev. Sean O'Riordan, a priest of the Redemptorist Order (C.S.S.R.). Fr. O'Riordan's subject naturally interests us—we often express our views of "Roman Catholicism in Ireland," and plainly we ought to be ready "to hear the other side."

The article referred to was read in a paper at a Summer School in Maynooth College last July. It begins with a survey of the origins of the various forms of Protestantism in Ireland. We are ready to dispute the account of the Church of Ireland if it is to be thought of as a creation of the reform movement of the 16th century, but Fr. O'Riordan reasonably sets out (to begin with) the view of our great Archbishop Usher, that the Church is the ancient church, "purged of mediaeval accretions and errors." He also correctly states the origin of Irish Presbyterianism. It began in North and East Down before the plantation of Ulster, through the policy of two Scots colonisers, Hamilton and Montgomery. The Ulster Plantation was a few years later. But of course, for practical purposes we need not distinguish the various Scots plantations.

In dealing with smaller bodies there is a very natural mistake in the statement that the Brethren "got a footing in Ireland." Though they are called "Plymouth Brethren," they began in Dublin about a hundred and thirty years ago.

Fr. O'Riordan states what is quite true, though rarely realised outside Ireland, that Irish Protestants number over a million—approximately a quarter of the population. They are of course so concentrated in the North-East of this island, that their fewness in the rural west and south gives an impression of negligibility. The following figures quoted in the article will show that some non-Roman Catholic Churches are substantial—

Church of Ireland, about 478,000
Presbyterian Church, about 434,000
Methodists, about 75,000
Others, about 75,000.

We may say that "others" include the Baptists, Society of Friends, and Congregationalists. There are also some members of the Salvation Army, some representation of modern American sects, such as Christian Scientists, Adventists, "Jehovah's Witnesses" and Pentecostals. There are also good numbers of the Brethren, both Open and Exclusive.

Fr. O'Riordan further notes that of the total number of Irish Protestants (1,072,000), over 900,000 live within the political area of Northern Ireland, the six counties therein being Antrim, Down, Armagh, Fermanagh, Tyrone and Derry. That leaves about 160,000 Protestants for the twenty-six counties in the area of the Republic of Ireland (Eire). Of these almost half are in the counties of Dublin and Wicklow. A substantial concentration of the rest must be in the northern border counties of Cavan, Monaghan and Donegal. Apart from West Cork and parts of Tipperary, the general pattern of Protestant life in the remaining parts of Ireland is urban, though there are Protestant farming families, as well as remnants of the old landowning classes, to be found in all parts.

It may be added that Fr. O'Riordan directs attention to the contrasts of occupation. Protestants in the North are in all sorts of occupations, labourers, artisans, factory workers, shopkeepers, professions, trades, management, ownership etc. In the South the Protestants outside Dublin are either farmers, shopkeepers or professional men (apart from the survivors of "the gentry" here and there) and a few of "the leisured class." That means that in Northern Ireland the Protestants are fully part and parcel of the life of the community. In the South in most places their presence or absence is today without significance—except that anywhere an exemplary Christian, though isolated, will have a healthy influence, and may do much good by integrity of character.

* * *

These things apart, Fr. O'Riordan becomes most interesting when he turns to the religious side of Protestantism. He rightly perceives that though we have no "Protestant Church" we have nevertheless a distinctly Protestant outlook on life and faith. The outlook and principles of a Presbyterian will be very similar indeed to the outlook and principles of a member of the Church of Ireland. If there are some misguided individuals who want to suggest that there is a deep difference, they are very few, very stupid, and very wrong. In the North for centuries Protestants of all sorts have freely and honourably inter-married. Members of one Church have joined another without sacrifice of essential principle or forfeiture of faith.

What is this constructive unity (in place of theoretical unity) due to? Fr. O'Riordan says that there is "a basic Protestant faith, a standard Protestantism, which is shared, in varying forms and degrees by Protestants everywhere." He is quite right. But of course we must make certain reservations. We must confine our thoughts to the Protestantism which is traditional in Ireland. That means "evangelical Protestantism"; the Protestantism which is sharply distinguished from the confusions brought among us by Adventists, Russellites, Spiritists and by others that have bawled or whispered their way among us from beyond our shores. This is well recognised by Fr. O'Riordan who is a clear-sighted observer. Yet we regret that he has to say that "basic Protestantism serves to unite Presbyterianism and the Church of Ireland against Rome." No doubt it does, and we shall not find fault with it for doing so. But we want to declare that basic Protestantism has a far more positive effect. It is not merely anti-Roman, or anti-papal (in spite of the slogans). It is plain that Fr. O'Riordan has the Orange Institution in mind here. Even so, we venture to say that his view must be external, and therefore necessarily superficial. An acute sense of the danger Roman Catholic policy entails for the Ulster Protestant tradition and principle does not mean hostility to individuals, or sectarian animus. We know of many generations of neighbourly and familiar intercourse between Roman Catholics and Protestants in Northern Ireland (as in Southern Ireland). We know of continued kindness and interdependence, most creditable to both sides, and based on affection and respect. Many a good Orangeman or Protestant has lived and is still living, and intends to go on living, on the best of terms with his non-Protestant neighbours; and they in turn, have the same intention towards him. Of course there are occasionally the awkward types of persons who disturb things: the hot-headed young, and the cross-grained old who ought to know better. And at the same time it must be said that at this period in our history the young men who plant bombs and booby-traps, and employ the machine-gun against the lawful government in Northern Ireland are not taking a course calculated to lead to the sort of unity Ireland's truest patriots have always sought. Those young men should remember that every round of ammunition loosed off extinguishes in some heart a tender growth of the will to unity and fellowship.

However, this is not at all the purpose of Fr. O'Riordan's valuable paper, which enables us "to see ourselves as others see us." He outlines "the religious content of basic Protestantism." Now this is a matter which, outside Ireland, might be understood quite differently. For instance, a liberal Continental theologian would define basic Protestantism in a way unfamiliar to us. Perhaps there may still be found surviving in England and America, representatives of the old theological liberals who would see things in a light which never dawned on us. We may indicate the basic factors Fr. O'Riordan lays down—

1. The Bible, "the absolute reality. Everything else has only a relative value.
2. The Sense of Sin, "still strong in Protestant piety."
3. Christ, "the Protestant emphasis in the Redemption wrought by Christ is always whole-hearted."
4. Faith. The actual meaning of faith for the Protestant heart is "complete self-surrender to Christ the Saviour." Fr. O'Riordan asks the question (important from the standpoint of his Church's teaching) "can this faith contain within itself true supernatural faith?" He answers "Yes, undoubtedly—and so it can suffice for the salvation of the sincere Protestant, accompanied as it will be by 'an implicit desire' of membership of the true Church." Of course every genuine Protestant desires, or counts himself to be a member of the true Church though he does not see it "seated upon the seven hills." Too rarely do Roman Catholic divines tell their flocks what Fr. O'Riordan candidly acknowledges here. If he, in Clonard Church Belfast, or elsewhere, impresses this upon his hearers he is doing a very great deal to get rid of false ideas, and to foster Christian goodwill.

5. Salvation. The Protestant "tends to look for an emotional experience of salvation." We agree that with certain types of popular preaching, and with certain types of persons this is so. But it is not the necessary view of salvation, and in the representative Protestant churches spiritual moral and rational conviction count in preference to the merely emotional.

6. The Sense of Community. "The sense of fellowship in church life means a lot to the earnest Protestant of the standard type." Honestly, we would have expected Fr. O'Riordan to notice "Protestant individualism" rather than this; and it is most interesting that this factor "the community sense" should strike him. It can be there, we acknowledge, without our conscious thought about it. It is probably true that religious minorities can be more moulded by "community" interests than majorities. We could do with more of it.

* * *

These six points are worth thinking about. Allowing for some modification, or variation of emphasis in individuals, we accept them as a fair statement of Irish Protestantism. Probably the Church of Ireland, while holding fast to the Bible as its rule of faith (Article VI) does not consider it open to individual interpretation, but holds that the understanding of it shall be in conformity with the ancient Creeds of individual Christendom. This, we think, holds good of the Presbyterian Church as well. Yet the authority of the Creeds is that they can be proved by the warrant of Holy Scripture. This is not really an argument in a circle.

The sense of sin must enter into any radical understanding of the Gospel. Our Lord was not Incarnate in order to give us "pep talks" or moral uplift: He came "to give His life a ransom for many." "The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost"—so He said Himself. The sense of sin, and the consequent need to be saved from it, and the acute urgent realisation of that need is inherently Christian.

As to faith: we have no better way of defining a true Protestant's faith than the way Fr. O'Riordan has adopted—"complete self-surrender." It involves no contradiction of the intellectual apprehension of the Christian faith, for it is vital to it so that the whole man may be included.

* * *

Fr. O'Riordan briefly referred to Protestant worship. There are, we all know, great variations in appearance from one church to another. Yet if you compare Morning Prayer in the Church of Ireland, with the Morning Worship on the Lord's Day among the Presbyterians, you may note 1. the same sort of hymns of praise; even the same hymns—2. two lessons of Holy Scripture—3. A sermon—4. one or more of the Psalms of David. What then is left which is different? The Church of Ireland service has liturgical or set form of prayer, while the Presbyterian prayers are extemporary. The Apostles' Creed will be said or sung in the Church of Ireland service: it may or may not be used in the Presbyterian. Thus the differences are far less than one might assume.

"Standard Protestantism" says Fr. O'Riordan, "preserves the factor of sacramental observance in Christian Worship, though in a radically diminished form." We might rejoin "Roman Catholicism preserves the factor of sacramental observance in Christian Worship though in a radically exaggerated form." The point is, "from what norm or standard is our service diminished?" We believe that the "Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper" in the Book of Common Prayer is quite in accord with the form and significance of that Sacrament in the primitive Church. It is not really adequate to describe the Sacrament among orthodox Protestants by the words used by Fr. O'Riordan "to them the memory of Calvary is dear."

* * *

This scrutiny has brought us to the end of the first part of Fr. O'Riordan's lecture. We must defer describing and studying the remainder till next month. Let us say here that it is a deep pleasure to read the work of a man who has aimed at a fair and objective statement of the Protestant outlook on our faith. We know how training deepens inherited prejudices, and how predilections persuade us that we must be right, and that therefore others must be wrong. We admit that in the case of any Church, those inside who look out, and those outside who look in, form different impressions. We think our Roman Catholic commentator has done very well, and we regret that a colloquy is not feasible. Here we leave the matter for the present month.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

RESURRECTION.

The Paschal season once more reminds the Church of God of the facts of Our Redeemer's victory over sin and death. We do not, of course, suggest that the Church is ever unmindful of the resurrection in its present power and glorious prospects. But we are renewed in faith and hope each year as we read the Scriptures which commemorate the rising again from the dead, just as we are renewed in thought and spirit by the return of the season of life and growth after the seeming deadness or impassivity of winter.

We set before our eyes of faith the Cross, whereon the Saviour died, the tomb in which He was laid, the garden with its promise, the empty sepulchre. We dwell in loving meditation upon the fellowship of the road to Emmaus, and upon the unfolding of the Written Word and fact that "it behoved the Christ to suffer these things and to enter into His glory." We remember "how He was known of them in the breaking of the bread," and we seek to know Him in our own obedience to His request "Do this in remembrance of Me." With faith we contemplate the evening meeting in the Upper Room and claim our share of the benediction "Peace be unto you."

Do we look only to the triumph of Our Lord over the grave as the proof that there is a future life? Would we believe in it even if He had not said "Because I live ye shall live also?"—We think it can be shown that while Our Lord gave demonstration to the fact of new life beyond the grave, the belief in the future life is taught even in the Old Testament. It is of course recognised that such belief was not considered a necessary element in Orthodox Jewish faith when Our Lord was on earth. Yet it could have been, and indeed ought to have been, as the following considerations will show.

* * *

1. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (11, 19.) interprets Abraham's unquestioning obedience to the order to sacrifice his son Isaac by saying that he believed that God is able to raise up even from the dead. There is nothing improbable in this, for such belief was characteristic of the most enlightened peoples of the ancient world, and Abraham went from Ur of the Chaldees. We know that Ur was "no mean city," either in wealth or art or understanding. Abraham's faith was not ours, but we may reasonably hold that it was not in contradiction of ours.

* * *

2. In spite of the dramatic debate of Job and his three friends, and the apparent inconclusiveness of the attempt to measure the Almighty's purposes by human understanding, we cannot fail to be struck by Job's testimony "For I know that my vindicator (redeemer) liveth, and that he shall stand up at the last upon the earth: and after my skin hath been thus destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not as a stranger." However imperfect the thought in the mind of Job, it would be sheer scepticism to assert that he had no inkling of a future life.

We can assign no fixed date to the book of Job or to the period represented by it, but if belief in the life beyond death was general among the nations of Western Asia in pre-Christian times, it is more likely that Job shared it than that he denied it. If the book of Job is a parable or allegory rather than a biography, then its author, we must assume, shared the belief.

* * *

3. Our Lord Jesus Christ did not hesitate to observe that Moses had evidence of the future life in that God said to him "I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob." Our Lord said that He is not the God of the dead (which would be utterly meaningless), but of the living. We need not speculate as to how far Moses realised the implications of the words he heard at the burning bush. As a man reared up in Egyptian creed and culture he was not ignorant of theories of human destiny, and we have no reason to consider him or his fellow Hebrews opposed to them. It may be right to direct attention to views expressed in certain psalms about Sheol, the place of the dead, and about its silence. But these were opinions which arose from the general ignorance of the conditions under which "the dead" existed. Progress of thought, and increasing light were to be expected, and at length gave us the positive faith we find in Daniel and in Pharisee theology.

* * *

4. We shall offset the reference in the Psalms to Sheol by this passage from Psalm 16—

"I have set the Lord always before me:

"Because He is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.

"Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth:

"My flesh also shall dwell in safety.

"For Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol;

"Neither wilt Thou suffer Thine holy one to see corruption.

"Thou wilt show me the path of life:

"In Thy presence is fulness of joy;

"In Thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.

Whatever the date of this Psalm it testifies to a faith which is akin to the Christian conviction of fuller life beyond, not within, the tomb.

Can we pass by the familiar line "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever" as though it meant nothing?

Could Psalm 30 have been written if the Author had not had some realisation that death is not the end?—"O Lord, Thou hast brought up my soul from Sheol."

If Psalm 39 is thought pessimistic, it is amply balanced by Psalm 91.

Can we treat as wellnigh meaningless for our purpose the following verses of Psalm 73?—

"... I am continually with Thee.

"Thou hast holden my right hand.

"Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory.

"Whom have I in heaven but Thee?

"And there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee.

"My flesh and my heart faileth:

"But God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever."

Let us remember also that one of the Psalms says of God—"Though I go down into Sheol, Thou art there also." God is everywhere; He cannot be escaped; neither can His people lose Him.

* * *

5. If the Psalms give us an expression of religious faith which inevitably led to religious hope, and which is inexplicable without some realisation of life beyond death, the first part of the prophet Isaiah makes definite and positive man's belief in the future life. It is to be noted that chapter 26 is in Isaiah, not in Deutero-Isaiah (for the occasion we may use the conventional term which indicates the theory that there are two parts of Isaiah, separated by a long interval of time), and in this chapter we read—

"Thy dead shall live; my dead bodies shall arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust: for thy dew is as the dew of light, and the earth shall cast forth the dead" (verse 19.). L. Elliott Binns (The New Commentary, p. 451) wrote of this verse "The Lord will restore to them the faithful dead, and so will the nation be enlarged." The expectation may have been that the dead will be brought back to life on earth. Even so, this is a recognition of a current of faith in Israel that death is not extinction. Of verse 19, the same writer very cautiously permits himself to write "it seems to teach a resurrection of the righteous." It is true that the references to resurrection in the Old Testament are few. But enough is said to show that all the elements were present to lead to a fuller and richer faith. That fuller and richer faith came before the Incarnation. F. C. Burkitt has put it briefly—"It was the struggle with Antiochus Epiphanes, the cruelty of the persecutors, and above all the constancy of the martyrs, who died then for their God and His Law without hope of reward, that convinced faithful Jews that "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt: And here also the decisive factor was not a philosophic doctrine, but an unshakable conviction that the judge of all the earth would 'do right.'"

No matter what date we assign to the book of Daniel (or to the actual portion of it quoted by Dr. Burkitt), the fact is that the philosophic doctrine of natural immortality was not the source of Jewish faith (and is not the ground of Christian faith), but rather the ethical conviction that the extinction of the souls made in His image is not compatible with the righteous loving nature of God Who has declared "All souls are Mine." The spirit of man does not cease to be when physical death comes—"the spirit doth return to God Who gave it"—"all live unto Him." We do not continue everlastingly as ideas in the mind of God, or as divine memories. We continue, for Our Lord Himself said "Because I live, ye shall live also."

We know that some Old Testament critics used to hold that the chapters 24 to 27 of Isaiah were not that prophet's work but were interpolated

Sellin (Intro. to O.T.), for example says "not only does the language diverge completely from that of the Isaiah discourses, but there is a whole set of religious ideas which are wholly foreign to this prophet." Sellin can only suggest that these chapters were composed by some unknown hero (whom he profoundly respects) after the Exile: how soon or how long after, he cannot say. Now even if the supposition is correct (which we do not admit) that these chapters are non-Isaian, they nevertheless testify to a belief in a future resurrection among the Jews. Whether Isaiah's or not, the words are in the Old Testament. That is the point at the moment, and it stands firm independently of any theory of authorship. As the post-Exile period (the Exile is a convenient historical landmark in the O.T. as well as a most significant theological landmark) is taken to run from about 520 B.C. we may consider that the evidence is quite ancient. But further, some scholars think that the passage has reference to King Sennacherib. If so, the date is far earlier than Judah's Exile to Babylon. It would go back to more than a century earlier. All this sort of enquiry is interesting to scholars, both conservative and liberal. But for us the important matter is that the Scriptures of the Old Testament under the Holy Spirit's enlightenment give us sufficient information about Israel's faith, and in that faith there was hope of a future life.

* * *

6. We have already referred to the words of Daniel 12, verse 2. Verse 3 awakens a response in every quickened, reborn heart "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." That emphasis upon the ethical and spiritual marks one of the glories of Israel's thought; for the holiness and goodness of God, and of His Law, established the first principle of Israel's faith. The righteous rise to eternal life, because it can be said of them, as of their Redeemer, that God raised them up, having loosed the pangs of death because it was not possible that they should be held by it (Acts, 2, 24). To be "in Christ" is the Christian's secret of eternal life, and Israel's hopes through the centuries prepared the way.

Reference may be made to Hosea 13, verse 14. Whether we express the first half of the verse as a declaration or as a question will depend more on our critical prejudices than on our willingness to read the Old Testament for what it says, instead of reading with already formed views.

The fact is that Our Lord tells us how to understand the spiritual messages of the Old Testament. No Christian is entitled to leave His instruction out of account.

Naturally the New Testament is full of the Resurrection. None of its writers; no believer in Jesus; no hearer of an apostle is left to depend on a philosophic doctrine of the immortality of the soul, or upon the limited revelation of the Old Testament. All rests upon the fact of the Risen Lord. The credentials of our Gospel are the Empty Tomb, and the glorious Forty Days between the first Easter Morning and the Ascension. St. Paul makes that very clear in 1 Corinthians 15, 4-8, where he records the post-Resurrection appearances of Our Lord before the Ascension. What more do we need, when we are constantly confirming the fact of His Resurrection by our experience of His indwelling Holy Spirit? We remember that it was said that the Holy Spirit was not given to the people of God before Our Lord was glorified in His rising from the dead and ascension into heaven. That the Comforter is now abiding with us, and will abide for ever, is proof that the Lord Who sends Him is now at the Father's right hand.

* * *

We regret the base suggestion of a modern sect that Our Lord's Body mouldered in some unknown grave, or dissolved into the atmosphere. We demand a frank recognition of Our Saviour's words to Thomas on the Second Lord's day after His triumph over death "Reach hither thy finger and see My hands; and reach hither thy hand and put it into My side: and be not faithless but believing." If the old folly of Docetism be revived in our day by those who are not able to recognise that their "new truths" are but ancient discredited errors, we request an explanation of the Lord's own statement "See My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself: handle Me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye behold Me having" (Luke 24, 39-40).

* * *

The Church of Christ faced the world of sin, unbelief, and enmity with no weapon. It challenged the human race with a faith and a promise that in Christ, risen and glorified and returning, is the answer to all our problems, the healing of all our hurt, the cleansing from sin, and the power to have victory over every evil. The Church's avowed object is to bring all things into subjection to Christ because we know that only in His service can we reach our highest good and keep it. He is our demonstration and object-lesson of the reconciling love of God, and His is the Precious Blood which paid sin's price.

The prophet cried, long centuries before, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God." The apostle writes "He is our peace... He came and preached peace to them that were afar off, and peace to them that were nigh" (Ephesians 2, 14-17).

"Now Our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and God the Father which loved us and gave us eternal comfort and good hope through grace, comfort your hearts and stablish them in every good work and word" (2 Thess. 2, 16.)—this prayer may be confidently offered, because "Christ is risen": "death hath no more dominion over Him" or us.

"THE OXFORD DICTIONARY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH."

To the Editor,

Dear Sir,

This massive volume published last year under the editorship of Dr. F. L. Cross, a Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford calls for some comment from the standpoint of a member of the Church of Ireland.

The contributors number about one hundred, and all but about sixteen are members of the Church of England. The work is most comprehensive: so much so that even the least of the official garments of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics is duly described. But of course the more important topics are treated of with competence. The books of the Bible are commented on; historical and liturgical matters are discussed; a wealth of biographical material is provided; and the activities of numerous religious communions are outlined.

However, what struck me forcibly when reading the list of contributors was that no Irish theological or historical scholar has shared in the labour of producing this book of almost fifteen hundred pages. When I turned to an examination of the articles concerned with Ireland it became plain that the producers had sadly blundered in not obtaining the assistance or guidance of someone who knew the history of Ireland and her churches. It is painfully clear that as far as a Dictionary of the Christian church is concerned, Ireland, whether Presbyterian or Methodist or Anglican is of too little consequence to merit aught but careless, inaccurate, and inadequate treatment. I do not complain of brevity, but of blunders. I list some of my detections so that your readers may see the justification I have for my criticisms.

I see a reference under "Armagh" to "the Counts of Armagh" who "during the unsettlement of the Norman invasions" usurped the revenues of the See of Armagh. The date given is 1021-1105. That means during a period beginning 150 years before the Norman invasions, for King Henry II and the Normans did not come till about 1170. If, the writer meant "the Norsemen" why didn't he say so? Maybe he thought there was no difference! History does not relate, as far as I know the story of those eminent persons "the Counts of Armagh." I suspect they were a blunder for some quite different people.

In regard to Irish Roman Catholicism we are told that they were granted freedom of worship in 1791 and of education in 1793. On another page ("Catholic Relief Acts") we read that an act of 1778 gave them these things, at least in a substantial measure. On Trinity College, Dublin, it is said that religious tests were abolished in 1873. It should have been said that many of the tests had been given up during the previous 80 years. To students of the career of Cardinal Newman it will be a surprise to learn that he was in Dublin as head of Dublin University! Even very superficial knowledge of Newman would show that he was in Dublin as head of the new "Catholic University," not of course of the Protestant Dublin University which is in fact old Trinity College which didn't abolish its religious tests, we are told, till 1873—nearly twenty years after Newman's time in Ireland!

On the early Irish saint, Kevin, we read that he first settled in Refert, and later settled in Glendalough. This is pardonable I suppose, for one who had not visited the site might not know that Refert is in Glendalough, which is a Wicklow glen, not a single spot.

We perceive that Dean Swift is included though his importance in regard to the Christian Church is almost nil, while his archbishop, Wm. King, who is really important, is omitted.

No worthwhile note is included on Irish Presbyterianism, and far less important people than Dr. Henry Cooke and Dr. Henry Montgomery are listed—at least that is my opinion.

A very common error is found in the statement that the Church of Ireland clergyman, the Rev. John Nelson Darby, founded "the Brethren." Mr. Darby joined the Brethren at an early stage.

We read that "impelled by Missionary Zeal" St. Columba went from Ireland to Iona. That was not the motive for his exile which is traditionally and no doubt rightly given. Also, Skene ("Celtic Scotland") suggests another reason—the interests of the Irish colony in the West of Scotland.

St. Patrick as set before us by the latest scholarship is scarcely to be looked for in the account given in the Dictionary, which is largely traditional, though qualified by many a "perhaps" and "probably." The statement that Patrick tried to raise the standard of scholarship scarcely accords with the only thing we know about his own scholarship. He apologised for his "rusticity."

These, Sir, are a few things I have noted. If Ireland is included at all, it ought to be on a better level of scholarship.

Yours,
Presbyter.

WHY MIXED MARRIAGES FAIL.

An American Point of View
("Protestant Action," Toronto).

Statistics reveal that more mixed marriages end in failure than do marriages between persons of the same religion. Common observation confirms the statistics and adds that many homes that are not actually broken by religious differences all too often could be well described in the words of Shylock's daughter: "Our house is hell!"

Roman Catholic priests and Protestant pastors are in perfect agreement on at least one point: They solemnly warn their respective groups against the perils of mixed marriages. Pope Leo XIII echoed the voice of many other popes and prelates when he wrote in his Encyclical "On Christian Marriage":

"Care also must be taken that they do not easily enter into a marriage with those who are not Catholic for, when minds do not agree as to the observances of religion, it is scarcely possible to hope for agreement in other things."

A popular Roman Catholic magazine says that priests warn their people from the pulpit against mixed marriages two or three times a year, although the same publication admits that the priests are fighting a losing battle in this respect. It asserts that it is no exaggeration to say that the Roman Church in the United States has lost millions of practising Catholics through mixed marriages.

All the major Protestant denominations have pamphlets pointing out the dangers of mixed marriages. For the most part, however, Protestant ministers do not often speak of the matter from the pulpit. Hence there are many Protestants who are ignorant of the stringent regulations with which Rome has hedged marriage and the means she takes to enforce them.

Two Grave Dangers

Roman Catholic warnings against mixed marriages stress the danger that the Roman Catholic partners runs of losing his or her faith and blighting the spiritual welfare of their children. Protestants on the other hand, generally emphasize the peril to the future happiness of the couple and the peace of their home. Both risks are real and should be carefully considered by young people contemplating marriage with a person of another religion. A secular mass circulation magazine, "The Redbook" for October, 1956, remarks: "An interfaith marriage is inevitably subject to more strain and stress than a marriage between persons of the same faith." Many of them that began so gaily and lightheartedly end in disillusionment and heartbreak.

Young blood runs hot. Flying in the face of all this sage advice that is based on statistics, observation and past experience, a great many young people, Roman Catholic and Protestant alike, pay more heed to beckoning romance than to hoary wisdom. Only rarely can the passionate surge of youthful love be brought down to the solid ground of hard fact by the cold arguments of reason. Religious training and theological reasoning are too often doomed to fight a losing battle against the romantic attachment of a boy and girl in the delirious throes of love. It is true that the vanquished forces of childhood teaching and of religious conviction may re-awake after the first blush of romance has faded into the light of common day, but by then it is too late. The knot has been tied, the time for free choice is past. The young couple must settle down to make the best of a difficult situation. Happy are they, if they are not held in the iron vice of a legal contract duly signed, sealed and delivered at an unreasoning moment when neither one nor the other knew nor cared what they were signing, but which is now held by the priests and the in-laws as a threat over their heads.

One Out of Five Is a Mixed Marriage

Some idea of the prevalency of mixed marriages is given by the "Redbook" magazine, quoted above, which estimates that one out of every five marriages in the United States is made between persons of different faiths. It adds: "This means there are more than 300,000 interfaith marriages each year, and millions of children are growing up with a dual religious heritage . . . The latest, Catholic Directory . . . shows that 30 per cent. of all (R.C.) Church marriages are interfaith. About another 15 per cent. take place outside the (R.C.) Church." In view of such statistics as these, it is surely the duty of Protestant ministers to speak plainly to their young people. The time to speak is before, not after, they have started keeping company with Roman Catholics. Sunday school teachers and parents should be informed on the dangers that beset Protestants who marry Roman Catholics, and warn the boys and girls before it is too late. It is a good thing to have pamphlets on this subject available and to put them into hands of those who in the next ten years will in all likelihood go through the interesting and important process of falling in love and being married.

In this field as almost nowhere else, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Indeed, there is rarely a cure for this business of falling in love, even when the prospective life's partner belongs to a church that makes outrageous exactions as the price of married love. Infatuated young lovers lightly disregard all exhortations and arguments with ingenuous statements such as: "He is different from all others; we shall be able to get along where others failed."

Or the ardent young Protestant swain protests with sincere fervour, as blind as Cupid: "There never was another girl like this; she would not allow any trouble to arise about religious differences or obey the dictates of her priests." Only when it is too late will the young lovers be finally disillusioned.

(To be continued)

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 39.

Comment

Mr. Ralph Hines writes: "The Republic of Colombia, with a population of about ten millions, is reportedly 99 per cent. Roman Catholic. What has been written above vividly describes its condition. A common saying among the people, concerning the priests, is, "Hear their Mass, and keep out of their way." The Evangelical Church in Colombia has continued to grow in sufficient numbers to alarm the Roman hierarchy, and as a result there is a planned pattern of persecutions over the whole country.

—"The Bulwark," January, 1958.

* * *

Too Deep A Mourning?

The condemnation of the Bishop of Prato by an Italian court for defamation of character seems to have shattered the atmosphere of prudent calm which usually envelops the Vatican. The Pope has cancelled the celebrations for the anniversary of his coronation, general mourning has been decreed in the archdiocese of Bologna, and the sufferings of the Bishop are being compared to those of Roman Catholic prelates in China and Eastern Europe. A 40,000-lire fine is a cheap form of martyrdom, and the Court leaned over backwards to show respect for the Bishop and his office. It would be interesting to hear the comments of a Polish or Chinese bishop on their colleague's ordeal. And, as if this were not enough, the lamentation is to spread to other countries. In Dublin the Apostolic Nunciature has announced cancellation of its plans to celebrate the Pope's anniversary next week. Are others to follow? It can hardly escape notice that in almost any country where citizens are deemed to have equal rights the bishop's words would have been found defamatory. It may be true that Signor Bellandi and his wife were provocative in arranging their civil wedding for a Sunday morning and in holding their reception in a café opposite the cathedral. But the Bishop's retort with a public denunciation of "scandalous concubinage" went too far, and his attempt to shelter behind the Concordat of 1929 will not really hold water. Civil marriage exists in Italy, and violent attacks on those who prefer to do without a religious ceremony are certainly contrary to the spirit of the agreement at present existing between Church and State. What would happen if an English or a French Roman Catholic bishop behaved in this way? The fact seems to be that the Bishop of Prato was attempting to veto a right granted to Italian citizens by the laws of the country.

While the Bellandi case has been going on proceeding have been started against a French author, M. Roger Peyrefitte, for defamation of the Pope in an article published in "Paese Sera." Evidently the Vatican is in a sensitive mood. However, a prickly assertion of papal rights is no more likely to achieve any success now than it has been at any other period of history. All it will do is to embarrass and perhaps weaken the Italian Government; and it will certainly create more anti-clericalism. That is the more of a pity at a time when every Church ought, without needless breach of civil liberties, to be taking its stand on public issues. "Questi infallibilisti mi faranno fallire"—these infallibilists will make me bankrupt—Pius IX said at the time of the Lateran Council. His successor might draw the moral.

—"Manchester Guardian," 7/3/58.

False Witnesses of Jehovah

Of all the sects that have sprung up in recent years, none is more active and energetic in spreading its peculiar tenets than the so-called "Jehovah's Witnesses." A searching analysis of their teaching such as that given by Dr. J. B. Rowell in his recent pamphlet "The Deity of Jesus Christ" is therefore all the more welcome. Several of the chapters of this book have appeared in the "Sunday School Times."

In the first section the author points out that the so-called "Jehovah's Witnesses" and infidels agree in taking the crown of deity from Jesus Christ. The followers of "Pastor" Russell and "Judge" Rutherford teach that Christ is one with Jehovah only in the sense that Christ and the members of His body are one, that is "one in agreement, purpose and organization." Thomas Paine and modern deniers of the Bible state the very same doctrine: "He was the son of God in like manner that every other person is." (Thomas Paine, "The Age of Reason").

Dr. Rowell established the teaching of Scripture as to the Deity of our Lord on many plain and unmistakable passages from both Testaments, and he then goes on to examine some of the controverted passages which the modern heretics, like their predecessors of old, the Arians of the third century, used to confuse the simple. We heartily recommend this scholarly, scriptural study to all our readers.

While the "Jehovah's Witnesses" agree at this point with the modern 'liberals' and the ancient Arians, they also find common ground with their sworn enemies, the Roman Catholics who, while teaching the deity of Christ, manage to relegate Him to a secondary position by pushing Mary, His mother according to the flesh, into the place of her son as mediatrix and co-redemptrice. The answer to the perverted teachings of both Rome and Rutherford et al, is the Word of God. The sole and only way of salvation will not be found in the Roman Church nor in the hierarchical organization that centres in Brooklyn, New York, but in Jesus Christ as our Divine Lord and Saviour; Who died for us, the just for the unjust to bring us to God.

(The above article reviews "The Deity of Jesus Christ our Lord" by Dr. J. B. Rowell, 350 Foul Bay Road, Victoria, B.C. No price noted.)

—"Protestant Action," Toronto, August, '57.

Israel's Population

This year marks the tenth anniversary of the emergence of Israel as an independent State. It has been a decade of astonishing achievement, a record of progress that has falsified many of the pessimistic predictions uttered ten years ago. The growth of the population is not the least of the impressive list of successes. At the end of 1957 the population numbered 1,976,000, an increase of 103,000 over the previous year. Of this total 1,760,000 are Jews, an increase of 95,000. Jewish natural increase last year was the highest since 1951. Immigrants during 1957 numbered 71,000, exceeding 1956 by 16,000. As more than 30,000 immigrants are expected this year, it is evident that the population will very shortly reach two million. When we recall that less than fifty years ago there were only 80,000 Jews in all Palestine, it is not surprising that students of the prophetic Scriptures, both Christian and Jewish, see in the return of such large numbers to the Land of Promise, the fulfilment of inspired predictions.

—"The Christian," 14-2-1958.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—O—

For the Church of Ireland Position

Read

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the
Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH

*"If I take the wings of the morning,
and dwell in the uttermost parts of the
sea. Even there shall Thy hand lead me."*

Just published:

Selections from the Scriptures in Arë-
Arë for the Arë-Arë, Koio, and Dorio
peoples.

This little book of 193 pages contains selected chapters and portions from the Old and New Testaments in the language of people of the Solomon Islands. It is the first issue of the Scriptures in these dialects. The Solomon Islands are off the N.E. coast of Australia.

Produced by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 5—LXVII

DUBLIN, MAY, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	49
Review	50
A Fresh View of Thomas Cranmer	51
Editor's Chair	54
Why Mixed Marriages Fail	57

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

The Roman Church And Liberty—French Archbishop's Pastoral Letter.

Paris, January 31.

Cardinal Felin, the Archbishop of Paris, has issued a pastoral letter on the Roman Catholic Church and liberty. After declaring that obedience to the Church which is not freely and consciously given is a caricature of Christian obedience, he goes on to the more delicate subjects—the liberty of Catholic laymen working in one of the Catholic Action organisations to choose methods of apostleship, that of the scientist to announce his conclusions, and that of the citizen faced with ecclesiastical guidance in politics.

Of the first he says that though the members of Catholic Action enjoy wide liberty of choice of means it is the hierarchy that chooses the general direction. The cardinal certainly has in mind the attitude of the lay readers of an important branch of French Catholic Action who all resigned when the episcopate directed that they should insist as members of Catholic Action on the strictly religious aspect of Christianity and not so much as they had done on the political and social implications of Christian ethics (explicitly admitted by the bishops to be also important).

Of science the cardinal says that the Church encourages all research on the basis of modern scientific achievements but that she can point out final errors that may arise in the course of scientific research and can ask a Catholic, for reasons of opportunity, to abandon a position which, even if acceptable when presented with all the necessary provisos, may in the immediate circumstances be wrongly interpreted by most people and trouble many minds.

Here many Frenchmen will think the archbishop has in mind the posthumous works published without imprimatur by the great Jesuit palaeontologist, Father Teilhard de Chardin. In these works, which only circulated privately during his lifetime, the author tried to harmonise Catholic theology with modern scientific conclusions about the origin and development of the material universe, of animal life, and of man. His works have enjoyed remarkably big sales for such stiff reading—one of them has sold over 50,000 copies. The Vatican has recently instructed French seminaries and religious institutions to exclude them from their libraries.

Finally, the archbishop said that the faithful must try to understand what exactly the Church means when it intervenes in politics. A firm order must be obeyed. But when the Church intervenes with advice, with reminders of principle, and with fatherly indication, the attitude of the Christian should be that of prudence. Unless he is himself a specialist with a deep knowledge of the question under discussion he will take care to avoid dissociating himself from a position which, though not obligatory, has in its favour the prudent option of the Church.

—"Manchester Guardian," 1/2/'58.

* * *

Japanese Church Has 300 Members.

Rt. Rev. F. H. Wilkinson, Bishop of Toronto, confirmed 20 candidates at the Japanese Church of St. Andrew's, Dufferin St., recently. They were presented by Rev. Ken Imai, Japanese pastor of the church.

Bishop Wilkinson congratulated the church on having become the largest Anglican-Episcopal Japanese congregation outside Japan, exceeding in membership even Los Angeles and Vancouver.

The church started ten years ago with four members. Now attendance sometimes reaches 300. Rev. Mr. Imai came from Japan five years ago when membership was 25. Most of the members are converts from Buddhism.

[We print the above paragraph from "The Sentinel" (Feb. '58) as evidence of the effect of Christian Witness to "the stranger within our gates."]

* * *

Whither Japan?

Nowadays we get little news from Japan.

What little news we get is not very encouraging. Our missionaries have been going there for a century or more but the response is not great. Seemingly, the people are very worldly and do not respond to Christian teaching. Judging by an article in "The Times" from their Tokyo Correspondent demoralisation has set in with a vengeance. British readers of this report, whether religious or not, must be thankful for what Christianity has done for our beloved land. "Salacious books," says this Correspondent, "are sold almost openly" and there is no religious background to counter this onslaught. The few Japanese who come to our shores today must be impressed by our moral status. Public opinion here is very powerful and has a strong Christian backing. For which we ought to be grateful.

[This paragraph, from "The Churchman's Magazine" London, March 1958, shows us the need of firm Christian testimony at home and abroad "against the world, the flesh, and the devil."]

* * *

Protestant Churches In Malta.

Sir Kenneth Grubb, with the support of the Archbishop of Canterbury, has rendered a useful service by drawing the attention of the Church Assembly to the denial of full liberty to Protestant Churches in Malta. Sir Kenneth had put down a motion expressing concern over the extent to which Anglican and other religious bodies continue to suffer discriminating disabilities, and called upon the authorities of the Church of England to make it clear that no scheme of integration of Malta with Britain could be acceptable which did not include sufficient guarantees for religious freedom in Malta. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who regarded the matter as both important and urgent, pointed out that although the principles of religious liberty had been for many years enshrined in the Constitution of Malta, yet Anglicans and other religious bodies had "often and grievously" suffered denials of their proper liberties. He added that the Colonial Office had been very unwilling to give help or encouragement in the claim for rights and equalities in the matter of religious freedom. It is evident that if our brethren in Malta are to secure their constitutional rights in any scheme

(Continued on p. 58.)

REVIEW.

"The Message of the Scrolls" Yigael Yadin, (Weidenfeld and Nicholson, London, pp. 190, 18/-).

The author of this book has several claims to distinction—he is a lecturer in Archaeology at the University of Jerusalem; he has been a General in the Israeli forces; and he is the son of the late Professor E. L. Sukenik who first recognised the antiquity and the significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls, and bought the first three complete manuscripts for the Hebrew University. Some people may think that we have had enough for the present on the topic of these ancient documents, which made a sensation which still reverberates, when they were found by Bedonius in a cave at Qumran near the Dead Sea. But they are important, and their full significance has scarcely been grasped. Much depends upon their date—whether they are pre-Christian, or post-Christian. Further, the religious sect to which they belonged (thought to be Essenes) remains unidentified in any final sense.

We need a steady flow of scholarly work on the contents and date and interpretation of the Scrolls, for confused and erroneous theories have been hastily constructed about them, and imprudently published. For instance, a short interesting account in an American pocket-book series, by an American Unitarian, has been severely criticised by Dr. Rowley of Manchester (Rylands Library). Dr. Rowley is probably the most competent scholar in these islands in the field of Hebrew and allied studies. The Unitarian writer typically argued for the dependence of Christianity in its origins on the Dead Sea Sect, and suggested that Christian scholars were not too anxious to face the implications of this dependence. Dr. Rowley had no difficulty in showing that serious scholars were not suppressing anything, but were not prepared to jump at conclusions. To be constantly rushing to attack historic Christianity and its credentials is not a sign of scholarship. In spite of Dr. Rowley's correction of such hasty and unscholarly work, we read in a Unitarian article lately, the claim that unlike other sorts of Christians, Unitarians were not hesitating to face the challenge to a reconsideration of Christian origins which is rendered necessary by the scrolls. To put a slur upon the honesty of orthodox Christians is unseemly; and when there is no scholarship to back it up, it is inexcusable.

Another popular book (also an American pocket-edition) is by the New York journalist Edmund Wilson. It is very readable and has a first-hand account of a visit to Qumran. A third is by Dr. Allegro of Manchester University, who is a good Semitic scholar. But it is to be remembered that no conclusions about the relationship of the Sect to Christianity should be accepted, for they are all conjecture so far. The problems created by the discoveries are not to be solved by short-cuts.

Of course General Yadin's book is a history, and is different from some we have referred to. He knows the problems and he is on the spot, and is content to tell us a remarkable story of the efforts to buy the scrolls in Bethlehem amid the barbed wire and armed men of the Arab-Jewish frontier. The efforts to buy them across the Atlantic where some of the scrolls are in a Wall Street strong-room and are perhaps the most remarkable commodity ever advertised and purchased in that centre of high finance. We read how an Orthodox Archbishop took some of the scrolls to America, and how they were bought by Professor Sukenik with funds provided by Jewish friends, and so brought back to Palestine and to the University.

We read too of the "monastery" of Qumran, and of the ancient history of the area, and of its destruction by the Roman soldiers.

What message, even of an interim kind do we receive from General Yadin's book? We learn that the scrolls contain (among other valuable matters) the Hebrew of the prophet Isaiah, a commentary on Habbakuk, a commentary on the Psalms, and on Nahum. Now the oldest Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament prior to these discoveries dated no further back than the year 895 A.D. All older MSS. had disappeared. The MSS. of 895 A.D. and since, are all Masoretic. That means that the square Hebrew letters have the points which are vowel marks. These vowel marks are no part of the original writings. They were provided by copyists for the convenience of those who had to read the Scriptures aloud. They marked the traditional pronunciation of the words. The new discovery of the Isaiah scroll was compared with the usual Hebrew text we all hear. Here are General Yadin's words—"There is no question that the overwhelming significance of the texts lies in the fact that these scrolls which are about a thousand years older than any Hebrew text hitherto discovered, vary only slightly from the text as it is known to us and used to-day. It thus proves the antiquity—and authenticity of the Masoretic text."

From the Masoretic text we have our translations of the Old Testament into the various languages of to-day. This is a great vindication of the scholars, Jewish and Christian who defended the trustworthiness of the Hebrew O.T.

General Yadin ends by saying "research on the scrolls is still in its initial stages." He says of the story of the scrolls "it is far from over. The fruits of continued research will long affect the pattern of our knowledge about the Bible."

A FRESH VIEW OF THOMAS CRANMER.

("The Life of Thomas Cranmer" Theodore Maynard, Staples Press Ltd., London, 1956; pp. 214.)

Mr. Maynard is, we believe, a lapsed Presbyterian. He joined the Roman Catholic Church some years ago in his native U.S.A. Since then he has written several books on aspects of his new faith. We have read one of them "Saints for Our Times," a series of sketches of Christians who have been canonised at Rome. It is an interesting book, but we hope that Mr. Maynard has not so forgotten his upbringing as to ignore the fact that real saints are far more numerous than the official list at Rome shows. All denominations of Christians have their saints, which is a fact to teach us that no Christian denomination fails to receive a measure of the grace of sanctity. If it be said that only the saints canonised at Rome have proved their holiness by the miracles they have wrought, we can but answer that "the mighty acts of God" are in the main unknown to the world. All Roman Catholic saints may have been instruments of grace and healing without publicity, for we do not investigate such matters and have no predisposition to make much of them.

* * *

However, our concern now is not with Mr. Maynard's "saints," but with his "Thomas Cranmer," who never came near being canonised by either England or Rome. It is possible, if he had been put to death by King Henry VIII rather than by his daughter Queen Mary, he might, like St. Thomas More and John Fisher (two of Henry's victims), have been canonised. As it was, Cranmer died as a Protestant martyr, not as a Roman Catholic one.

* * *

What strikes us about this book is that it is not a historian's work. Far too much conjecture is employed when ascertainable facts are not to hand. If evidence is wanting Mr. Maynard can say so, and yet supply a supposition in order to make a point. An instance of this method is the way in which he tells the story of Cranmer's first marriage. Cranmer, then a layman, married the young relation of the landlord of the Dolphin Inn in Cambridge. Foxe, a contemporary, described her as "a gentleman's daughter." Mr. Maynard says she couldn't have been; and persists that she was a barmaid. We know so little about the affairs of minor "gentry" in the Tudor period that we have no ground for assuming that a gentleman's daughter might not be an orphan sheltered by a relation who kept an inn. A sixteenth century innkeeper in the University town of Cambridge is not necessarily the same as a twentieth century saloon-keeper in New York.

In another connection Mr. Maynard, faced by dearth of evidence writes "Here one is obliged to do some guessing." We beg to disagree. The writer of history and biography may do some guessing (in which case he is no historian), but he cannot be obliged to. No wonder we have such travesties circulating in place of truth, religious or otherwise! We cannot see why men cannot say "we don't know," instead of endlessly pretending that they do know, and hoping that their readers' ignorance will equal their own.

Generally Mr. Maynard writes with a slightly patronising, if kindly, tone where Cranmer's character is involved. We have no inclination to make a hero of the first reformed Archbishop of Canterbury: he was not cast in a heroic mould, and the question "Art thou come to the Kingdom for such a time as this?" could only be asked of him with an element of surprise. Yet Cranmer had much solid achievement to his credit when he was put to death by Queen Mary—the Bible in English owes much to him. The Book of Common Prayer is largely his workmanship. He cleared the sacramental doctrine of the Church of mediaeval error, and he restored the ancient Catholic principles of the priesthood to the Church of England.

On the Bible Mr. Maynard writes "We must remember that there was no objection to an English translation of the Scripture—as a general matter—but only to a particular version. Never must we imagine that Wycliffe's translation—circulated only in manuscripts, and for that reason, only in sections—was the first translation to appear. Sir Thomas More wrote that he had often seen English translations of the Bible in the hands of good Catholics." Now here we have, we believe, a very false account of the English translation. We are sure that Mr. Maynard's guides (i.e. the book or books he consulted) misled him into serious error. The late Cardinal Gasquet, many of whose claims to scholarship were dissipated by Dr. Coulton, quoted the words of Sir Thos. More to prove the existence, before the Reformation, of episcopally approved translations of the Vulgate Bible. It has been shown by the authorities on the Wycliffe writings that Sir Thos. More was mistaken in thinking that the tall fair copies he saw were non-Wycliffe (or Lollard) translations. There has never been a trace of non-Lollard, pre-Reformation, episcopally approved English translations. Prior to Wycliffe there was an Anglo-Saxon version of part of the Bible, but that was not English. Anyhow, if Sir Thomas More had been right, what evidence would we have that the copies he saw were pre-Wycliffe?

We had thought this old mistake had been abandoned. Those who wish to study this matter may consult Miss Margaret Deansley's "The Lollard Bible."

* * *

The downfall of Henry's chief minister and vicar-general, Thomas Cromwell, was a blow to Cranmer who was under certain obligations to the statesman. It appears that Cranmer paid £40 a year to Cromwell. Why he did this no one, so far, knows. Cranmer while in Germany in the English embassy to the Emperor (and only an archdeacon at the time) had married a German lady, niece of a leading reformer. The marriage was not canonical, but such marriages were common. It is definitely insinuated by Mr. Maynard that the £40 was a bribe to Cromwell to keep his mouth shut about the existence of a Mrs. Cranmer. He can think of no other explanation. We can think of several other explanations—1. Legal and administrative assistance of unspecified kinds, 2. An allowance transmitted through Cromwell, 3. A repayment of money lent by Cromwell (the cost of becoming archbishop of Canterbury was very great), and Cromwell was a close friend of the archbishop. If it be replied that we have no record of why this annual charge existed for one of the suggested purposes, we may admit it. But we have no evidence for Mr. Maynard's theory either. What right has he to settle the matter thus—"Whatever Cranmer's reason, it does look as though that £40 a year had something to do with Margaret of Nuremberg"? It looks that way because Mr. Maynard wants it to do so.

* * *

When Cranmer was threatened (for an unknown reason, though heresy was suggested) by a trial at the Council, it is recorded that Henry gave him a royal signet ring as a token to show that he was guaranteed immunity. Mr. Maynard writes "Morice, as touched up by Foxe, is our authority, so perhaps all this should be taken with a grain of salt." Thus our author can be slightly sceptical where other people's narratives are involved. We shall be pardoned if we in turn are slightly sceptical over some of his theories.

It is, nevertheless, remarkable that during the reign of King Henry, Cranmer escaped any serious danger, and so he must have had royal protection. Even when his friend Cromwell fell he remained secure. The explanation is that he was the King's attached friend. Kings need personal friends as ordinary people do.

* * *

Mr. Maynard, while tracing Cranmer's drift into "heresy" (as he understands it), speaks highly and worthily of the archbishop's liturgical achievements. Of the English Litany (1545) he says it "well deserves all the admiration it has received . . . One must admit that it is a great work of literature."

The advance of reformed ideas was accelerated under King Edward VI. Mr. Maynard says "When on March 8, 1548 the Order of the Communion appeared and was made obligatory by Parliament, it was not merely a translation into English of the Communion as it is in the Latin Mass, but was modelled by Cranmer upon what the Archbishop of Cologne who had recently gone over to Lutheranism, had devised. Yet it took in many people, as was obviously intended."

Mr. Maynard gives as his authority (we suppose for the deception intended) the Rev. P. Hughes, a Roman Catholic priest and historical writer, in his "The Reformation in England." But the facts following show how wrong it is to say that there was a purpose "to take in" the people. 1. The preface to the "order of the Communion" explains the purpose behind in the words "that from time to time we may be encouraged further to travail for the reformation and setting forth of godly orders"—no deception here! 2. The Cup was directed to be administered to the communicant. It is impossible to mislead people if you are introducing an open visible innovation, as the Cup must have been. The tall capacious Communion cups appeared for the first time on the altar for several centuries. Whether the language was English or Latin or Welsh or anything else, the people could not say they were taken in. The Communion Cup was the visual aid par excellence to teach the faithful that a deep and wholesome reform was at hand, and that the commands of Our Blessed Lord were being respected and obeyed once more.

A year later the first Prayer Book of the reign of Edward VI was issued. Mr. Maynard really surrenders a great deal (indeed the main points) when he writes of this book—"Mass in the first Christian centuries was said everywhere in the vernacular—until about the fourth century, when it was said in Latin, not in Rome but in North Africa." The practice of those early centuries was sound, reasonable, and Scriptural. It was a deterioration to depart from it. The Archbishop was taking a truly Christian and Catholic step when he restored the vernacular service.

* * *

Further on Mr. Maynard writes as follows "Even for the reading of the Authorised Version (of the Bible, i.e. the King James Version as Americans often call it), normally the permission of one's ordinary (i.e. one's bishop) is expected, more on account of the notes that are usually appended than because of anything very injurious to the Faith in the text." Frankly, this baffles us. What notes "usually appended" to the A.V. are our readers familiar with? If you go into the shop of the Hibernian Bible Society in Dawson Street, Dublin, or into any branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society you will find copies of scores of editions of the Authorised Bible, from the presses of all the Bible publishers in these islands, and you will not find a note in any of them! In fact, annotated editions of the A.V. are very rare (there is, we believe, some sale for Schofield's Bible which has notes, but the vast majority of editions are noteless).

This then is a sample of the kind of knowledge Mr. Maynard has brought to the task of writing on "Protestantism."

* * *

We have written enough on this subject to show that Mr. Maynard is ostensibly sympathetic to Cranmer, and has indeed a readiness to emphasise his merits, without abusiveness or enmity, yet he was not too well equipped for the work. He has no great opinion of the late Mr. Hilaire Belloc's "Life of Cranmer," and we give him credit for that amount of discernment. He gives a detailed account of the archbishop's trials and death by burning as a heretic. Cranmer repudiated all recantations, for he would not, as Mr. Maynard says "die with a lie on his lips." He kept his right hand in the flame as he said he would (for with it he had signed a recantation). "The astonishing gesture was intended to let everybody know that he died a Protestant." Our conclusion, on reading this book, is that the Church of England has no reason to be ashamed of Thomas Cranmer.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

PROTESTANTISM IN IRELAND.

(Continued from the April Number)

In our last issue we studied the first half of the lecture on "Protestantism in Ireland" read by the Rev. Fr. Sean O'Riordan, C.S.S.R. at Maynooth last summer. Before we proceed to study the rest of the lecture we will retrace our steps and repeat what Fr. O'Riordan says about "Faith." He asked "Can this faith (i.e. the Protestant 'complete surrender to Christ the Saviour') contain within itself true supernatural faith, hope, and charity?" His answer is, you will remember, "Yes," because it has "the implicit desire" of membership of the true Church. He tells us in what sense he uses the word "implicit"—"because it is contained in the good disposition of some by which a man wants his will to be conformed to God's will." We quote this definition of "implicit" (in this context) because the word is often used in Roman Catholic theology and it is well to mark the sense attached to it. Fr. O'Riordan adds "This is the Church's own official teaching on the availability of Salvation for those who, without personal fault live and die outside her communion. A letter of the Holy Office to Archbishop Cushing of Boston (8 August, 1949) is clear on this point."

We are all familiar with the old phrase about "belonging to the soul of the Church though not to the body". We know also the phrase "invincible ignorance." Fr. O'Riordan explains the matter on a spiritual level, and, as we said last month, we wish that this official teaching of the Roman Catholic Church were taught in every pulpit, every catechism class, every sodality, every religious paper. If it were, it would produce a most wholesome and beneficial result in the social life of this and other countries.

* * *

The part of the lecture now before us is entitled "Protestant Values." Here the prominent position assigned to laymen is noted, with the comment that "the cleric is not sacramentally differentiated" from the layman. It is true that no reformed church regards Holy Orders as a sacrament (within its definition of a sacrament). That does not mean an unscriptural or uncatholic theory of Holy Orders, but a recognition of the fact that God's revelation teaches us that the whole people of God are "a priesthood," and not merely a ministerial minority. It is also a recognition that "the Christian priest" is "the Christian presbyter," and not an extension of the Jewish priesthood. It keeps before us the reality that our Priest is now at the right hand of God—the risen Lord—the eternal Saviour—Judge.

The highest value we can attach to a spiritual institution is its true value. We must respect truth, and allow no consideration of age-long tradition or venerable names or ancient custom to hinder us from a true appraisal of any formula convention or usage. If the one word avoided in the New Testament references to the Christian ministry is the word "hiereus" we cannot be blind to the significance of that fact.

* * *

Fr O'Riordan lays stress upon the Protestant respect for "personal freedom." He defines it as "freedom to go one's own way through life." He says it is "for the Protestant the highest human and Christian value." Now it is admittedly very difficult to define "personal freedom" because the sense of it must vary from individual to individual—from the libertine at the foot of the moral scale to the self-denying saint at the top. But when we consider (as Fr. O'Riordan does) that "personal freedom" is an ideal, "the highest human and Christian value"—are we not bound to say that the very reason we exalt it is that without personal freedom no one can attain to the full stature of moral and spiritual manhood? Is it not true that the moral and spiritual leading strings familiar to our fellow-countrymen often fail to keep them right? Is it not true that the want of moral and spiritual leading strings need not cause us to stumble, or precipitate us down some steep place into the seas of moral destruction? Sin is not combatted by leading strings or by the want of them. Grace is the safeguard, and we rightly say of Almighty and living God that His Service is "perfect freedom."

Fr. O'Riordan records that the Protestant instinctively esteems "moral courage, truthfulness, honesty in business, hard work, thrift, respectability, dignity." Can you, in this statement substitute the word "Irishman" for the word "Protestant"? If not, why not? Are these qualities trivial and irrelevant in a Christian context? If a man finds these qualities (which have been admired and commended by the wisest men of all ages of human history, and are strongly approved by God's Word) in members of another denomination, should he not wish to have them abundantly in his own? Should he not consider them to be certificates of Divine approval?

We must note, on the other hand, that the Roman Catholic view of Protestant life is that "sombre and rather stifling." We are ready to admit that the uglier side of Puritan heritage has not faded away, and that we often find a dreary complacency among Protestants which an outsider must find repellant. Once a religion becomes smug and self-righteous it is the salt which has lost its savour. Here again, we must say that the very self-conscious Roman Catholicism which is fostered nowadays among young lay people of the lower middle class (if a quite obsolete description be permitted) is to the Protestant very smug indeed. Let it be remembered that we are all conditioned to our religious habits from childhood onward. The nose accustomed to incense will miss it in a Protestant place of worship, while the nose not used to incense may think it the scent of the scarlet woman. What we really need is to step out of our habitual environments and conventions and to face the personal challenge of immediate recognition of God just as Isaiah did. When the Glory and Holiness of God struck the prophet, he cried "Woe is me, for I am undone, for I am a man of unclean lips . . . for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts." Then we need "to turn unto the Lord our God"; to repent; to "behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"; to seek the sanctifying gift of the Holy Spirit. In short "let everyone that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." Neither Protestantism nor Roman Catholicism is the way of salvation—only Our Lord Jesus Christ is that—"Having boldness, brethren, to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus; by the way which He dedicated for us, a new and living way, through the veil, that is to say, His flesh; and having a great priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith" (Heb. 10. 19).

Fr. O'Riordan thinks that pride "is the besetting vice of the Protestant way of life." That is the view taken by a thoughtful outsider looking at us with a patient desire to understand us. Controversy apart, ought we who are Protestants to ignore this? Ought we not to examine ourselves and try to see the extent to which we are inclined to pride? We may be tempted to call it by some other name and thus to conceal it from ourselves. We are sure that Fr. O'Riordan is not thinking of the old charge Rome brought against Protestants, that it was pride which kept them from returning to Rome; rather, we think he has in mind the whole impression he has received from us—maybe he is right: maybe not. Think about it.

A fair-minded man, Fr. O'Riordan reminds his hearers that it is said that spite is the besetting vice of his co-religionists. That, we confess, had never occurred to us. Protestant spite exists, and so does Roman Catholic pride. Can it be said that they are produced by creed? We must make time to reflect on this, and to discuss it with experienced friends.

* * *

"Public spirit and humanitarian and social work are fostered by the Protestant conscience." If Fr. O'Riordan means that, then it is clear that Ireland sorely needs "the Protestant conscience." If the Protestant witness (not by shouts and slogans) but by service, example and integrity is squeezed out, as seems to be the danger in Eire, then the chance of such qualities as moral courage, truthfulness and a sense of responsibility, developing will be very adversely affected. It may be a valuable enough thought that this life is unimportant in comparison with the heavenly life. But it is only unimportant in that particular connection: in itself it is worthwhile. We are here, to exercise every quality, virtue, and attribute of mind, heart, soul, God has given us. We are here to honour His common grace as well as His special grace. This life is a training ground for the heavenly life. In an age of nuclear weapons the bow and arrow tactics will not do. In our use of contemporary attainments we must honour God by humbly accepting, not by rejecting His gifts.

Fr. O'Riordan is not of course enamoured of Protestantism—he is a student of our principles and practice, and conscious of “the erroneous and defective aspects of Protestantism as a religion.” Well, we must allow him to disapprove. But we take him up on this point viz. “we must note the Protestant fixations—widespread ignorance of, and prejudice against Rome, much fear of Rome and not a little hatred, and (mainly in the Church of Ireland) sheer contempt for Catholics.” Are these not the Irish Roman Catholic fixations? Their ignorance of Protestantism: their fear of it: their hatred of it: their prejudice against it. We do not hesitate to say that the opposition is real, and the gulf both wide and deep (individual exceptions always occur).

The attribution of ignorance is sometimes correct, and sometimes false. The Protestant may not bother to enquire into the whole dogmatic belief of Rome—the main features of Marian doctrine, for example, may be known, and be quite sufficient without anything more to turn a Bible-taught Protestant away from Rome. A man who knows the teaching of Holy Scripture is not likely to be convinced of the truth of Purgatory—this example will serve to make our point.

Prejudice against Rome is understandable when you read that simple good young people in Spain can't get lawfully married because they are Evangelicals. Prejudice is understandable when you read of Evangelical churches being destroyed in Spain and Colombia. Religious rancour, hatred, intolerance are not peculiarly Protestant qualities—Protestantism from the sixteenth century till now has been the victim of these qualities when Roman Catholics displayed them. We have our faults, but what is bigotry or intolerance in a Protestant is still bigotry and intolerance when exercised by a Roman Catholic. What is sinful in us is not virtuous in Roman Catholics. The fear of Rome is not a Protestant delusion—we think Protestants ought to fear Rome's policy in regard to mixed marriages and to guard against it. That one example is enough to show that fear creates a need for self-protection. Hence we make no apology for the behest “No Surrender.”

* * *

We have very rarely met an attitude of contempt for Roman Catholics among members of the Church of Ireland, but probably we have not been in socially important circles. All we can say is that we like and respect many Roman Catholics, and however deeply we differ in creed, and however strong our sense of their religious errors, contempt is the last thing which would enter our mind. We want them to understand us, and we want to understand them. Only by obeying St. Peter's command to “honour all men” can we hope for intelligent and amicable and Christian discussion.

* * *

Fr. O'Riordan's last section is a study of “the conversion of Irish Protestants.” He thinks that “the impulse towards the [R.C.] Church is buried deep within them though inhibited in a thousand ways.” Our opportunities of investigating this are much greater than Fr. O'Riordan's and we say that no such impulse exists in the vast majority of thinking Protestants. The extreme fewness of converts to Rome in Ireland (and the few mainly the parties to marriage to Roman Catholics) is evidence. Since the setting up of the Irish Free State (now Eire) in 1922 many Protestants could have gained greatly by turning to Rome: how many have done so? Very very few. Tell the Ulster Protestant that he has an impulse towards Rome and he will convince you that you are mistaken.

Fr. O'Riordan points out “the current growth of Anglo-Catholic ideas and practices in the Church of Ireland,” and says “Inevitably the logical Protestant asks: ‘if we are to have Roman doctrine and practices—why not Rome itself?’” Inevitably he is more likely to say ‘if you want Roman practices go over to Rome: don't be bringing Rome in here!’”

“The current growth of Anglo-Catholic ideas” is, we think, over-optimistic. That there is a tendency to copy certain features of Church of England worship of a ceremonial kind is true; but it is also true that the Church of Ireland clergymen are as a rule better educated than the average of the Church of England, and that the lay people of the Church of Ireland are capable of neutralising much of this tendency. We think it remarkable that there are, as far as we can discover, no ex-clergymen of the Church of Ireland ministering to-day in the Roman Catholic Church. It is the rarest thing for a Church of Ireland clergyman to become a Roman Catholic. That is a point Fr. O'Riordan does not refer to.

Fr. O'Riordan then speaks of the Legion of Mary retreats for non-Roman Catholics in Dublin. Last summer a contributor to “The British Weekly” told of a visit to Dublin and of being at one of these retreats. He said that he thought he was the only non-Roman Catholic present!

A few stragglers may be collected by these methods, but we believe it will be a very long time before the Irish Protestant abandons his faith and goes over to Rome. Something more than pride will stop him—truth will.

Still, let it be said that there is one way open to Rome in winning Protestants—let Rome reform herself by the standards of Scripture and Christian antiquity. Let that Church return to the true Catholic faith, and we shall hold out no longer.

WHY MIXED MARRIAGES FAIL.

An American Point of View
("Protestant Action," Toronto).

Continued from April Issue.

The most effective way to deal with the perils of mixed marriages is to prevent them by pointing out their dangers before the reason has resigned its powers to romance. It is for such an end that we write this article. Medical men do not fight a disease by inoculating those who already have it, they inoculate everyone, without exception, where it is already prevalent. No pastor or parent can be sure that the young people in his church or family are immune to the dangers inherent in marrying a Roman Catholic, therefore they should warn all without distinction for the sake of their soul's welfare and for their own future happiness.

What the Roman Catholic Church Demands

On the front page of this issue we have set out the explicit requirements of the Code of Canon Law. They are not the passing whim of some exceptional priest or bishop but the highest and most authoritative voice of the papacy expounding the settled policy of the Roman church. The priests who marry couples are bound by the most solemn vows to demand from them unwavering obedience to these conditions:

1. They must be married before a priest and must undertake not to repeat the ceremony before a Protestant minister. (Canon 1063).
2. They must sign a contract drawn up in due legal form to keep certain promises, which include following: (Canon 1061).
3. The non-Romanist party must undertake not to attempt to win the other party to his religious convictions and he must guarantee full freedom to the other partner to practise his or her religion. (Canon 1061).

4. The non-Romanist must promise to have children baptised and educated as Roman Catholics. (Canon 1061).
5. In many instances, the bishop of the diocese also requires the non-Romanist party to take a course of instruction in the Roman Catholic religion before the marriage is celebrated.
6. The Roman Catholic party must agree to work prudently for the conversion of the non-Roman Catholic. (Canon 1062).

One-sided and Unfair Conditions

A cursory glance at these requirements will show that they are one-sided and grossly unfair to the non-Romanist party to the marriage. The dice are loaded against him or her. The Protestant must give a legal guarantee in writing, which may later be used against him in a civil court. He therein undertakes to give a priest of another religion the sole right to perform the marriage ceremony while passing over the church and the ministers of his own religion. He must sign away with a stroke of the pen his future freedom to speak to his life partner about the most important matters of time and eternity, and at the same time submit in advance to the unceasing efforts of that same partner, aided by the priests, to win him away from his own religion to that of the Church of Rome. All this is lopsided enough, but the Protestant member of the contract is further required to turn over the bodies and the souls of his unborn children to the direction of the priests of a church that consign him to eternal torments.

Are Pre-marital Contracts Legally Enforceable?

Can the contracts made before marriage with a Roman Catholic be enforced before the courts of the land? "The Toronto Daily Star" of March 9, 1957, ventured the assertion that "If solemn promises made in consideration of marriage are in writing they fulfill the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. Action may be taken for breach of contract just as in any other contract." Two Roman Catholic canonists state in their commentary on "Canon Law" (Bouscaren and Ellis, p. 518), that "While it is true that the enforcement has been unsuccessfully sought in several cases, and that the courts are generally 'neutral' where religion is concerned, yet these promises guarantee a right which, on the strength of legal precedents, should be recognized." They quote from the judgment of a New York Domestic Relations Court to that effect.

Dr. Leo. H. Lehman, late editor of "The Converted Catholic," held that these contracts are properly drawn up from the legal standpoint and freely entered into, hence the persons signing them lay themselves open to action in the civil courts instituted by the Hierarchy or their agents. Notwithstanding, Dr. Lehman cited the opinion given in "The Yale Law Journal" of May, 1941, to the effect that it would be contrary to the most sacred of American democratic traditions for a civil court to enforce a religious requirement.

When The Honeymoon Is Over!

Young couples who have entered into a mixed marriage, however, soon discover that civil courts are not the only tribunals before which their words and actions as married people are weighed. They have to live with each other; they have to manage to get along with their in-laws; they have to take into consideration the priest who married them and before whom they solemnly promised to fulfil certain obligations. Before the wedding, when a rosy haze enveloped the unknown future, the dream of unbroken joy shrouded the possibility of hearing within the intimacy of the matrimonial state any other voice than that of the loved life partner. How sad is the cold reality when the honeymoon is over and the pre-marital contract is still there! Mother-in-law trouble is a stock joke, but only too often it is transformed into a horrible incubus that stifles the love and joy of marriage because it is fostered and thrust into the privacy of the home not only by the parents of one's mate, but by their priests who are already armed with a legal contract, and alas, aided and abetted, willingly or not, by the Roman Catholic partner to the marriage. A Protestant boy or girl who is wise will think twice before he or she bows the neck to place it in such a galling ecclesiastical yoke as this. If one has no religious convictions, one has nothing to lose, but even utterly irreligious persons can be made to feel the oppressive yoke of priestly domination in the home. If religion was ever anything more than a name, let the sincere Protestant beware of being entangled in such outrageous bondage as this.

When young people are madly in love, or think they are, they will promise almost anything to gain the object of their affection. The astute priests of Rome are well aware of the bargaining power they hold in their alleged monopoly over the sacrament of marriage, and they exploit it to the utmost. The Roman Catholic partner may not realize what a sacrifice the Protestant is called upon to make, or may regard it as a mere formality to be forgotten when the wedding bells have ceased ringing. The priests of the Church of Rome do so not look upon the contract, as their care in drawing it up and their scrupulous adherence to legal forms in having it signed may demonstrate to the wary. Married life that begins with such shrewd bargaining, weighted wholly on the side of the Roman Church, and bound by such rigid legal forms, is already marked with failure. The last and fatal touch is often added by the deliberate interference of the priests.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 50.

of integration, it will be necessary to mobilize public opinion. It would be intolerable that any region represented in the Parliament at Westminster should be denied the freedom of worship which all bodies, including Roman Catholics, enjoy in Britain. As an example of religious discrimination in Malta, the penalty for "vilification" of the Roman Catholic religion is six months' imprisonment but for a similar offence against a Protestant body the penalty is only three months. Protestants are also debarred from "external manifestations of worship and proselytizing." The same restrictions apply to schools. According to "The Times of Malta" the Maltese will not tolerate a "lessening of the Catholic Church's mission." In other words, that Church will oppose integration if placed on an equality with Protestant denominations. If, as a result, the economic position of the Maltese should worsen, the blame must be laid at the door of the intolerant priesthood—"The Christian" 21-2-1958.)

* * *

Mixed Marriages.

We have elsewhere in this issue an article on "Mixed Marriages" from a North American source—below we give another from New Zealand ("The Nation")—

Now and then the vexed problem of mixed marriage arises and too often that marriage becomes a failure due to the fact that one of the two parties does not fully realise the full import of the step to be taken, and of its consequences. It must be understood that a mixed marriage is between two parties of unequal religions.

A marriage between a non-Roman Catholic and a Roman Catholic can very easily become a menace. A mixed marriage of this type has in it all the possibilities for trouble, disunity and regret. The Roman Catholic Church is the church, which because of its unjust and intolerant attitude, creates the worst of the problems arising out of a mixed marriage. The Roman Catholic Church would have you believe (if one is foolish enough to do so) that all marriages contracted outside their church are invalid. All children, therefore, born to such marriages are considered by them to be illegitimate. The Ne Temere Decree promulgated on 2nd August, 1907, is the official document which lies behind this slander. Roman Catholic priests, therefore, say that marriages contracted outside their church is no marriage in the sight of God.

In New Zealand, in 1920, an Act was passed (after a public inquiry) entitled: "The Marriage Amendment Act," that "any person is liable . . . who alleges expressly or by implication that any persons lawfully married are not truly married." The penalty for such is a fine of £100.

No matter which of the contracting parties decide to "turn," the party who turns is required to sign a document promising to bring up the children in the Roman Catholic faith. The demand is improper, and the document, legally, is valueless.

The following is the form used in the United States of America and in Canada in signing up parties who turn for the purpose of marriage with a Roman Catholic:

"I, the undersigned, being desirous of contracting marriage with....., before a Catholic priest duly authorised by a special dispensation from His Grace the Archbishop of New York, do promise, in presence of the Reverend Father....., and of....., witness attending for that purpose, that all the children born of my marriage with..... shall be baptised and educated in the Catholic religion, and, moreover, that I will, by no means whatsoever, hinder or obstruct the said..... in the exercise of the said religion; I also promise that in the solemnisation of my marriage there shall be only the Catholic ceremony. In testimony whereof I have signed this document in the presence of Reverend..... and the said witness..... on this day of the month of..... 19....."

Signature.....

A similar form is in use in Australia and New Zealand.

Many young people yield to the demand to change their religion or to agree to "turn" without due thought. Loyal members of the Protestant Churches should refuse any move to marry in a Roman Catholic Church. If they take a definite, firm stand, they will very probably find that their partner will be the one to turn.

Everything in this solemn promise favours the Roman Catholic party; the poor Protestant must keep his lips sealed as to his religious convictions, and, like a docile lamb, listen while his Roman Catholic partner freely opens her lips and makes every effort to win him over to the Roman faith. This is Rome's idea of justice.

Any man who will go before a priest and sign such a pledge, solemnly promising that the children God may give him shall be taught and shall grow up surrounded by false teachings, which he can neither accept nor believe, with no effort on his part to lead them into the truth as he knows it, has surely forgotten his responsibility to his wife and his offspring; and a woman who will do this cannot truly love either her husband or her children. Such persons cannot but despise themselves for signing an agreement no honest Protestant could sign.

Remember that every Roman Catholic child becomes an integral part of a huge world-wide organisation which aims at world domination in the national, political, social and finance realms. Would you wish your children to become a party to that?

The problem of mixed marriages can be met by adopting the following, in practice:

(1) Be very careful about making deep friendships with Roman Catholics of the opposite sex.

(2) Protestants are advised not to "turn" Roman Catholic on any account or pretence whatever.

(3) In matters of friendship with a person of the Roman Catholic faith, consult your clergyman or minister. You owe it to him to acquaint him of the facts. He will be happy to advise you, and help you. It is too late to consult him after marriage to a Roman Catholic, because the damage has been done.

(4) Remember, the Lord Jesus Christ is your saviour, not any priest of the Roman Church who claims the right of being a Christ on earth. Never be disloyal to your church, and never be disloyal to the Lord Jesus.

(5) Remember also that no such pledges of signing over your children to a foreign church are required of a Roman Catholic who is married to a Protestant by a Protestant clergyman. The couple are asked only pledges of fidelity to one another, and are left free to decide the question of religion for themselves before God, and as to what religious teaching they shall give to their children.

Do not stand up before a priest and agree to such propositions. If you do, you will lose all self-respect and will be but a slave bound hand and foot by the Roman Church.

—"The Nation," N.Z.

Belgian Congo.

During past years the Christian church in Congo has increased very rapidly, but we quote from a recent letter which finds an echo in other parts of the field. "There is a need among our church members for obedience to God's Word." Two of the main factors jeopardising the growth of the individual believer are witchcraft, still latent, despite Government attempts to stamp it out, and illiteracy. Our new booklet, "Everyday Life," has been received with great joy by missionaries and African elders, for it brings together Scripture passages upon such subjects as witchcraft and sorcery.

Perhaps the contrasts in the country are greatest between the bush native and the civilised townsman. We heard of a little boy walking eight miles for a copy of "The Way of Salvation." He took it back to his village and there read it aloud. On the other hand, in one of the large mining towns, African Christians act as colporteurs, visiting from home to home with supplies of Scriptures. Often they are treated with scorn by their fellows.

In the Congo, as in other countries of Africa, there is a lack of sophistication in the reading habits of the people, which helps the spread of the truth. Sometimes in Mission hospitals and dispensaries "tract racks" are kept: S.G.M. publications often find a place in these. It is a usual sight to see small groups of people in waiting rooms or on verandahs with one of their number reading aloud to the others.

There is a steady distribution of the Word in French, Portuguese, English and Greek among some of the 100,000 Europeans in the country. Some months ago a missionary gave a Belgian a New Testament. The more he read it the more convinced he became that it would be a good book to give to Africans in his employ. He wrote for a supply of New Testaments and the Mission put him in touch with Christians in his area. A visit made it obvious that, while he himself was unaware of the fact, he had been prepared by the Holy Spirit to receive eternal life, and the missionary joyfully led him to the Saviour. He shows clear signs of new life within and is sharing with his African employees the Gospel he now enjoys.

—"Scripture Gift Mission News Bulletin," March—April, 1958.

Revival!—or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT "BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE

NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sens	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

INDIA

One of India's most ancient languages in a new dress.

Just issued

The New Testament and Psalms in roman Tamil

Much of the illiteracy in India is owing to the complications of the native scripts. Without any change in the Spoken language the introduction of this easier type prepares the way for progress to literacy.

Published by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Contributions toward the cost of this production will be much appreciated.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 6—LXVII

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,
5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	61
Are Protestants Catholic?	62
"The Roman Catholic Continent"	64
Editor's Chair	66
"Fundamentalism"	69

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Message Of The Church Made Abundantly Clear.

By a Correspondent

Too many people still thought of Christianity as "opium Christianity," said Dr. W. A. Visser 't Hooft, general secretary of the World Council of Churches, at the Student Christian Congress in Edinburgh. He told 2,300 students from more than forty countries that while the Church had in the past undoubtedly exploited the fact of a future life, it was untrue that it was now presenting a Christianity which was only fit for another world.

There was much to discourage the faith of the Church in the modern world and there were also powerful signs that much new life was coming to the world through the Church. In countries where the Church was persecuted it had given new life and hope to many. It was now possible for the Churches of the world to speak together of the great issues of life more easily than ever. The message of Christianity on race relations, segregation, and the needs of the underprivileged peoples had been made abundantly clear.

Church Repudiated

It was the belief of a vast proportion of humanity, however, that the Church and Christianity were the products of man's imagination and, therefore, dangerous to real life. This was not only the belief of Communists, but also of many intellectuals in the West. Many intellectuals were ready to believe in Christianity but denied that the Church had anything to say about the real meaning of life. Christ was often revered, but the Church repudiated.

Dr. 't Hooft said the Church could not be separated from the Christian faith because Christianity was a religion of facts and not of ideas and those facts were rooted in history and in the community of the Church. He called on this generation of students to stand in with the life of their local churches and to help in their worship and organisation because the only effective defence of Christianity was for the Church to attack the evils of the world in the name of God.

—"Manchester Guardian," 11/4/'58.

* * *

Bishop On Principal's Secession.

The Bishop of Lichfield, the Rt. Rev. A. S. Reeve, made the following statement to the Press Association in London.

"In view of the wide publicity given to the secession of Dr. Hann, the former principal of Lichfield Theological College, to the Church of Rome, it is necessary that the true facts of the situation should be made known.

"On January 29, without any reference to me, Dr. Hann made a statement to the students that he could no longer participate in the full life of the college and particularly in its services.

"This information was given to me on January 31 and as chairman of the College Council I relieved Dr. Hann of his duties that day, and from that moment he took no further part in the life of the college.

"The Vice-Principal was appointed acting principal from that date."

Dr. Charles Alfred Clemence Hann became Principal of the Theological College in 1950. His resignation, taking effect from March 31 was announced last December. He had been an Anglican clergyman for 32 years.

He was Chaplain of Christ's hospital, Hordsham, from 1946-50. He read theology at Oxford, and his other appointments included the curacy of St. Helen's Abingdon, Berks (1937-40). He has also been examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Lichfield. He was ordained in Canada in 1926.

—"Dublin Evening Mail," 26/3/'58.

[Dr. Hann has set an example to all who find themselves in revolt against Church of England practice. He has honourably withdrawn since it became impossible for him to accept the Church's position. We have read that his immediate difficulty was the attitude of the Church of England towards certain marriage problems.]

Nepal and The Gospel.

For years, almost the only means of reaching Nepal with the Scriptures was through contact with Gurkha soldiers, and this was faithfully accomplished by missionaries who had access to them. Now that the country of Nepal is itself gradually opening to outside influence, the Scriptures are playing their own part in Christian witness.

One humble village teacher, a Brahmin, was helping a missionary to learn the Nepali language. For her language examination the missionary had to study the Gospel of John. When she and her teacher were reading in the third chapter, the teacher suddenly said, "These words are wonderful to me and are the same as I read in the book you gave me several months ago."

The missionary had no recollection of seeing the man before she began to take lessons with him, but it transpired that on the trip to his village some months previously she had given him a copy of "The Saviour of the World." He had read it through two or three times and his heart was prepared to hear the Truth before he commenced reading with her. He has not yet made an open profession of faith.

Another story is of a Sherpa girl who travelled down the mountain trails to attend a Christian hospital. From there she went to stay with Christian relatives nearby, where she trusted the Saviour.

The time came when she had to go back to her family. While she was on her homeward journey, carrying her load on her back and accompanied by two other Sherpas, she met a Christian missionary. They were invited into the missionary's home and shared her meal. Afterwards they conversed about the Lord in Nepali.

Using the Gospel pictures which the missionary possessed, the girl interpreted the message to the two Sherpas with her. Then she took something out of an inside pocket and reverently revealed the carefully wrapped contents of the piece of cloth. It was a copy of "The Way of Salvation." She was taking it back to her mountain home to share the good news with her own folk!—"Scripture Gift Mission News Bulletin," March-April, 1958.

* * *

Spotlight On Israel.

On the 16th January, the Prime Minister, Mr. David Ben-Gurion, officially opened the 150 miles of new road from Beersheba to Eilat, the Red Sea Port. The Prime Minister said—"This is one of the most important events since the time of the Second Temple. This road is not only a highway from north to south, but it is the key to the populating of this half of our country, to the development and exploitation of its minerals and its agricultural settlements." The trip from Beersheba to Eilat, normally took seven hours, and in rain and bad weather it would take more than three days. The road used was a mere sand track. On the new asphalt road, it is estimated that lorries will cover the distance in four hours. Beersheba, the city where Abraham dwelt, the modern capital of the Negev, is now connected with the important port of Eilat by a first class modern road.

Shipping—the port of Eilat is very important to the economic life of Israel. Trade with the near and far East is being developed by means of this port. During 1957 Israel acquired five new ships, bringing up their merchant vessels to 34, with a total of 233,663 tons, and a personnel of 1,750 officers and men.

Immigration—during 1957 80,000 immigrants arrived. This was rather less than expected. There were a hundred thousand Jews in Morocco preparing to leave for Israel, but

(Continued on p. 71.)

ARE PROTESTANTS CATHOLIC?

In 1945 the Archbishop of Canterbury considered the divergences in the Anglican Church which are usually described as "Catholic" and "Protestant" and decided to ask each group, as well as some representative Free Churchmen, to consider their differences and their agreements in order to discover whether any harmonizing of views was possible. Newman once sarcastically referred to an effort to bridge separations as trying "to steer between the Scylla of Yea and the Charybdis of Nay through the channel of No-meaning." Some attempts at harmonizing opposites deserve that description. Nevertheless, we think the Archbishop was right in believing that to elicit plain statements of the varying positions and each side's view of what it opposed would aid clear thinking, even if it did not bring about agreement.

The Anglo-Catholics were first in the field, as the other groups only received the invitation later; in 1947 a pamphlet called "Catholicity" was issued by the "Dacre Press" setting forth the beliefs of fourteen Anglo-Catholic theologians. Evangelicals have prepared an answer called "The Fulness of Christ." The Free Church statement has been published by the "Lutterworth Press" at 5s., and is entitled "The Catholicity of Protestantism."

Dr. R. Newton Flew and Rev. Rupert E. Davies, two leaders among Methodism, are the authors, but they have consulted with a larger group of Free Churchmen in the various churches. Though this document was elicited by the challenge of "Catholicity," we believe it is of permanent importance.

The authors of "Catholicity" insisted that the true meaning of that word is "wholeness," and claimed that all non-Catholic Christianity suffered from partialness, whereas the true Catholicity is a complete way of life, including belief, worship and morals. The rejoinder of Free Churchmen in the volume before us is first of all a study of the true meaning of "Catholic" and then a claim that in its rightful meaning Protestantism has an indisputable right to it. Protestants, it is argued, are truly Catholic. Of course, it is no unknown thing for a name which rightly belongs to all to be appropriated and monopolized by one party, and the claim is in our judgment fully established that this has happened to the adjective "Catholic." It is time the monopoly was broken—only if Protestants reclaim the title they must be careful about the sense in which they employ it.

The Presence of Christ

Historical evidence is given in this book for the assertion that "the term catholicity means, in the first place, the presence of the living Christ." This is borne out by examining the first apparent use of the term by Ignatius, who wrote to the church in Smyrna: "wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the Catholic Church." The meaning of "wholeness" is a true element in the word, but is secondary. All communions wherein Christ dwells can rightly claim to be catholic in the primary sense; on the other hand, what Church can justly claim to have "wholeness" of Christian faith, Christian worship and Christian obedience? The claim is made by the communities we may call totalitarian Churches, but this volume well shows that indispensable elements in Christ's teaching have been omitted or subordinated by them.

Moreover, loyalty to Christ requires not only that we maintain all that He committed to us in its wholeness, but that we add nothing to the deposit of truth. The obligations of a faithful witness are splendidly expressed in the well-known words addressed to anyone taking the oath in a law court, which demands that he shall speak "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." That exclusive final phrase "nothing but the truth" makes illegitimate the numerous additions of the so-called Catholic churches such as the forthcoming official promulgation of the new dogma of the bodily assumption into heaven of the Virgin Mother of Our Lord. All the ingredients of a chemical formula may be present, and then the compound is correct, but if you add other elements you kill the "wholeness" by producing something quite different. That is what Rome has done.

Sola Fide

The authors of "Catholicity" attacked Protestants for following Luther in his watchword "sola fide," which asserts salvation "by faith alone." They claim that "alone" is an addition to Romans 3: 28, and seek to turn the tables on Protestants by protesting against the insertion of what they term "a non-Biblical word." Of course, "alone" is literally absent from the text, but it is implied in Paul's added words: "apart from works of the law." The authors of "The Catholicity of Protestantism" appear to us to justify the word, however, in the full quotations from Luther himself in Appendix 2 of their work, which show that he knew perfectly well what he was doing; as he said, "the text itself and the sense of St. Paul demanded it and forced it upon me. . . . When works are so completely cut away, the meaning of it must be that faith alone justifies. . . . The matter itself, and not the nature of the language only, compels this translation." He then shows that he had ample precedent for this addition, for those fathers to whom Catholics love to appeal had themselves inserted the word "alone." He was justified, he said, "by the precedent of the holy Fathers . . . and the peril of the people, who have so long been taught to hang upon works and be without faith and lose Christ."

Readers of this work will be amazed, we think, to discover how mistaken the Catholic side in this controversy was as to the true position of Protestants. The writers of "Catholicity," for instance, ascribed to "Orthodox Protestantism" belief in "Christ for us" but not "Christ in us," "Christ as Saviour" but not "Christ as pattern," "God transcendent" but not "God immanent." They said that Protestantism "sacrificed the Biblical doctrine that man was made in the image of God." The authors of this reply with good right say: "These are misstatements so gross that we cannot easily understand how they were brought before the public." But those who claim to maintain "wholeness" ought to know the whole truth about their opponents.

Much is claimed for Catholics in the realm of Authority, and the chapter dealing with this is very illuminating. Good work is done by showing how divergent Catholics are among themselves, for there are at least three different views in "catholicism" as to what authority is and where it is located. There are also different views as to who are included in the Church of God on earth; the Orthodox Church excludes Rome from membership of the true Church, and Protestants also are shut out. Rome recognises all the baptised as Christians, but we were once told by a Jesuit priest that that means we belong to "the soul of the Church, but not to the body." If we cannot belong to both, membership of the soul would seem to be more important and valuable!

There is a good deal of valuable teaching in this book on points of doctrine commonly misunderstood. For instance, it is important to notice Luther's careful distinction about "original sin," which (says this treatise) means that "though man may be diseased, he is not the disease." Total Depravity is explained as not meaning a deprivation, as a man who loses a limb is deprived of that member, yet remains a man. It is a "depravation" resulting in every part of human personality being worsened, and this results from sin's effect in "putting self at the centre where God alone should be." Our theologically minded readers will profit by studying the full and clear citations from Luther on "The Freedom and Bondage of the Will," which reveal how much distorted modern representations of his doctrine can be. The argument of the whole book is concentrated on the assertion that Catholicism lacks wholeness because it fails to do justice to the work of the Holy Spirit—a failure which is not always absent from Protestantism. Controversy is excellent, but it still remains the function of the Spirit of God to lead us into all the truth.

—Phurah II in "The Christian."

LATIN AMERICA NO LONGER RESPONDS TO THE APPELLATION, "THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CONTINENT."

By Walter M. Montano

For centuries the impression has been fostered that the Southern Continent belongs to the Roman fold and that the people are submissive to the Roman hierarchy. But recently, in a very frank article entitled "How Catholic is Latin America?" a Maryknoll priest, Rev. Albert Nevins, presents a picture of the country that is surprisingly dismal as far as the Roman Catholic Church is concerned. ("The Sign," Sept. 1956.) Latin America is recognised as little more than a mission territory with Catholic traditions. Religion is professed rather than practiced, and hopes for religious solidarity are apparently vanishing, to judge by the observations of Father Nevins:

"Out of a total population of over 157 million, more than 136 million people of Latin America claim to be Catholics, but even by the most generous estimates only about 10 per cent. can be called practicing Catholics . . .

"A Chilean priest, Father Albert Hurtado, made a survey in his own country several years ago. He discovered that 3½ per cent. of the men and 9½ per cent. of the women attended Sunday Mass. Only little more than 10 per cent. made their Easter duty.

"Another Chilean priest, Father Humbert Munoz, reports that half the people die without the last sacraments, half are married outside the Church, and only a third make their First Communion.

"... in a parish in Buenos Aires . . . of the parents of 125 children making their First Communion, only one father and six mothers could be called practical Catholics. During the period of the survey 68 people died, of whom 13 received the Last Sacraments, and a number of these were already dead when the priest was summoned.

"'Because of the religious indifferentism of our people,' a Chilean bishop told me, 'we suffer from a lack of religious vocations. And because of the lack of priests, the indifferentism of our people increases by leaps and bounds.'

"... Latin America, which has more than four times the Catholic population of the United States, has fewer parishes than we do and almost half the number of priests. In the United States there is one priest for every 694 Catholics . . . 'The average South American pastor is responsible for upward of 15,000 souls,' declared Father Charles Brown, a Maryknoll missionary in Bolivia who has made a study of the situation. 'And it must be remembered that two-fifths of the priests are religious, and one-half are foreigners . . .'

"Colombia is generally recognised to be the strongest Catholic country in South America. The present government is closely linked with the Church—a fact that has given rise to much Protestant propaganda in the American press. But even in 'Catholic Colombia' no more than 15 per cent. of the people attend Mass each Sunday.

"True Catholic intellectuals and social leaders are few and far between. When you do find them, they stand out like beacons in the night . . . For the most part the rich, the majority of whom are practicing Catholics, are more interested in perpetuating the status quo of their superior positions than in advancing the Church.

"Our best church-goers are the leading oppressors of the poor," a Peruvian priest told me. "Their wealth gives them power to silence anyone who opposes them. The encyclicals should be our most potent weapon to win back the masses. But our wealthy Catholics prefer a sentimental Catholicism to a dynamic one."

"... Over half the Catholics of Latin America cannot read or write. Illiteracy percentages vary over the continent from 90 per cent. in Haiti and 80 per cent. in Bolivia to 14 per cent. in Argentina and 15 per cent. in Uruguay. Even an advanced country like Colombia has a 44 per cent. illiteracy.

"Parish life as it exists in the United States is hardly known in Latin America. There is no intensive life of worship. Parish organisations are few and weak, confined to women and girls. There is a gulf separating the priests and people. Catholic education is for all practical purposes confined to the sacristy. The lay apostolate is only rarely used, and seldom are men enrolled . . .

"The picture is not a bright one except for a few isolated spots. At the best the Church is just about holding on. Facts do not warrant calling Latin America a Catholic continent. By tradition it is Catholic, but in actual practice the Latin American people as a whole live in neglect of their faith. The great body of people of Latin America live outside the Church, separated from its sacraments, ignorant of its doctrines, and unaware of the social teachings that could lift them from their wretched poverty.

"Latin America is really a mission continent" . . .

The recent Roman Catholic campaign to flood Latin America with priests from Spain and the United States is in our opinion as useless as watering a dead tree. For four hundred years Rome has had her opportunity to Christianise the continent, and if superstition, anti-clericalism, and Communism are rife, she has no one but herself to blame. For centuries she has represented herself as the maternal guardian of the country, whereas in reality she has been nothing but a ruthless stepmother. Rome has never belonged to Latin America, and Latin America still does not belong to Rome.

Significantly, vocations for the priesthood have been negligible compared to the tremendous needs of the continent. But the recent effort to draw on foreign priests can only prove fruitless; at this late date it can hardly be expected to change the growing distrust and anti-clericalism among the people.

The tenets of Rome are anti-Biblical, and her policies are anti-democratic. She supports the rich, powerful landowner and grinds down the poor. She feasts while the people fast. She demands privileges and denies rights. She seeks no interests but her own and seeks power only to serve those interests. Is it any wonder that the masses are stolidly indifferent to her brand of Christianity and are now responding to evangelical Protestantism as never before?

Not long ago it was the writer's privilege to sit next to the Bolivian ambassador to the United States at a banquet of the Rotary Club of Los Angeles and to hear him deliver a lecture, given in perfect English, that stirred the minds and moved the hearts of his listeners. He seemed to have a deep sense of spiritual values so often lacking among public figures.

Later on, during the course of a personal conversation, the ambassador related that he—like many another "nominal" Catholic—had been educated in a Protestant school in Bolivia. His spiritual insight was no mere coincidence.

What Rome has failed to provide for Latin America, the figure of One on the Cross has supplied, in all the fullness of His redemptive power. But His appeal does not end here. Down through the ages a voice has sounded and found its echo in the empty tomb: "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It is the voice of One who had compassion on the multitudes, who fed them bread for their bodies and the Bread from heaven for their souls, who loved them to the death and redeemed them through His resurrected life.

Our responsibility as lightbearers is greater to-day than ever before. A whole continent, fed on husks for so long, is hungering and thirsting for the living bread and living water, which only Christ can give. A whole continent, deceived and exploited for hundreds of years, is longing for the truth found only in Christ. A whole continent is waiting . . .

—"The Converted Catholic Magazine"

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the Manager, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

SPIRITUAL PROGRESS.

It may seem a commonplace thing to talk of spiritual progress, but is the fact of spiritual progress a usual one? Are we not faced time after time with two other situations in the spiritual life: spiritual stagnation, and spiritual decline? Many professing Christians are in a state of suspended spiritual animation, and many, even if not conscious of it, are slowly deteriorating.

Our World confronts us with vast complexities. We are not thinking of the intricacies of modern science (which are quite beyond us) but of the multifarious problems, social, economic, moral, intellectual, which are forced upon our attention. Large numbers of people say quite sincerely that they don't know what to think or to believe. Often as a result they give up the struggle, and put all questions of faith into the background. They no longer try to understand. They are not atheists, or materialists in theory. They are simply bewildered, and not liking to be in a state of bewilderment they find it easier to put out of their minds the things which cause the perplexity.

In the New Testament we come upon a man in a state of confusion. He has had a mystifying experience, and most of his ideas have been upset. Old securities of life have collapsed, and new ones have not yet taken shape. What do we find him doing while in this bewildered state? We read "Behold, he prayeth"

(Acts 9. 11). That man took the wisest course, and has left us a permanent model to imitate. What he did in that time of crisis he kept on doing throughout life, and the Saul of Tarsus who turned to prayer in his time of perplexity is the man of continuing prayer and unquenchable faith, Paul the Apostle.

* * *

We can strongly recommend persistent prayer to all who find this World a bit too much for them. Of course there are people who seem to be unaware of the World's problems and challenges: whether we should envy them, or pity them is hard to say. Yet we must say that the shut eye and the closed mind are not Christian. The Christian (or the would-be Christian) must be open-eyed, and ready to face the difficulties. How are we to face them? Not by avoiding them; still less by saying that they do not exist; still less by saying that they are Satanic illusions. We are to face them in the steadfastness St. Paul tells us about in Ephesians 6. We are to put on "the whole armour of God." It won't be like Saul's armour when David tried it on—too big for us. It will fit, for it is God's provision of trustworthy equipment for a warfare we may confidently engage in when it is forced upon us.

Think of that equipment—nothing is left out: no vulnerable part is unprotected, and no necessary weapon is withheld from us—the girdle of truth which braces our energies, strengthens our characters, and gives poise and direction—the breastplate of righteousness which is moral and spiritual protection of innocence and a good conscience. "His strength was as the strength of ten, because his heart was pure"—thus did the poet sum up the perfect Knight, Sir Galahad (if our memory is correct): is it not a profound truth?

The Christian's warfare is not an end in itself. The foes are to be overcome, but what then? Then the constructive conquering work begins. We are not to stand content among our fallen foes, delighted with their defeat. We are to have our feet shod with "the preparation of the gospel of peace." The reconciling work is ours, and it is liberating work too. We have noted that prayer is a recourse at hand in face of perplexity. Here we come upon another rich possibility in face of the distracting and conflicting elements of present-day life. Let us try what we can do as stewards of "the gospel of peace." If the Christian instead of sharing in the general bewilderment of our time, and instead of trying too much argument, will try to be an oasis of comfort, modest wisdom, goodwill, helpfulness, sincerity, he or she may succeed in doing the very thing Our Lord most wants. Read the Beatitudes—"Blessed are the peace makers," and remember that there is an equally good translation—"Happy are the peace makers." If we can open up to others that particular avenue to happiness we have started them upon the path towards discovering that true and permanent happiness are only in Christ.

* * *

A Christian who is knocked out by the first blow cannot be said to make a valuable contribution to the Christian campaign. The man who rushes bare-headed into the thick of cudgels soon goes down. So does the Christian of inadequate preparation. We need no sudden resolves or hasty promises. We need to recall the Lord's parable about counting the cost (Luke 14, 28), and therefore we need to be sure of our convictions, sure of the ground we stand on (rock, not sand), and sure that difficulties are truly interpreted as tests of our convictions and not exposures of our loyalty. We need therefore "the shield of faith," and also "the helmet of salvation." Faith when it is well-seasoned, rational, and humble will carry us through. The soul which is guarded by true faith will never be brought low. It will always know enough of God's love and grace to survive the darkest hour.

* * *

The life of faith, lived in suburbia, or in a factory, or an office, or in professional duties, is bound to have effect as long as it is consistent, and of course as long as it is marked by the spirit of Christ. A common mistake of some professing Christians is an appearance of superiority to their neighbours. Another mistake is the censorious attitude, the tendency to frown on even quite innocent activities. Another mistake is to give the impression that Christianity is a very dull business. Perhaps dull people cannot avoid making all their interests dull to those around them. Certainly if we behave in a dull and dispirited way about our faith we shall be of little use to people who need the Lamp and the Light, and who expect to be shown that the faith we have in Christ is interesting, encouraging, enjoyable, and effective.

Our weapon is to be "The Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." Let us remember that the Sword of the Spirit is not necessarily the English translation of A.D. 1611 (the Authorised Version). There is no reason to shun the use of the Revised Version, and in a world in which the Christian's neighbours may be more familiar with the language of the B.B.C. and the daily paper than with the language of three-hundred and fifty years ago, there is good reason to acquaint them with the Word of God in a modern English version such as Dr. Weymouth's. That is a version of the New Testament which the evangelical Christian may confidently employ.

Patient reading of the Bible, in particular of the New Testament, will bring about the realisation that in it we have a map of life.

The distracted and despondent may find in it the clues to daily constructive living, and the deliverance from sin and from selfish ends. The doubtful may find a worthwhile proposition—"Lord I believe: help Thou mine unbelief." If the significance of that prayer is grasped: if the belief, however small, is real, grace will come, but we must persevere. If we mean it, we may soon discover the force of this other phrase "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." "Saved" from what? "Saved" for what? These are questions to think about. We can be saved in Christ from fears, anxieties, sorrows. We can be saved in Christ for the object of spreading the good news, for real usefulness, for wholesome influence and spontaneous goodwill. We can be saved in Christ from sin, and saved in Him for eternity.

But some may say "What do we mean by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ?" There is the answer we can quote and there is the answer we can give as our testimony (what we ourselves have found), and there is the answer each man must learn for himself.

We believe that in Christ we are set free from the law of sin and of death. We believe in Him as a true historical person who lived and died among men, and rose from the tomb, and did so because He is God the Son who took away the sin of the World. We believe that in the light of these facts He is through the Father's will, the Way, the Truth, and the Life for all men.

We can testify that His precious Blood is our life, and that we know Him and the power of His resurrection. Beyond that there is the knowledge which grows fuller and deeper in fellowship, and there alone.

Man's needs are not met by outward things, technics or automation. Man is spiritual and his troubles are largely due to his unawareness of, or reluctance to admit, that fact. How truly did Dante express the vital thing in the line—"In His will is our peace." Augustine nearly a thousand years earlier had said of God "Thou hast made us for Thyself; and our hearts are restless till they find rest in Thee." Dante in the intrigues and dangers of an Italian mediaeval town, and Augustine after years of moral intellectual and spiritual confusion, reached in their own experiences the peace the word of God told them they could attain.

* * *

Can we claim a single virtue for spiritual stagnation, or point out any advantage in spiritual decline? Is anybody to-day the better for not having the Christian faith? Are men now showing that they can make good without God?

The Christless man of two thousand years ago was described thus—"With hearts filled with all sorts of dishonesty, mischief, greed, malice; full of envy and bloodthirstiness, quarrelsome, crafty, spiteful, secret back-biters, open slanderers; hateful to God, insolent, haughty, ostentatious; inventors of mischief, disobedient to parents, destitute of sense, faithless, without affection, and without pity." Are Christless men to-day any different? Of course we recognise that there are and always have been good men not professing the Christian faith. We set no limits to the activity of the Spirit of Christ. But the general inclination is to the worse, not to the better.

* * *

The tendency to deteriorate, like the will to stagnate, is in some degree due to thinking of Christianity as a set of opinions and procedures to be held. If we consider Christianity to be "a system" it is likely that it will be valued as a system, and its true nature as the living of a redeemed, expanding spiritual life will tend to be disregarded. It will become a matter of precepts and obligations in preference to a real union with God. What we want to emphasise is that our religion which is "Christ's Religion" is more than a system, and more than precepts and obligations. Spiritual progress is being made when we are finding out for ourselves the inner life of the Spirit. When we realise the inner life of the Spirit, the precepts and obligations cease to be duties we carry on, and become spontaneous expressions of our new life. The system is no longer a system, for it has become a sphere of our spiritual activity. It is a field of spiritual energy. Rightly does the Creed of Nicaea say of the Holy Spirit that He is "the Giver of life."

* * *

Our own spiritual progress is capable of being tested. We can examine our increase in spiritual capacity, insight, determination. We can pursue knowledge. In Col. 1. 10 we have a reminder that we can increase in "the knowledge of God"—consult the passage and make it a prayer.

In 2 Cor. 7. 1. Another step forward is indicated by the words "perfecting holiness in the fear of God." Holiness here is plainly shown to be "separation from sin." We can go on perfecting our alienation from sin, even if we make no presumptuous claim that we have reached perfection.

In 2 Peter 3. 18 we are told to "grow in grace." The Christian does develop in the environment of grace. It is his true spiritual climate. The conditions favourable to growth in grace are available to all of us, and why should we not try to be worthwhile persons?

Naturally we may grow in power. Practice increases every kind of skill, and spiritual power never came to us through neglect of our opportunities. So St. Paul says (2 Cor. 9. 10) in the language of prayer, may "He that ministereth seed to the sower . . . increase the fruits of your righteousness." The sincere Christian who is unpretending in his goodwill and not engrossed in worldly matters will always find his Christian influence increasing, and will know that God is accepting and blessing his efforts.

God will also help us to love our neighbours and our enemies. As we find ill-will and indifference and contempt for others dying out in us, and sympathy and thoughtfulness, and generosity of spirit growing in us we shall mark the progress in love which God is giving us. 1 Thess. 3. 12 puts it into a brief sentence "The Lord make you to increase and abound in love."

* * *

What is the key to it all? Simply this, that we pray. How? Look at Ephesians 6. 18 "Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching there unto with all perseverance and supplication." Thus St. Paul expands the words of Our Lord ("watch and pray" Mk. 13. 33), and claims the power of the Spirit to aid us. He puts this more explicitly in Romans 8—"The Spirit helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit Himself maketh intercession for us . . . He maketh intercession for the saints according to the Will of God."

That indeed is the sum of the whole matter. Spiritual progress is evidence of the presence with us of the Holy Spirit, and it is His presence which enables us "to bear one another's burdens" in the twentieth as in the first century.

"FUNDAMENTALISM."

Let us begin by saying that we are not at all clear as to the meaning of "Fundamentalism." The word is used in different senses. We believe that it started into popular religious vocabulary soon after a group of evangelical Christians in the United States of America circulated all over the World a series of booklets on "The Fundamentals" of the Christian faith. That was about forty years ago. The group had agreed as to what are "the fundamentals." Obviously, other groups of professing Christians might not agree with them. Disputes were bound to take place, and did take place over the question "What is essential Christian belief?" Orthodox Christians holding the faith of the ecumenical creeds agreed in the main with the list of doctrine put forward as fundamental to our faith. No doubt they felt that a few were susceptible of other interpretations, and did not lay equal emphasis on all. Liberals appear to have reacted strongly against the booklets, mainly because they seemed contrary to contemporary scientific beliefs, and because they rejected what used to be called "the assured results" of Biblical criticism. Readers may remember how in America the issue became involved with the current theories of evolutionary science; and how at least one State Congress prohibited the teaching of evolution in State schools. A notable trial of a science teacher took place in Dayton, Tennessee. He was charged with breaking the law about evolution teaching, and was defended by a famous liberal lawyer. On the other side was the even more famous W. J. Bryan who publicly pledged himself to absolutely literal acceptance of what he understood to be the Biblical teaching on Creation. Thus in America "fundamentalism" was identified in the popular mind with the rejection of modern knowledge, and the liberals thought their opponents were obscurantists and reactionaries. Fundamentalists in the heat of conflict retaliated with their accusations of insincerity and baseless theorising.

Thus, when the word "Fundamentalism" came into current use in these islands it was thought to stand for the rejection of all modern scholarship, and regarded as a refusal to face facts.

* * *

We think that during the past thirty years the trend of Christian scholarship has been increasingly conservative. As far as it goes, it seems to lend support to conservative beliefs about the Bible and Christian doctrines. The rise among us of a fresh appreciation of Bible teaching under the more imposing title of "Biblical Theology" is a sign that a positive attitude to Holy Scripture has replaced the negative criticism of a generation ago. We welcome this return to constructive thought and spiritual unsight.

Fundamentalism may be found in a crude as well as in an enlightened form. Crude fundamentalism may mark certain backward sects, especially in their less responsible interpretations and individualistic notions. This is radically different from the genuine scholarship and experienced exposition of men of real education and equipment. The orthodox and conservative faith of Dr. Machen or Archdeacon Hammond is very different from the bellicose diehardism we meet with in certain professedly evangelical quarters.

* * *

What is Fundamentalism as we find it in its best manifestations? A lively faith in the living God, the Creator and Sustainer of all life, and the author of Eternal Life. A positive acceptance of the redeeming love and friendship of God the Son, which was displayed towards us on Calvary, and assured by the shedding of His Precious Blood which has effectively taken away our sin—a reception of the Holy Ghost the comforter, as the Spirit of power, guidance, and wisdom—belief that the Bible is, as Christ's Church has ever taught, the Word of God, with the further belief that as originally given to men it is inerrant. Fundamentalism does not stand for a mere formal acknowledgment of these beliefs, but for an active personal surrender to them, and for a realisation that they make demands upon us. So, we are given to understand, fundamentalism considers itself the genuine expression of traditional Christian truth.

It is not a Christian witness or faith which, in legal language, is "void for uncertainty"!

* * *

Now we know that there must be different apprehensions of spiritual truth; and we have no desire for a standardised dogmatic Christianity. That is Rome's idea of the Christian faith, not ours. We freely allow that the faith must be personally received and understood, and that people who think cannot be made to think alike. But the Gospel is not a maze of vague aspirations and interesting emotions: it is historic, challenging for world conquest. It is God's weapon against sin, and His instrument of reconciliation. So the critics of Fundamentalism must content themselves with objecting to the fundamentalist attitude to the Bible, otherwise they are objecting to something which is not "fundamentalism" at all, but strictly "the Christian faith."

* * *

While not writing as fundamentalists we think it is necessary to put down these points because we believe that the campaign being carried on against "Fundamentalism" in Great Britain to-day is a mis-direction of energy and a definite weakening of Christian witness.

Is it not the simple truth that the orthodox Christian's of all denominations and the fundamentalists believe precisely the same doctrines, except that the fundamentalists hold a particular view of the inspiration of the Bible? Why should that be magnified to such an extent as to overshadow every other issue, and create division where there ought to be fellowship, and conflict where there ought to be intelligent devotion to the common aim?

Suppose we say that we think the fundamentalist is wrong in his view of Bible inerrancy—are we therefore to act and speak as though he is wrong in everything? Suppose the fundamentalist thinks that those who disagree with him are mistaken—ought he to make that the decisive ground for declining any Christian fellowship?

We naturally prefer the company of the like-minded—but ought we to shun others unless we have our hundred per cent. agreement with them?

* * *

All the above is preliminary to a comment on the criticism of Fundamentalism which appeared in "The Church Times" of 9 May. Dr. G. W. H. Lampe discusses what that paper describes as "one of the pressing problems." He calls "Fundamentalism" "Conservative Evangelicalism." At once we see where we are—the old war against traditional evangelicalism is still waged. Conservative Evangelicalism is nothing new. It has always been a pronounced feature of reformed Christianity; and indeed claims to be original Christianity. We are not supporting Dr. Lampe and decrying Fundamentalism; and we are not supporting Fundamentalism and scolding Dr. Lampe. We are simply expressing our surprise that in the present state of society, and in the present predicaments of the Christian Churches, it should be thought timely, fitting, sensible, and Christian to resent and condemn any orthodox and wholehearted discipleship.

Dr. Lampe is a University teacher, and therefore meets the Inter-Varsity Fellowship of Evangelical Unions. He pays it this tribute "a most powerful Christian force especially in schools and universities, and a movement which in its impact on the Church of England is producing many ordinands as well as devoted laymen." We read this tribute, and in our simplicity say "Thank God." We think that earnest Christian faith and life are more important than a particular theological problem. We believe that there are many more harmful opinions in circulation in these islands than the opinions censured in "The Church Times." There are false Christian forms of thought—Christian Science, Jehovah's Witnesses, Spiritism, etc. There are various Secularisms. There is Materialism, There is Communism. There is sheer mindless indifference. There is open unashamed sin. Why fight with Fundamentalism? Why win a dialectical skirmish there and lose the Holy War against the enemies of God?

Dr. Lampe speaks of Fundamentalism's "strong and vital outward-looking missionary spirit." He calls it "its best characteristic"—so it is, for it is obedience to Christ's final command. He objects to "its narrow sectarianism and its rigid attitude towards biblical interpretation." We are not well enough read in the subject to offer any comment on this, but again we think the criticism is excessive, because the living message of the New Testament is there for us to receive and act upon whether our intellectual approach to the critical problems is rigidly conservative or merely conservative.

Dr. Lampe further regrets the "Conservative Evangelical" view of Our Lord's Atonement—it is seen in terms of "vicarious punishment." We ask "how can you arrive at a view of the Atonement except by using the Biblical material?" That material undoubtedly includes the element of vicarious punishment. It may not be the popular view, but have we the right to disregard it?

* * *

Reference is made to Dr. Hebert's recent "Fundamentalism and the Church of God." That book is a most interesting one. Dr. Hebert writes with remarkable appreciation of the literary work of T. C. Hammond, long connected with us, and honoured among us here in Ireland. In fact, Dr. Hebert acknowledges so freely the virtues and achievements of Fundamentalism that when he comes to criticise it, his criticisms have already been discounted to a large extent.

It seems to us that we need to recognise this, that Christianity and the Bible in the theologian's study are one thing, and Christianity and the Bible in the life of the serious practical man in the workaday world of sin and conflict are another. Let each try to understand the other; let both try to meet more often on common ground. Let each stand the test of results. Above all, let us stop denouncing our brethren in Christ when the enemies of God are making serious inroads upon all truth and morality.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 62.

were most unexpectedly prevented from leaving by the Moroccan government. In any case, immigration to Palestine is simply phenomenal. Where indeed is the country with such limited resources as Palestine, that can absorb eighty thousand new-comers, in twelve months. The miracle is enhanced when we think back. When the Jews took over the government in 1948, the economic conditions were far worse than they are to-day. In the last eight months of that year 101,800 immigrants arrived, and in the following year 239,600 arrived. In less than ten years 913,300 Jews returned to their homeland. We venture to guess that there is not a country in the world, of the size of Palestine, with such undeveloped conditions that could absorb such an influx of people. One item alone beggars imagination. To manage and maintain law and order, in such a liquid mass of humanity, from seventy-six countries, with their different cultures and languages, is nothing short of a miracle. Yet the country never looked back. Friendless and surrounded by powerful enemies, Parliamentary institutions, on democratic lines, were quickly established. Hebrew culture commenced with rapid growth of educational establishments of a high order. Building, agriculture, commerce and industry has gone forward with an amazing speed. A defence force has been formed, of the calibre that a neighbouring enemy will think twice before measuring swords. But whence comes all this? Well, it is Palestine! Palestine is different. It is the land of God's choice, and unlike any other country, it enjoys Divine Purpose, present and future. There is not a spot on the earth with which the Bible is so closely related, and in which so many of God's promises are vested. Palestine, "My land."

* * *

Dating Dead Sea Scrolls—Tests of Parchment.

The Department of Leather Industries at Leeds University is working on a new method of dating old parchments, and has started using it on fragments of the Dead Sea scrolls. Chemical analysis has shown that none of the parchments tested so far was made in the Dead Sea area. The new method is a result of some fundamental research which the department is doing into the nature of certain animal tissues.

The dating technique has not been perfected yet. At present it cannot be used to give an absolute date to a parchment, though it can tell if different fragments are of the same age. It has been used in this way on many of the scroll fragments in the possession of Mr. J. M. Allegro, of Manchester University, and has confirmed that these were made at the same time. An approximate estimate of the date of these fragments has refuted suggestions that they were as recent as A.D. 600, but cannot say much more than this. The technique should be able to give absolute dates in about eighteen months' time after it has been calibrated by using it on parchments of known dates. Professor Donald Burton, the head of the department, expects it to be more accurate than the conventional radio-active carbon methods.

Shrinkage

The technique relies on the fact that the animal fibres in the parchment—which is a form of uncured leather—gradually change with age. The parchment fragments are put in water and slowly heated until at a certain temperature they suddenly shrink. This "shrinkage temperature" is lower in old parchments than in new ones and can be used to construct an accurate time scale. It can only be used on materials which have been stored in very dry conditions, as is the case with most of the Dead Sea scrolls.

The department is also chemically analysing the scroll fragments in an attempt to locate the places where they were made. The Dead Sea and many of the desert springs contain rare trace elements which are peculiar to each location and these can be matched with the elements found in the parchments. The Dead Sea, for example, contains a good deal of the common sodium, calcium and magnesium salts, but very little magnesium has been found in any of the parchments tested so far. It is therefore reasonable to assume that they did not come from there, though whether the scrolls were written there is another matter. A research assistant has just returned from the Middle East after making a detailed survey of the local water supplies and the trace elements they contain. He has also brought back many fragments of the original scrolls and some from the recent finds at Qumran.

—"Manchester Guardian," 27/3/'58.

* * *

Excavating City of Joshua—Bible as Manual.

Dr. Yigael Yadin, the former Chief of Staff of the Israel defence forces, held a press conference recently in what more than a hundred years ago was Turner's studio, in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea. Dr. Yadin is now a lecturer in the department of archaeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He spoke about the Hazor excavations, the Dead Sea Scrolls, and the first ten years of the State of Israel. Hazor, where Dr. Yadin has been leading the James de Rothschild expedition, was the biblical city in North Galilee associated with Joshua about 2,300 years ago.

The results of the first three years' work are to be displayed in the British Museum next month. Whereas normally there is a time lag of some twenty years between the diggings of the archaeologists and the publication of their findings, the first volume of the Rothschild expedition has been published this week. Quoting 1 Kings, 9, 15, Dr. Yadin referred to the cities of Hazor, Gezer, and Megiddo, which had been rebuilt by King Solomon.

American archaeologists had found King Solomon's city gate and city walls of Megiddo some twenty years ago. When Dr. Yadin and his team were engaged on Hazor they were able to forewarn their assistants of exactly what they would find. The specifications were the same as at Megiddo and all the details were to be found in the Bible. Exactly the same had been true of Gezer. "In fact," Dr. Yadin commented, "The Bible is a real manual to archaeologists excavating in the Holy Land."

They had not discovered any new scrolls. All seven had already been published. One would be appearing at the Brussels international fair in the Israel exhibition. The new fragments were all in Jordan; but they had not been published. Dr. Yadin believed that the Dead Sea Scrolls would have a considerable effect on the Epistle to the Hebrews. He believed that the Hebrews to which the epistle refers were "the early Christians who originally belonged to the Dead Sea Scrolls sect" and that the Epistle had been written to prove Jesus's superiority over other messianic personalities, the implication being that the lay Messiah was also the priestly Messiah, the Dead Sea Scrolls gave a new interpretation to the Epistle.

—"Manchester Guardian," 18/4/'58.

Revival! — or Revolution?

WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT

"BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE

NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH

*"If I take the wings of the morning,
and dwell in the uttermost parts of the
sea. Even there shall Thy hand lead me."*

Just published:

Selections from the Scriptures in Arë-
Arë for the Arë-Arë, Kōio, and Dorio
peoples.

This little book of 193 pages contains selected chapters and portions from the Old and New Testaments in the language of people of the Solomon Islands. It is the first issue of the Scriptures in these dialects. The Solomon Islands are off the N.E. coast of Australia.

Produced by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 7—LXVII

DUBLIN, JULY, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	73
Gregory Dix, D.D., and Anglican Orders	74
Editor's Chair	78
Catholic and Roman Catholic	80
Correspondence	82

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

A Timely Comment on Ireland To-day—Necessary to Bridge Spiritual Differences.

—Provost of T.C.D.

Some were too ready to throw the blame for our ills on the physical separation of our country, but that was not the real reason, declared Dr. A. J. McConnell, Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, when he opened the eighth annual congress of the Irish Students' Association in the college.

"I feel," he said, "that before things can be righted, there must be efforts made to bridge the spiritual divisions from which the country is suffering." People in the South of Ireland, perhaps, did not quite realise how deep some of these divisions were. In the North it was well apparent. But even in the South there were very few efforts made to bridge those divisions between us.

There were associations founded in all good faith, yet by their very essence they only emphasised those divisions among us. For example, there was, he understood, a Catholic University Students' Organisation. He did not for one moment suggest that people should not be allowed to have such an organisation if they wanted to, but what he would ask was, were there any problems which a Catholic university organisation could not discuss much better if there were Protestants present?

Dr. McConnell said that there were far too many occasions on which it seemed to be implied, in the South at least, that Ireland was a Catholic country. If that was to be the attitude of the younger people now, we were not going to get any solution to the unity of this country. Ireland, to his mind, was both a Catholic and a Protestant country. The gap between these two could only be bridged in an atmosphere of toleration and goodwill.

The Chief Problem

The Provost said that one of the chief problems from which universities in the Twenty-Six Counties suffered was financial. "In spite of the fact that the Government shows a great deal of sympathetic interest in university education, nevertheless, they do not seem to understand that you cannot get very far without money."

Dr. McConnell said that there had been recent comments on the numbers and locations of Irish university institutions, but he thought that the main problem was rather one of their co-operation. If the universities did not co-operate, they could not expect other sections of the community to do so. Trinity College would welcome to the fullest extent any co-operation with all other Irish colleges and university institutions.

Referring to the theme of the congress—"The dilemma of the Irish student"—he said that he regarded the mass emigration of our students as the most serious aspect. Not only university students were leaving in great numbers, but young people in all walks of life.

This country had not yet organised itself in such a way as to organise employment of university graduates, but that was not the only problem. Some of our young people were running away from a way of life, as well as for economic reasons. The future of any country depended on its young people, and he felt that that was particularly true of Ireland, because there was not any question that this country was a sick one. The older generation did not seem to be able to find a solution. "Perhaps your generation will," he added.

Of Religious Character

Mr. G. Tierney (U.C.D.) pointed out that the Association of Catholic University Students in Ireland was not an organisation which came together to discuss topics of general interest. It was an organisation of definite religious character, and more a branch of the Legion of Mary than any other organisation.

Dr. McConnell replied that he was not intending any criticism.

—"Irish Times," 2/5/58.

Excavations in the Land of the Bible.

The remarkable results of the first three seasons' excavations at the site of the great biblical city of Hazor, which was captured by Joshua as recorded in the Old Testament, were given at a Press Conference by Dr. Yigael Yadin, Lecturer in Archaeology in the Hebrew University of Israel. The results of these excavations will be on show in a special exhibition to be held at the British Museum from May 3.

Dr. Yadin said that he was still excited about everything that they had found there. In many cases it was, as far as archaeology in Palestine and Israel was concerned, the most dramatic corroboration of Biblical narrative. They were told in 1 Kings ix, 15, that King Solomon built the three royal cities of Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer. This latest discovery was made with the help of that one short verse from the Book of the Kings. It was the clearest case they could have of how the Bible could be a real guide; a manual, to archaeologists excavating in the Holy Land.

Gezer had been excavated about 50 years ago by an English archaeologist, and the amazing thing was that it was exactly identical in plan and measurement with the other two cities, as if they had been built by one royal architect. Dr. Yadin said that the excavations at Hazor were the largest excavations in the whole of Palestine.

(Continued on p. 82.)

GREGORY DIX, D.D. AND ANGLICAN ORDERS.

Several months ago we referred to Dom Gregory Dix and his views on the nature of Holy Orders. Lest the title "Dom" should lead some readers to think that Dr. Dix was a Roman Catholic monk, we point out that he was a member of a Church of England Monastic Community which follows the Benedictine rules, and so employs the title distinctive of Benedictines. We have no occasion to question the choice of such community life—it suits the tastes, temperament, and interests of certain people, and we do not deny their liberty to adopt it. Dom Gregory Dix was a diligent scholar and a devout man. His death in middle life was a loss to his friends and to certain branches of scholarship. But we have no disposition to accept his opinions or his verdicts on any matter. He contributed to a large collection of studies called "The Apostolic Ministry," a very pretentious work which displayed extensive learning with no corresponding critical judgment. In his contributions to it, it was said that Dom Dix argued to foregone conclusions—that what was assumed on one page was taken as proved on the next! But we must not be too critical, for we may at times be tempted to argue in the same way on another issue.

* * *

A short popular book by Dom Gregory is "The Question of Anglican Orders." This is subtitled "Letters to a Layman." It has been reprinted three times since 1944, and a new edition appeared in 1956. The point of the letters is mainly the defence of Anglican Orders against the strictures and condemnation of them by Pope Leo XIII in 1895.

We have already stated our view that Pope Leo had no alternative but to condemn Anglican Orders on his own grounds—for the Anglican Church at the Reformation rejected the late mediaeval notion of the nature of the Christian priesthood. The Council of Trent reaffirmed the mediaeval theory, and when Leo examined the question he rightly declared that the Anglican doctrine and his Church's doctrine did not agree.

As Leo held a wrong view of the Christian ministry and the Anglicans held the right one, it is obvious that Leo believing himself to be not wrong, but right, must say so, and issue his Bull against the ministry of the Church of England.

Leo ascribed powers to the priesthood which the Christian priesthood does not possess. The Church of England restored the true primitive principle of the ministry.

If we accept the Roman suppositions as to the ministry, we cannot find them implied or explicit in the Anglican Ordinal. This is a position which is independent of the question of forms of ordination. It was easy to show that Pope Leo had ignored early forms of Ordination, but that did not touch the real point. The real point is that Rome as represented by Leo assigns to the priesthood powers which are certainly not assigned to it either by the Anglican Ordinal, or by early liturgies.

* * *

On page 15 of the second edition Dom Dix says "the C. of E. has continuously claimed that in ordaining bishops, priests, and deacons the C. of E. intends to do and does essentially what the whole Catholic Church from the Apostles' time until now has meant and accomplished by the ordination of a bishop, priest, or deacon." Now a glance at the preface to the English Ordinal annexed to the Book of Common Prayer will show that what Dom Gregory says here is different from what the preface says. The preface does not assert that we mean what was meant at any stage during the evolution of theories of the ministry. No fixed and unvarying belief as to the nature of the ministry can be stated as absolutely held in the Church from the earliest days till the sixteenth century. There were bishops, priests, and deacons, from the first Age of the Church, and these Orders were retained in the reformed Church of England. But that is not the same as saying that the reformed Church of England saw nothing in the current notion of priesthood which called for correction. We simply cannot claim that we accept the theory of the priesthood which is to be found in the decrees of Trent or in the Roman Catechism.

Rome may say that "from the Catholic standpoint Anglican Orders are void," but Rome cannot define "the Catholic standpoint" (from which she has departed) she can only speak of "our standpoint," and from that angle alone she may declare Anglican Orders void.

* * *

Dom Gregory (page 18) proposes to his readers that the really profound differences "and they are very profound indeed" between Protestant and Catholic Christianity all centre round the word "justification." He then gives his exposition of "justification by Faith" as the Protestant creed. This enables him to declare that justification "left out altogether the ideas of the Church and the Sacraments from the whole operation of Redemption and Sanctification." He has to admit that Protestantism could not help seeing that "the New Testament represents our Lord as having instituted the Church...and certain external actions and signs." "Protestants kept them, but were forced to empty them of much of their Scriptural meaning."

Dom Gregory in his ingenuous follow-up of this idea tries to persuade his reader that Protestants did not bother about grace or about the work of the Holy Spirit: that all they needed was to proclaim "the Gospel." How ignorantly wide-of-the-mark this is in the light of the teaching of the Reforming theologians need not be emphasised. He seems not to have kept in mind that his own Church (which we suppose he would have distinguished from "Protestant" Churches) in Article II affirms—"that we are justified by Faith only is a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort." The same Thirty-Nine Articles define Sacraments as "sure witnesses and effectual signs of Grace and God's goodwill towards us, by the which He doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken but also strengthen and confirm our Faith in Him." The Articles also define the visible Church of Christ as "a congregation of faithful men in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the Sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." Plainly the Church of England is not of opinion (in the sixteenth century or since) that justification by Faith only renders Church and Sacraments redundant or irrelevant, or that if the externals are kept, the real meaning of Church and Sacraments has been evacuated.

* * *

"Protestantism retained the idea of the Church despite its awkwardness in the Protestant scheme of thought"—this is one of Dom Gregory's dicta, though it cannot be this sort of thing which gave him a reputation for scholarship. If he had examined Calvin's "Institutes," or Jewel, or Hooker, he would not have said that the idea of the Church is an awkward one for Protestants. Why should it be? Why should Dix and others assume that Justification by Faith is inconsistent with Churchmanship or with Christian antiquity? In Bishop Kaye's edition of Justin Martyr's First Apology, Justification by Faith is discussed as a patristic doctrine. It may be remembered too that it is taught in that truly Catholic volume the New Testament.

If we contrast Dom Gregory's thoughts on Justification with the lessons to be learnt from a small volume "The Doctrine of Justification by Faith," Mowbray's, 1954, we shall see how the Anglican writers of all shades of opinion in this book treat the subject with far more understanding and therefore with far more appreciation. The chapter on "The Sacraments and Justification" (by Dr. G. W. H. Lampe) ends thus—"It is clear enough that 'faith alone' means 'faith without works of merit.' It does not mean faith without Sacraments, nor a subjective and individualistic adherence to Christ which ignores the Church." We could quote much more from this Anglican book which would fit in here, but we must refrain. What we have quoted is enough to show that we must not take Dom Gregory as the last word. To do so would be to display our own insufficiency of knowledge and discernment.

* * *

Now let us take an example of Dom Gregory's spiritual intelligence: What are we to think of this—"The gift of the Holy Spirit is not regarded by Protestants as something definitely imparted by an external sacramental act which which may be done or refused by Christ's human representatives acting in His Name, but as an inspiration which any man receives in answer to his own interior desires." We think this, that the representatives of Christ are not like excisemen empowered to release certain goods from bond on agreed terms. We believe in the grace of the Holy Spirit through the effectual signs of Christ's appointment, but we believe that the gift of the Holy Spirit is freely imparted according to God's sovereign grace. Did not Our Lord teach us that? May we not recall His saying "...how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?" The gift is not an answer to "our own interior desires," for no Christian can ignore, or wishes to ignore, God's sovereign will in this matter. Our Lord also promised, before His ascension, to send "another Comforter, who shall abide for ever." Firm belief in sacramental grace does not exclude equally firm belief in prevenient grace, and belief in the gifts of the Spirit mediated through human agencies does not suppress belief in promise of God, "I will pour out of My Spirit upon all flesh."

It seems that Dom Gregory, having constructed the kind of Protestantism he has no difficulty in discounting, has not embarrassed himself by enquiring into the true nature of the beliefs of evangelical Christians.

Having outlined what he calls "the classical Protestant conception of the Ministry" (as a mere preaching ministry), Dom Gregory promptly contradicts himself and his theory by this phrase "but it is right to say that all Calvinists have always laid much more emphasis on the disciplinary authority of those set apart for the discharge of the preaching ministry than have Lutherans and Independents." Plainly, we say, it will not do to construct a convenient theory of the "Protestant" view of the ministry by omitting all Calvinistic theology on the point. It may be convenient, but it is not scholarship.

It might have been noted also that the Calvinistic Protestant position is that "there be only two Sacraments ordained by Christ our Lord in the Gospel, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord; neither of which may be dispensed by any but by a Minister of the Word, lawfully ordained" (Westminster Confession of Faith, ch. 27, 4). This same document defines Baptism as a seal of the covenant of grace and of regeneration, and by it the grace promised is really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost, and in the Lord's Supper it assures us that worthy receivers by faith receive spiritually Christ crucified, and all the benefits of His death. The importance, then, of these two Sacraments in this Protestant Confession is indisputable. We believe that the Westminster Divines, like the Anglican Divines of the Thirty-Nine Articles, knew very well what they were doing, and that their declaration of Justification by Faith only is no contradiction whatever of the Grace of the Sacraments, and does not render Sacraments unnecessary.

We have quoted already Article II of the Thirty-Nine Articles "of the Justification of man"—"that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome Doctrine." Now when Dom Gregory comes to speak of the Church of England's view of this doctrine he says it made its voice heard "unmistakably"—"what it said about Justification is orthodox though hesitantly phrased!" We need not dwell on the ill-matched words "unmistakably" and "hesitantly," but note the statement that much of what the Church of England had to say is "an anticipation of what the Council of Trent had to say." How very cleverly the Church of England is abstracted from its agreement on "Justification by Faith only" with Evangelical and Reformed Churches, and deposited on the side of the Roman Council of Trent, in spite of the contradiction between the Eleventh Article and the Decrees of Trent Session 6, canon 9! He treats the Articles on the Sacraments as "anti-Protestant," and as contrary to Justification by Faith only, and, having ignored Article II he is able to pen the words "this repudiation of Protestantism in the reign of Elizabeth is very important." It is a Protestantism of his own invention; and he does not allow his readers to realise that there is no single rigid Protestant position. But Dom Gregory's young readers to whom his letters were sent originally cannot have perceived the defects in the argument. If you keep on pretending that there are practically no serious differences between Anglicanism and Rome you are falsifying the history of four hundred years, and implying that the Marian Martyrs and others deserved their fate.

* * *

Another sample of Dom Gregory's way of considering the past is on page 28—"The old 'High Church' apologetic for Anglicanism was sincere and consistent, but also a little deficient not only in plausibility, but in candour..." How we can reconcile sincerity and a deficiency in candour we do not profess to know—we may leave it to our readers to puzzle it out. We have studied one of the old High Church apologetics—Barrow on "The Pope's Supremacy"—we found it a learned vigorous and manly defence, and a challenge to the Pope to give up his uncatholic dogmas and to return to true Catholicism.

A further sample of discussion is to be found on page 30—"It is a commonplace of all theology, that no public formulary of the Church can be or ought to be interpreted by the private sense attached to it by the compilers." Correct: but compare with it what is said on page 31 where the meaning of the Article 28 of the Thirty-Nine (of the Lord's Supper) is established by the words "Bishop Guest, who was the actual author of this Article publicly insisted that it meant and was intended to mean..." Here the private sense attached to Article 28 by its compiler is used to define its meaning. Dom Gregory was evidently accustomed to being allowed to have it both ways.!

* * *

We have not lost sight of the purpose of this book to discuss "Anglican Orders." Dom Gregory puts the point—"If the Pope was right" in condemning Anglican Orders "then on its own principles the Anglican Church is more or less of a bogus church, even though in good faith." This, we say, is preposterous. We say that Dom Gregory has wrongly handled the principles of Anglicanism. He seems to be (and we hope we are not unfair) one of those Anglicans who believe that Rome is generally right and who endeavour to show that the Church of England is in agreement with Rome. Hooker, Jewel, Laud, Usher, Stillingfleet, Barrow, Burnet, to refer to a few of our divines, are all to be rejected. The paradoxical answer is that the Pope was right because the Pope was wrong. By that we mean that, holding a wrong view of priesthood, the Pope had no alternative but to condemn those who hold the true view. Have we made the point clear?

* * *

Lest we should be thought guilty of be-littling Dom Gregory's book unduly we are glad to say that it contains some very interesting and indeed valuable information on various early and mediaeval forms of Ordination services. Many of them are akin in conception to the Anglican. But the nature of the priesthood, and the powers believed to be conferred in ordination were under review in the sixteenth century and the English Ordinal indubitably takes another view of the priesthood than the current one of that day. Nathaniel Dimmock in his "Christian Doctrine of Sacerdotium" shows definitely that the intention of the Ordinal is to resort to the ancient idea of the Christian priesthood, and to disallow the view which was considered a corruption of the original office. In short, the English Ordinal abandoned the mediaeval idea of "a sacrificing priesthood." The word "sacrifice" we know may be used in many Christian connections, eucharistic and otherwise; but the particular view of Christ offering Himself afresh in the Mass by the ministry of priests, and their power to re-enact Calvary in an unbloody manner were matters designedly laid aside in the sixteenth century. It was plainly held that they involved a mistaken view of the nature of the priesthood—the office was retained and continued, but its true original significance was reasserted. How then could Pope Leo XIII approve of the Anglican ordinations without thereby acknowledging that his own Church's views were mistaken?

* * *

The Anglican Ordinal has the sound true intention of perpetuating the traditional ministries of the Church of Christ. By the time of the Reformation some beliefs about the functions of the Ministry were deemed erroneous, and reference to them was left out of the Reformed Ordinal. Roman Catholic theologians have therefore condemned the Reformed Ordinal. From their point of view could they do otherwise? They could claim that the intention of the Reformed Ordinal was no longer their intention: we claim that the intention of the Reformed Ordinal is no longer their's but is the intention of the Church from the time of the Apostles, no longer marked by late mediaeval mistake. That is the point Dom Gregory avoids till almost his last pages. He writes of "the eucharistic sacrifice." That phrase is ancient, but often misunderstood—it has a reasonable and legitimate use—a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving associated with the Holy Communion. But the word sacrifice in the late Middle Ages and in some modern uses may be thought to signify sacrificing Our Lord afresh; and the word "immolation" is officially employed. We know that that sort of sacramental theology is alien to the Anglican theology.

He writes at last "there was a real intention and desire to repudiate the usual current formulation of the eucharistic sacrifice which involved not only the idea of a 'mactation' (slaying of a sacrificial victim), 'immolation' (offering in sacrifice of the victim), or at least a status declivior ('downward state') in the Mass, but a fresh sacrifice of Christ in every Mass." But these beliefs are thought necessary to the Roman concept of priesthood. The priest is ordained to effect these very things. Here at length then, Dom Gregory had the answer which exploded his earlier point that "if the Pope was right, then on its own principles the Anglican Church is more or less of a bogus Church." When we say that the Pope was right only a very simple person would think that we mean anything else than that he was bound by his own principles to act as he did.

We have more doubt about the validity of Roman Orders than we have of Anglican ones. On the historico-ecclesiastical level Anglicanism is secure. Still, let us remember that there is a fellowship of God's elect, a Communion of Saints, which transcends the seen and the temporal. God claims "all souls are Mine": how small are our contests in face of the unity that claim declares!

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the Manager Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies, and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE CHRISTIAN PATH.

We have often thought that we lose a good deal by not holding to New Testament names for many things in our Christian life. The instance now in our mind is the one which gives this paper its title—"the Path." In the Acts of the Apostles Christianity, or the Gospel, is spoken of several times as "the Way." The Greek word translated "way" is found about twenty times in Acts, and of those occurrences we have possible English renderings, "journey," "ways," "road," "following" (Ac. 9, 2.), "rules," "habits," "plan" (Ac. 16, 17.), "system" (Ac. 19, 23.). We mark how Felix the Roman Governor is described in Acts 24, 22, as having "more perfect knowledge of that Way." As Felix in no sense attempted to follow the Christian path, we must understand "Way" in this place to mean teaching or belief, or habit, as exemplified by others. For the Christian believer it is a very different thing. "The Way," however we interpret the word, is the very opposite of "theory." All emphasis is upon "practice." It is the kind of practice which makes "progress." So, every way we look at it, the real Christian principle is there—we go on. True faith is never static: true morality is never complacent: we have not attained perfection, but must go on unto perfection (Heb. 6, 1.). The rest of faith is reliance in God's promises, not reclining upon them. Whatever interpretation we give to the word "way," and we have indicated some of the senses in which we believe it may be understood, the outstanding feature is activity, and the purpose of activity is advance in a prescribed direction.

* * *

We all know how our Lord in the Gospels is constantly teaching that the duty of man in the service of God is to be up and doing. How aptly that lesson is caught in one of the old collects in the Prayer-Book—"running the Way of Thy Commandments"—not loitering or idling along, but understanding that, as David put it, "the King's business required haste." No doubt someone will think here of Mary and the reproaches of her sister Martha. We can picture that scene in the house at Bethany—Martha a competent and self-respecting housewife, rightly anxious to entertain her brother's guests, and Mary too fascinated by the conversation of our Lord to lend her a hand. On this one occasion we find our Lord commending contemplation, and hinting that we can be too busy! No doubt there must be a time and a place for meditation. Indeed our Lord found it on the mountain-side more than once, and in the watches of the night, but we must not indulge ourselves too much in the practice of meditation. It may be, or become, a dream-world of escape from the burdens we ought to be carrying. After all, we shall have eternity in which to contemplate the Eternal. Here we have to follow the path—not just as Hamlet "in my mind's eye, Horatio," but in responsible objective activity.

* * *

All this may be repugnant to some types of mind. There are many who are reluctant to admit that Christianity makes its demand upon the whole personality, and not only on the reflecting or observing part of our nature. There may be forms of religion in which the expression which matters is the semi-hypnotic state of spiritual rapture, but it is not so with our religion. Christianity, strongly Hebrew in its origin, and reverencing the Word of God revealed to the Hebrew people, must be a religion of obedience to practical duties. Our Lord has shown us that, and "the Way," the Christian path as He followed it was the dusty roads of Palestine, where he touched the leper, opened the eyes of the blind, healed all manner of sickness, and in the striking phrase St. Matthew quotes from Isaiah, "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses."

"To deny oneself" is at times not only to forego the pleasures of life, but even to forego "that good part" (Luke 10, 42) which Mary enjoyed for a brief space.

* * *

Religiously minded people (of the kind which usually recoils from anything called "evangelical") often profess themselves attracted by "mysticism," and toy with mystical ideas. The slightly esoteric phrases of mystical theology, and its suggestion of being in the inner circle, and seeing further into reality than other people, will always attract the naive as well as those who deem themselves superior. We are not denying the genuineness of "mystical" experience, nor the sincerity of the true mystic, but merely expressing disapproval of those who make a cult of mysticism. We can all talk, if we want to, about the purgative, the illuminative, and the unitive stages of experience. Taken seriously and responsibly they ought to be stages on the Christian path. Let us substitute for the "purgative" stage the evangelical experience of repentance, cleansing of the Precious Blood, and the Forgiveness of God. These are objective realities, whereas the mystic purgation may be self-induced: a state of mind. Let us substitute for the "illuminative" stage the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit by Whom we have a right judgment in all things, and through Whom we realise that Our Lord is the True Light that lighteth every man. Let us remember too that the illuminative stage objectively considered, cannot dispense with the Word of God which is "a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path" (Ps. 119, 105). "Dominus, illuminatio mea"—true, but the illumination is in the plain practical written Word—"Keep the Commandments" is where we begin, and we can never reach a stage of illumination where we have done with them. "The Higher Life" has been the absorbing interest of many a professing Christian, and we have heard of many a sorrowful downfall which came from the flights of spiritual fancy which left the Commandments far behind. St. Paul never did the Church of Christ better service than he did when he reminded us that our treasure is in earthen vessels.

If we replace the unitive stage of experience by the sense of abiding fellowship which we have in Christ and in the Holy Spirit, with God we are expressing fully our unity with God. We are building up in ourselves the spiritual personality which can realise its identity with God. But in the progress towards that sense of unity we never reach "the point of no return": we can retreat, or fall away. We may sing our longings "Nearer My God to Thee, nearer to Thee," but the path of approach has no inevitability; there are hindrances, and recessions, but the ideal remains—"that God may be all in all."

* * *

So it may appear that the "mystical path" has no secrets to unveil to its would-be adepts. Its truths are evangelical truths, and the distaste for evangelical terminology ought not to pass for a denial of the evangelical facts. Mystical terminology must not be mistaken for anything more than we can find in the dictionary. If the path we are following is "the Christian path," and not "the Hindu path," or "the Islamic path," or "the Aryan path," then it must be a recognisable discipleship; that is, a discipleship recognisably Christian, and as such concordant with Gospel precepts.

* * *

How shall we define "the Christian's path"? First, we must take account of the dangers of walking in darkness. The Christian need not attempt to begin his journey until he has the light. He need not think that he can be a Christian and go his own way. The nature and characteristics of discipleship are not in doubt. No man can come forward in the twentieth century and tell us that through two thousand years of darkness it has been reserved for him to put our thinking right, and open up the way of life. Neither Pastor Russell in the last century, nor Ellen White, nor Miss Eddy can convince us. Neither they nor any of Rome's new revelations from the Council of Trent till 1950 can give better light than "the Book."

We suggest that they have forgotten the lessons in Leviticus 26—the warning to Israel not to be self-willed—"If ye walk contrary unto Me . . . then will I also walk contrary unto you." Wrong walking is the deliberate choice of one's own path. You might say, what then of the Reformation? Was it not a new path? Did men not choose their own path? We believe that by the sixteenth century the Church in Western Europe had ceased to be marching on. It was marking time when not travelling in a circle. Its thought of the heavenward journey was commercialised by indulgences and despiritualised by error. The Reformers had no new notions to offer. They were reforming, not innovating, and so they aimed at getting the Church on to the right track once more, and getting "a move on."

A fair question is "Did anyone ever explain the Bible as Judge Rutherford does?" "Did anyone ever dream of such notions before our day?" It is equally fair to ask if there is evidence in the ancient Church or in its traditions for the modern dogmas of Roman Catholicism. Roman Catholic theologians need not claim that there is, for they can when necessary use the doctrine of development to supply a case.

It will not do to forget Our Lord's Words about our path "Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth" (John 12, 35).

The very opposite of wrong walking is right walking, in step, not out of step, with the plain truth of revelation—

"Though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh" (2 Cor. 10, 3). The fact that we have a physical nature with present needs and instincts does not mean that we are right to live on the level of needs and instincts. We must pursue our upward path towards the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. The Christian has no need to face the world with the world's weapons. Saul's armour is not for him. A victory won by the world's weapons is a victory won for the world, not for God.

"Let us walk honestly." This word "honestly" is an important word. It does not mean avoiding theft or roguery. The Greek word written by St. Paul (Rom. 13, 13) was used by classical Greek writers to signify what is graceful or comely, and it kept that significance. In the moral sense it means seemly or becoming (see 1 Cor. 7, 35). Thus the meaning appears to be the honourable standard of Christian dignity, grace, and self-respect. It is the opposite of clownishness, or vulgarity. It is puritan, but not puritanical.

* * *

Not far from this ideal of "honesty" is the direction to "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called." We must not betray or fail our cause. We must not be bad advertisements for the Gospel. There should be consistency between what we say with our lips and what we show in our lives. The more we realise the nature of our vocation "heirs of God through Christ" (Gal. 3, 7), the higher must be our sense of obligation to identify ourselves as members of the Church of the living God by the walk of faith, obedience, love.

* * *

We are to "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God" (Col. 1, 10). Why not? Christianity is not a pastime, nor a state of spiritual apathy. We need hold no romanticised view of the Gospel, for it is not an interest for the cognoscenti, like music or antiques, but a manful effort to be good and to do good. It sends us to the school of Christ to learn, and to the world to practise and persevere. Our model at all times is to look to Christ and to do as He did—"He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk, even as He walked (1 John 2, 6).

* * *

"We walk by faith." That means that our progress must bring us to certain ventures where the unknown confronts us and we have to make decisions. The Christian's path is not always plain straight and sunlit. There are cross-roads and sidepaths. There are tempting shortcuts, and what are we to do? First make up the mind how to do, and then apply that conclusion when faced with "what to do?" Faith is not an easy substitute for either knowledge or experience; it is spiritual discernment and trust in God. We walk by principles, and not by momentary impulses. Faith in God means that there are right things to do, right thoughts to think, right steps to take. Faith expresses itself in our doing what is right, not in our chancing things, and hoping we may be lucky. Prayer for guidance is no mistake, and let us remember that a result which disappoints us may well be wiser in the long run than a result which has but a momentary advantage.

Here are words of Our Lord which meet our need—"I am the light of the World: he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

* * *

What is to be expected on the Christian path? Light increasing within us. Deeper faith and growing confidence. Patient continuance in well-doing does not bring weariness. If there is a tired moment, or a despondent thought, then "though I walk in the midst of trouble, Thou wilt revive me . . . the Lord will perfect that which concerneth me" (Ps. 138). In the hour of death as in the day of judgment "Thy rod and Thy staff comfort me."

Finally, the Church of Christ began its life and witness in an alien world with the repeated assurance "to him that overcometh I will give . . ." That is the present purpose of the Christian path—to overcome.

CATHOLIC AND ROMAN CATHOLIC.

By the Rt. Rev. W. S. KERR, D.D.
(Formerly Bishop of Down and Dromore)

Last year there was published a volume of the Home University Library named "Roman Catholicism in England from the Reformation to 1950." It is written by E. I. Watkin and is commendable not only as a useful history of that Church during the period specified, but also as a remarkably candid, fair-minded piece of writing. In this latter aspect it is in pleasant contrast with many versions of history issuing from that communion.

Take, for instance, the vexed question of the execution of priests under Elizabeth. Were they put to death as martyrs for their religion or as traitors to the state? Mr. Watkin, on the whole, holds the balance fairly and his enlightened testimony is notable. He admits that in the early years of Queen Elizabeth's reign no member of his Church was put to death for his religion. In 1570 Pope Pius V issued his Bull of Excommunication and Desposition against her, decreeing that she had forfeited her pretended title to the Kingdom and forbidding her subjects to render her obedience, under penalty of the same anathema. "The deposition," writes Mr. Watkin, "was a blunder, worse than a blunder, a disaster, probably the most serious blow inflicted on English Catholicism between the Reformation and the present day. It identified Catholic allegiance to the Papacy with a disloyalty to the sovereign which the vast majority of the English Catholics did not entertain."

The various attempts at foreign invasion that were supported by the Popes in the years following are frankly acknowledged—including the mission of Sir Thomas Stukely "to land a Papal expeditionary force in Ireland." This revolt which was difficult to quell certainly contributed to the enactment of the Penal Statue of 1581. Pope Gregory XIII was "obsessed by the desire to overthrow Elizabeth" and "was not adverse from political assassination." That method of getting rid of troublesome opponents had been effective in William the Silent, and Henry of Navarre. Mr. Watkin narrates how a group of English noblemen who were plotting to kill Elizabeth would not make the attempt unless the Pope assured them that it was not sinful. The Pope replied through his Cardinal Secretary of State "that if these English nobles decide to undertake so glorious a work they do not commit sin." On the contrary "Whosoever sends the Queen out of the world with the pious intention of doing God service . . . gains merit." Mr. Watkin expressly admits that the Government's reasons for the infliction of capital punishment were political and not religious.

But I must not deal further with the general contents of the volume, interesting as those are. My present purpose in calling attention to it is to refer to some remarks in the Foreword justifying the title. The author writes: "I do not share in the objection felt by my co-religionists to the designation 'Roman Catholic.' It was not shared by the Jesuit, Charles Baker (David Lewis), who for his priesthood suffered a traitor's death at Usk on 27th August, 1679. 'My religion,' he declared at the gallows, 'is the Roman Catholic. A Roman Catholic I am; a Roman Catholic Priest I am.' In an official communication to Lord Petre in 1789 Bishop Walmsley writes: 'Let us be named as heretofore, either Catholic or Roman Catholic.' And in a Pastoral for the New Year, 1830, Bishop Bramston writes: 'You are earnestly exhorted to remember that you are . . . Roman Catholics'." The author submits, however, that the exclusive use of the double designation would be intolerably cumbersome and asks readers to accept without prejudice the use of "Catholics" to denote Roman Catholics.

This is a needed corrective for a growing tendency in that Church to absorb to itself the exclusive use of the term Catholic. That is an offensive innovation which should not be acquiesced in. In the words of the Apostolic Creed we are accustomed to declare our belief in the Holy Catholic Church; i.e., in the true and uncorrupted faith of the Gospel which has been held everywhere from the beginning of Christianity. The Roman Church which in little more than a century has adopted as essential dogmas three new articles of belief, has forfeited its claim to be Catholic. We must never allow the misleading distinction "Protestant or Catholic" to be made. If we were not Protestants we would not have a just right to be Catholics.

Why is there such eagerness to drop the term "Roman"? The official claim is that it is necessary to salvation that every human creature be subject to the Roman pontiff. He is venerated as the Vicar Christ. Members of that Church might be expected to emphasise most highly what identifies them with his communion. One thing we should strenuously resist is the intolerable, insulting practice to label us as "non-Catholics."

History corroborates the use of the term Roman Catholic and gives striking examples of the term Romanist Church by the highest authorities. When Augustine was sent to England by Pope Gregory the Great (597) to convert the Anglo-Saxons he tried unsuccessfully to win the allegiance of the old British Church. Bede (ii: 2) tells how he laid down three conditions to be followed "according to the custom of the Holy Roman Apostolic Church." Pope Alexander III in his letter to King Roderic O'Connor (1172) urges him to persevere in his devotion "to your mother, the Holy Roman Church." The Creed of Pope Pius IV, as adopted by the Council of Trent, which must be signed by all converts to Rome, begins with a pledge to believe all that is "contained in the symbol of faith which the Holy Roman Church uses." The Catechism of the Council of Trent has the phrase "the Mother and Mistress of all Churches, the Holy Roman Church." All Roman Catholic bishops have to swear at their consecration that they will be obedient "to the Holy Roman Church" and will strive to preserve, defend, increase and promote the privileges and authority of "the Holy Roman Church of our Lord the Pope and of his successors."

The official utterances of the Papal Church to the present day are in line with these ancient precedents. Pius IX in his Bull "Ineffabilis Deus" repeatedly refers to "the Holy Roman Church." Pius XI in his Encyclicals on Fostering True Religious Union 1929 (and "Lux Veritatis" 1931) refers to "the Roman Church" and in his Encyclical on Education to the Holy Roman Catholic Church.

But what should be finally conclusive for Roman Catholics is the formal decisions of the court of Rome itself. A former Roman Catholic Governor of Malta, Lord Strickland, incurred the disfavour of the Vatican authorities. The Pope's Cardinal Secretary of State, Dr. Gasparri, complained to the British Government that "he exerted himself to violate Article I of the Constitution of Malta which reads "The religion of Malta is the Roman Catholic Apostolic Religion," proposing that the word "Roman" should be suppressed. Thus it was evident he could only disgust and offend the Catholics for whom the word "Roman" was precisely the expression which distinguished the Catholic religion from all other confessions" (Blue Book on Malta, 1930, p. 48).

If it is said we should, in courtesy, accept a denomination's choice of a title for itself the answer is, not so, if that title infringes on our own inalienable rights. In this case those fitted to speak authoritatively for the denomination have for many centuries insisted on a different appellation.—Reprinted from "The Christian Irishman" June, 1958.

CORRESPONDENCE.

We have received an envelope (English postmark unreadable, date 17th May, 1958) containing only a page from "The Christian Herald" of May, 17th, 1958—an article on St. Mark by the Revd. N. Haddock, Ph.D., and pp. 153 to 158 of a Daily Reading Book (pages for 20th May to 25th May). We are grateful to the sender—no name or address was enclosed.

We have also a letter from Mrs. L. Hines, of Sprucedale, Ontario, Canada, of 6th April, 1958.

Mrs. Hines comments on an article in our January, 1958, number "The Mystery of Israel" by Brother Edward ("Jewish Missionary News"). That article referred to the passage about the "Two Witnesses" (Rev. 11, 3-12), identifying them as either Elijah and Enoch, or as Elijah and Moses—"the purpose of this witness from those so venerated by Israel is to convert a large part of the Jewish Nation to Christ, upon which conversion He Himself will return, and His Appearing will convert many more." Our correspondent considers that Elijah represents those who will be alive on this earth when the Lord comes, and that Moses represents those Believers who are in the grave and will be raised; and that this is the significance of their appearance on the Mount of Transfiguration.

But the likelihood is that in Rev. 11, 3-12, the reference is to Enoch and Moses. Enoch was translated so that he did not experience death. Elijah also was removed from earth.

We fully agree with the necessity for the New Birth, though we might hesitate to use the phrase "to receive the transfusion of the Holy Spirit." Yet if we accept, as we must, the promise "I will pour out of My Spirit" (Acts 2), we must believe that the result is "the pouring in of the Spirit into believers' hearts."

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 74.

Dead Sea Scrolls

In dealing with the Dead Sea Scrolls, Dr. Yadin said that he giving a lecture the title of which was "The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Epistle to the Hebrews." That Epistle was one of the enigmatic writings of the New Testament, and entirely different from all the other Epistles. It was generally agreed that it was not written by St. Paul. Who were the Hebrews to whom this Epistle was addressed? asked Dr. Yadin. He believed that the Dead Sea Scrolls gave them a clue.

Its basic theme was to try and prove the superiority of Jesus over many messianic and apocalyptic personalities.

The Dead Sea Scrolls sect did not believe in the coming of one lay Messiah, but in the coming of two Messiahs, one lay and one priestly. The whole object of the Epistle was to try and convince them that they were wrong in some of their basic beliefs. The Epistle was addressed to Hebrew Christians, some of whom had probably originally belonged to the circle of the Dead Sea Scrolls. If that was right then it would be another example of the importance of the Scrolls, not only to an understanding of Dead Sea history, but to an understanding of the very beginning of Christianity.

Cultural Relations

In the course of his lecture Dr. Yadin said they were concerned with the cultural relations between Great Britain and Israel. "We come from the land of the Bible," he said, "and I dare to define this country of yours as the land of Bible Lovers."

—"The English Churchman," 25/4/'58.

Roman Catholic Schools.

When an institution hides its weaknesses sensible men suspect the worst. It is seldom, however, that the Roman Church exposes its weaknesses and that is one reason why sensible folk are so profoundly suspicious of it. All the more interesting it is then, that "The Tablet" should contain an extremely outspoken article by a Roman Catholic educationist drastically criticising the educational standards of the Romanist grammar schools. The grounds of his criticisms are important.

Usually it is thought that these schools are open to criticism, if at all, as forcing grounds of superstition. Among the general public it is though that the general education given is good, and, indeed, Roman Catholic education in this country has enjoyed a high reputation which Mr. Connell suggests is thoroughly undeserved.

In the public examinations the sixth-formers from these grammar schools come off worse than those from others all the way round but, significantly, more particularly in scientific subjects. These schools still have a rooted prejudice in favour of Latin as a medium of education. Their teaching of the sciences is inadequate quantitatively and bad qualitatively.

Mr. Connell roundly charges Roman Catholic educationists with weakness of religious faith in fearing to teach the sciences as they should be taught. "They fear that the study of science may cause children to lose their faith . . . These fears seem to suggest an insecure faith in the teachers rather than a concern for the good of their pupils." Mr. Connell goes on, "The isolation of some Catholic schools is shown in their antiquated science syllabuses, unaffected by the progress of the last fifty years . . . It is a fantastic fact that in at least one city Catholic girls leave school before the sixth form and go to the technical college to study science."

Now all this is far more than an exposure of a particular Roman Catholic weakness. It is a warning also to other Communions, and especially to Anglicans, that covers the whole range of Church policy. What is a fault is the exclusivism and the authoritarianism of Romanism, both of which characteristics are greatly envied among many of our own people. But they cause ingrowing and discourage fertilising contacts with the outside world. The risks involved in cultivating the opposite characteristics to these are far less.

—"Church of England Newspaper," 25/4/'58.

Something Encouraging in Eire—New Grammar School To Replace Old Building —Secretary Deputises for Minister.

The function was something more than the opening of a particular school—it was a vote of confidence not only in the future of the Protestant community, not only in Co. Cork, but a vote of confidence in the future of the whole country which was the background and homeland of that community, said Mr. T. O'Rafferty, Secretary, Department of Education, deputising for the Minister for Education.

He was speaking at the opening of the new grammar school at Bandon. The school, which replaces the original school founded in 1642, has accommodation for 50 boarders and 75 day pupils of both sexes.

The curriculum has been extended to include the teaching of agricultural and domestic science. A farm of 55 acres is attached to the school.

Mr. O'Rafferty said that it was not for him as an official to speak for educational policy, but he was not precluded from describing the scope of that policy. He thought it was right for him to say that they in Ireland were almost unique in the harmonious co-operation and the trust and confidence which existed between the department and the various Church authorities. Whilst that condition existed in a few countries to some extent, nowhere was it in existence as here. That happy condition of affairs had been achieved after a long struggle in the last century, and it was a precious thing which should not be lightly thrown away.

"As far as the Department of Education and the Church authorities are concerned, it is not going to be thrown away easily." He added: "The fundamental principle of Irish education, I think I can state, is the right of parents to bring up and educate their children in the parents' own religion, and we cherish that very much in Ireland. Therefore I can say that while the State is neutral in the sense that it tries to deal fairly with all Church authorities, it is not neutral in the sense that it has a particular interest in the welfare of the various denominations as denominations."

"We try to be fair, and I think we can claim that perhaps we try to be a little generous towards the schools of the minority. Speaking personally, as a Catholic official, I can say frankly and sincerely I regard it as a privilege to participate in this function."

Well Satisfied

The Rev. J. McKinney, President of the Methodist Church in Ireland and principal of Gurteen Agricultural College, Ballingarry, Co.

Tipperary, proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. O'Rafferty, said that the Protestant community of this country was well satisfied with the treatment it was receiving in respect of education. He said that the country's economy would be in danger of collapsing if it did not collapse completely without the vital contribution that agriculture was called upon to make. The exports of agricultural products constituted twice as much as the exports of the industries of the country put together. The entire economic strength and scope of the country depended upon efficient farming.

More Scope on Land

The Rt. Rev. R. G. Perdue, Bishop of Cork, Cloyne and Ross, seconding, said that to those who were hovering on the brink of whether they would remain on the land or take up some other occupation he would say that there was more scope of initiative, more independence and more opportunities on the land than in any other profession.

—"Irish Times," 3/5/'58.

* * *

Quaker Faith.

[We hear comparatively little about the progress of the Society of Friends, so this cutting from the "Manchester Guardian" of 3/5/'58 is interesting.]

African Quakers of North Nyanza—Largest "Yearly Meeting."

Largest "yearly meeting"

The largest "Yearly Meeting" of the Society of Friends is now in the North Nyanza district of Kenya, where the number of African Quakers has reached the total of 26,800, compared with 22,000 Quakers in Britain. The meeting houses of mud, wattle, and thatch number 500 and have Sunday congregations of 50,000, many worshippers tramping ten miles and more.

This remarkable achievement in 50 years is the result of the pioneer work of a group of young American Quakers who entered the unexplored country of the Kaimosi district and developed agriculture, hospitals, and schools.

A feature of these meetings is the high quality of African leadership. Each member is expected to take a two-year course of instruction in the Christian faith before being admitted to full membership. The community has 336 schools, mostly staffed by Africans, with 30,000 pupils in them. Much of the good discipline of local life in the North Nyanza district rests upon the solid rock of Quaker character and good sense.

Revival! — or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT "BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the
Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

		s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing
"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

INDIA

One of India's most ancient languages in a new dress.

Just issued

The New Testament and Psalms in roman Tamil

Much of the illiteracy in India is owing to the complications of the native scripts. Without any change in the Spoken language the introduction of this easier type prepares the way for progress to literacy.

Published by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Contributions toward the cost of this production will be much appreciated.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 8—LXVII

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	85
The Strange Tale of St. Patrick's Purgatory	86
The Church	88
Editor's Chair	90
Comment	93

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Worship "Isn't Free In Malta."

LONDON.—Non-Roman Catholics in Malta were being denied religious freedom, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Primate of England, Dr. Geoffrey Fisher, said.

Dr. Fisher criticised the Colonial Office. He said it had been unwilling to help "assert our proper claims" to free worship.

He was increasingly uneasy at the situation.

Dr. Fisher said he took up the matter with the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Alan Lennox-Boyd, and the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Kilmuir.

"Failure to apply the provisions (for religious freedom) in the present constitution of Malta has often in the past given rise to serious dissatisfaction," he said.

Dr. Fisher said that any plan to make Malta constitutionally a part of Britain—with representation in the British Parliament—must guarantee that the same conditions of religious liberty in Britain apply equally in Malta.

"The history of this matter has been an unhappy one," he said.

"Anglicans and others in Malta have suffered denials of their proper liberties...often and grievously."—"The Vigilant," Melbourne, 1958.

* * *

Romanism On The Radio.

The British Broadcasting Corporation, in replies to correspondents, have stated that only ten per cent of broadcast services are allocated to the Roman Catholic Church. Even so, this seems a high proportion in relation to the Roman Catholic population of Great Britain, which on a fair estimate, is only about three million out of fifty million. We are aware, of course, that the Roman authorities claim a higher percentage, but there is evidence that their statistics are swollen. Figures for Protestant denominations are, for the most part, based on actual church attendance. But the amount of time allotted to Romanist propaganda is not restricted to broadcast services. Medieval legends, stories of Romanist saints, and news items of Roman Catholic activities, have increased considerably within the past year or two. The Protestant Truth Society has performed a public service in drawing the attention of the B.B.C. to the fact, and in asking that the broadcasting authorities should inquire into the reason why the Roman Catholic Church appears to be favoured at the expense of other religious bodies.—"The Christian," 2nd May, 1958).

* * *

All Records Broken—Bible Society's Annual Meeting.

In the sphere of Christian enterprise the British and Foreign Bible Society occupies a unique place by virtue of its enormous yearly output of Scriptures, figures relating to which reach almost astronomical proportions. At the annual meeting held at the Central Hall, Westminster, Dr. W. J. Platt surveyed a year of astonishing achievement during which the Word of God had poured out in beneficent streams reaching the ends of the earth.

Production had broken all previous records, yet so great had been the demands of the Society's agents that for the first time in its history supplies had to be rationed. In 1957 200,000 more Scriptures were issued than in the previous year and three times the tonnage of ten years ago. Over 100,000 Bibles for the Yoruba people in Nigeria, and one and a half million Scriptures for Brazil were among circulation figures.

In finance, the General Committee had faced a serious situation as resources had not kept pace with recent costs. The money received in payment for Scriptures covered only the cost of paper, printing, and binding. The Society was grateful for additional help from sister societies.

The Translation Department was dealing with 283 projects, the longest list ever. Among new productions was the New Testament in Twi for the Dominion of Ghana. At home three-quarters of a million copies of the Jubilee Bible had been supplied on generous terms to schools since its publication. An outstanding feature of the day was the publication of the Society's new edition of the Greek New Testament which was on sale at the hall.

Speaking from the chair, the Bishop of Uganda told of the pernicious influence of a chain of Communist bookshops stocked with cheap, attractively produced literature; yet God was still working, and recently he had heard testimonies from some who had found Christ through reading some portion of the Bible.

The Bishop of Bradford drew four pictures illustrating life and trends of the present time. In the ancient city of Kano, he had met three people sacrificially spending themselves in translation work. Recently, during a weekend at Cambridge, he had been impressed by the revived interest in Christianity among under-graduates. In contrast to this were the forces of paganism in his own diocese where people in general were entirely indifferent to Christianity. The fourth picture was of the menace of Communism which was working insidiously and often silently to eliminate religious consciousness, particularly in schools. In all four situations the Bible Society had an important part to play as it translated, produced, and circulated the Word of God.

* * *

"Volte Face!"—Italians Threaten to Turn Protestant.

Half of the inhabitants of a small village in the toe of the Italian boot are reported by the United Press to be ready to turn Protestant unless their archbishop ends his ban on toasting the statue of St. Joseph. One of the regional traditions is a procession in honour of the image in the course of which the people talk familiarly to the statue and offer it wine. They tell it that they needed a mild winter, and rain in the spring, and could he please see that grandfather recovered from rheumatism and daughter got married.

All this, the monsignor ruled, was definitely idolatrous. He said it was worship of the statue itself rather than honouring the saint. So he ordered this year's procession to stop short of the village of Pettogallica where the practises took place. It is reported that many of the people are talking of switching to Protestantism in rebellion against the archbishop.

Villagers admitted they did not know much about Protestantism in this traditionally Roman Catholic section of Italy, nor how Protestants feel about worshipping statues.

"But we know there are a lot of Protestant pastors at work here in Calabria and they are Christians like us," one villager said, "and they don't take orders from the archbishop."

The villagers will not find any comfort in Protestantism for their idolatry, although they would discover there that religion does not consist in obeying the hierarchy any more than it consists in worshipping idols. In case the local archbishop is interested, we heartily agree with his ban on such crude manifestations of paganism as are above described. Notwithstanding, the simple and untaught people of his archdiocese are merely carrying out the logical conclusion of the use of images and statues in connection with prayers to the saints.

—Rev. W. G. Whitcombe in "Protestant Action," Toronto, Nov. 1957.

[The threat "to turn Protestant" is one occasionally heard in Ireland. Here it is

(Continued on p. 94.)

THE STRANGE TALE OF ST. PATRICK'S PURGATORY.

This tale is sometimes fathered upon St. Patrick, that Scot who became the apostle of the Irish and their patron saint. Others refer it to another Patrick, who was an abbot, and abbots were very important men in the Celtic Church of the time. This Patrick, whoever he was, if he was at all, was the means of bringing to Ireland, and through Ireland to many other countries, the knowledge of that intermediate state of purgation, which Roman Catholics assert and Protestants deny. The Romanist doctrine of purgatory follows quite logically from their idea of justification by works. Admit the one, which we do not, and the other naturally follows.

There are many versions given of visits to purgatory, and it may be of interest to mention one or two. The legend tells how, when Patrick returned to Ireland as a missionary, he was met from the beginning with blank unbelief. When the message of gentleness and love seemed to fail in its effect, he resorted to threatening, and warned them that they would meet pain and torment in the other world. This met with open mockery, and with demands to let them see the torments and then they would believe in them. On this Patrick resorted to prayer, and with a rumble the ground opened up and showed them the entrance to the place of punishment, from which flames came belching out. Doubt was now impossible and the heathens became Christians. Whereupon Patrick built an abbey near the place, put a gate on the cave, and handed the key to the abbot, so that the privilege of admitting pilgrims might be his. In this way St. Patrick's Purgatory became a place of pilgrimage.

The best known of the pilgrimages is called the Legend of the Knight, and it was written by Henry of Saltrey—a Benedictine monk, who lived about the middle of the twelfth century. The hero of the story is an Irishman called Sir Owen, who had fought and distinguished himself in the army of King Stephen. Tired of the wars, he came home to his own land again, and, traversing the lonely mountains of Donegal, he came at last to a dreary lake with a little island in its midst. Here he was received by the abbot, and explained that sorrow for his many sins had brought him to this lonely isle, where he hoped to purge himself of all his guilt.

It was necessary, explained the abbot, to give oneself as a penitent to prayer and fasting for fifteen days, and on the next day, having received the sacrament, he would be escorted in solemn procession to the gate. There the abbot would open the gate, and then lock it behind him, and the pilgrim would be left to the darkness and the silence.

All happened as he had been told. He went on till he came to a spacious hall, where fifteen venerable men in white raiment received him, and gave him directions for his future conduct. It was well that they did so, for as they journeyed on they were assailed by troops of demons, who were only put to flight by earnest prayer. Then came the four "fields" of punishment, where the travellers are tormented by fire and ice and serpents, and so on. Next he climbed a very high mountain, from which he was blown by a rushing mighty wind, which landed him in a horribly dirty river. But we need not detail all the pains and penalties of the way. It will remind readers of Dante of the Inferno, and readers of Burns of Tam o' Shanter. For the knight comes at last to a narrow bridge, over which he escapes, leaving his malignant assailants behind. Through a wall clear as glass, he entered by a golden gate into the Garden of Eden and naturally wanted to stay there. But that was forbidden, for his life was not lived through to the end. There was, however, one consolation. He was for ever exempt from the punishment of purgatory. A short and pleasant way back to the world was shown him, and soon he found himself at the gate where the monks stood ready to receive him. This is the story, then, as Henry of Saltrey tells it, and it was soon a well-known story all over Europe. It was also taken by many as a true story. Lough Derg with its island is real enough, as were also the pilgrimages. The earliest reference that we have to the purgatory consists of letters from King Edward III granted in 1358 to two foreign noblemen, in proof that they had made the pilgrimage. In the episcopal archives of Armagh there are similar documents of almost the same date.

Froissart records a talk he had once had with Sir William Lisle, who had been in the purgatory. "I asked him of what sort was the cave that is in Ireland, called St. Patrick's Purgatory, and if that were true which was related of it. He replied that there certainly was such a cave, for he and another English Knight had been there whilst the king was at Dublin, and said that they entered the cave, and were shut in as the sun set, and that they remained there all night, and left it next morning at sunrise. . . . Then he said that, when he and his companion had passed the gate of the Purgatory of St. Patrick, that they had descended as though into a cellar, and that a hot vapour rose towards them, and so affected their heads, that they were obliged to sit down on the stone steps. And after sitting there awhile they felt heavy with sleep, and so fell asleep and slept all night. Then I asked if they knew where they were in their sleep, and what sort of dreams they had had; he answered that they had been oppressed with many fancies and wonderful dreams, different from those they were accustomed to in their chambers; and in the morning when they went out, in a short while they had clean forgotten their dreams and visions; wherefore he concluded that the whole matter was fancy."

Shortly after, William Staunton of Durham tells us how he made the descent of the cave. He also fell asleep, and had a long and involved dream which I will not repeat for want of space. I think, for my own part, that if we could find out what the hot vapour was that rose towards them in the cave, we would have gone a long way towards explaining the nature of the dreams and visions which came to the visitors. Certainly the monks and some other people in authority seem to have made a good thing out of it, and "the learned Jesuit Bolandus" ascribes the suppression of the purgatory "to the inordinate greed of its custodians."

For the purgatory was suppressed in the year 1497. It "was destroyed about the festival of St. Patrick . . . by the guardian of Donegal and the representatives of the bishop in the deanery of Lough Erne, by authority of the Pope; the people in general having understood from the history of the knight, and other old books that this was not the purgatory which St. Patrick obtained from God, though the people in general were visiting it."

But the festival would not stay dead; the annual pilgrimage was revived, and led to such scenes of licence and disorder that the Lords Justices ordered the demolition of all buildings on the island.

—"The Bulwark," May 1958.

THE CHURCH.

A study of the New Testament teaching on the Church of Christ can rarely be exhaustive. Incomplete as it must be, it is bound to interest Christians who seek comprehensive views of truth and not merely partial ones.

We think that our readers will agree that a great deal of popular "evangelical" religion pays little heed to the question of the Church. Interdenominational or undenominational religious gatherings, independent mission-halls, and other unaffiliated causes, as well as the unattached weekly religious publications, carry on their work with varying results, in comparative disregard of the thought of "the Church." To their adherents and patrons "the Church" tends to be either irrelevant, or suspect.

The result is 1. inadequate views of our religion, 2. ignorance of important aspects of Holy Scripture, 3. the substitution of mere likemindedness for the fellowship of the Body of Christ, 4. a self-willed attitude to our faith instead of a teachable one. Does this statement seem to be severe? Our long experience and the experience of many others shows that it is not.

We shall never deny the right of every man to think, to study, to enquire. But we shall deny the right to put a premium on ignorance, and the right to assume that truth of any kind is easily come by. Patient spiritual study, intellectual enlightenment, due appreciation of the knowledge and experience of previous generations, must jointly contribute to our religious understanding. The slowly accumulated burden of error in the Church may be realised and easily shaken off; but the slowly apprehended spiritual truths may not be as easily recognised, and men, having got rid of error may get rid of valuable things as well. Our experience of modern sects shows us that when they have, to their own satisfaction, discarded what they think is old error, they are not slow to replace it by new errors of their own invention. Christian science and the programme of Jehovah's Witnesses are cases in point which illustrate this.

* * *

It may be asked "Does this sort of reasoning not condemn the Reformation, or any attempt to correct the wrong courses which have often been followed in religious matters?" We answer "No" for this reason, that the sixteenth century reformation plainly recalled the Church to the old truths once clear and unimpeded, but then by the accumulations of time overshadowed and encrusted. It appealed to the written tradition of the Church which is Holy Scripture (the New Testament), and also recovered the spiritual testimony of the best and purest days of antiquity. The responsible reformers did not discard belief in God, or the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. They did not deny the Incarnation or the Atonement. They honoured and bowed to the Word of God. They believed in the Church Spiritual, and rightly claimed that they had restored to its clarity, simplicity, and authority "the faith once for all delivered to the saints" (Jude).

It is obvious that they, and the Church they reformed, are not to be thrown into a common lot with Christian Scientists, Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, Christadelphians, Spiritists and so forth.

It is also obvious that they are to be looked to as men of sober standards of faith and judgment who taught the doctrine of the Church as part of the revealed truth of God's Word. They were not concerned with the merely practical organisation of sects as a matter of convenience. They had a Biblical view of the Church of Christ and also an appreciation of its manifestation in history. The teaching of John Calvin, for instance, would surprise many modern unattached evangelical Christians if they thought it worthwhile to examine it.

* * *

The desire for the company of the likeminded has brought together various groups of Christians at one period or another. Has it not been their experience that this desire has often been frustrated, and that divisions have arisen? Ought that not to lead us to see that there are other and stronger bonds of union than likemindedness? The fact is that none of us can have a total grasp of all aspects and degrees of spiritual truth, and that in fact unity is possible in diversity. We set aside the Roman Catholic Church's claim to have the total grasp of Christian truth: Why should we tend towards the same error? After nineteen centuries of Christian thought and life interwoven with human frailties of mind and sense, it ought to be clear that our fellowship must exist, if at all, in the unity of the Spirit, and in the bond of peace. Christ's Church is not stamped by a dead level of uniformity, but by constant response to the manifold activity and gifts of the Holy Spirit.

* * *

Let us now look at some of the lessons God's Word in the New Testament teaches us about the Church of Christ.

We note the striking thought of St. Paul that Christians are a new kind of people, a sort of third race. St. Paul (1 Cor. 10, 2) distinguishes both Jew and Gentile from "the Church of God." Jew and Gentile may both be transformed into something in which all their differences are overcome, or reconciled. That sublimation of Judaism and Heathenism does not hinder either from bringing in its qualities and special gifts. It is a commonplace to distinguish in Christian thought and interpretation the elements contributed from Hebrew and Hellenic sources.

* * *

Then we note the special meaning of the N.T. word for "Church." It is "ecclesia," a word common in the Greek Old Testament for the assembly or congregation of Israel, and in its Greek etymology signifying a people "called-out." That means "separated" from Judaism and Heathenism alike. It means God's choice, and hence, in another N.T. phrase, "God's own possession." It is a body "called saints," and "called in Christ."

It is also a body composed of parts which have not lost their identity. We read, in Eph. 3, that "the Gentiles are fellow-heirs, and fellow-members of the body, and fellow-partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the Gospel." Personalities are not reduced to a single type, but cleansed, redeemed, sanctified, enriched.

It is a body which has acquired a new significance, and a new view of the essential meaning and purpose of life. Mere sons of earth have been gathered into a community which is now ideally "seated in the heavenly places in Christ." It is not the language of phantasy which tells us that "our citizenship is in heaven." This is not to be confused with eternal or future life. We are to remember that the true standing of the Church of God is the standing God has conferred upon it. Its true aspect is not earth-regarding, but heavenward.

* * *

We may also observe how the New Testament elaborates the idea of the Church as "a body." It is "the body of Christ." It has its head—the Head over all things to the Church, our glorified Lord Himself. The head of the body is traditionally thought of as the source of direction, wisdom, energy, purpose, perception. Christ as the Head of His Church is all that, and more. He is the Bridegroom and His Church is the Bride. We know that this is symbolic language, but it illustrates a glorious principle of our faith, that the Bridegroom gave His life to purchase His Church for Himself. The union of the Heavenly Bridegroom and the Heavenly Bride is indissoluble.

* * *

The Church in its witness and warfare on earth (for often we speak of the Church on earth as if it were the whole Church, and not only a part of the whole Church) derives life and power through the Holy Spirit. It is not only the individual believer who is dwelt in by the Holy Spirit: the Church, "a holy temple in the Lord" is "built together for a habitation of God in the Spirit."

* * *

A good deal of space is taken up in the New Testament writings in describing the different aspects of the Church, or in considering it in various relationships.

We are "a forgiven people" (Jeremiah 31, 34; Heb. 10, 17); "a cleansed people" (Eph. 5, 26); "a sanctified people" (Heb. 10, 10).

These impose great responsibilities, for our call as the Church is to be "fellow-workers with God." Hence we are described as "a confessing people" (Heb. 11, 13-16); an alternate expression is found in 1 Pet. 2, 9-12 "a witnessing people."

You cannot confess Christ and witness for Him and to Him without the prospect, and in some circumstances the certainty, of reproach and trial. So the Church is called "a suffering people" (Phil. 1, 28). St. Paul in 2 Timothy emphasises this—"all that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution."

* * *

Our confidence as the Church is shown in the calm conviction that God is with us: never to leave us or forsake us—we are "a waiting people." We wait for God's Son from heaven—we wait for we know that the long patience is grounded upon God's will that "all should come to repentance" (2 Peter 3, 9).

Finally, there is the reward of faithful waiting and witnessing which the Church shall have—the reward for God's servants, the prophets and the saints, and those that fear His name—Rev. 11, 18.

The Church of Christ is no afterthought—or human figment. It is the appointed fellowship—the family of God on earth.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

CHURCH AND BIBLE.

We recently received by chance a copy of a "Catholic Truth Society" pamphlet by the Rev. F. J. Ripley entitled "What Do You Know About The Church and the Bible, The Brethren of the Lord, Indulgences." This is a large undertaking for a 16 page pamphlet, and one will be tempted to say that the treatment must be superficial and the argument merely assertive. Though that is true, the case stated in the first part, "The Church and the Bible," may well draw our attention. It is not to be denied that this subject is of real importance. It is, in fact, a major issue in the discussion of the claims of Rome. If we uncritically accept the statement that "the Church wrote the Bible" (i.e. the Church subject to the Pope) we undermine the whole system of evangelical truth. If we set the Church in a position of superiority over the Bible we are doing injustice to both. If we ignore the Church or consider it irrelevant; and hold that the Bible owes nothing to it, we are being equally unjust. The problem is to find the true relationship, and to understand what is meant by "the Church."

* * *

Fr. Ripley begins with statements we shall not dispute: that Our Lord "left His Church with no written books of His Words or Works: that He told His disciples to spread His Message by preaching: that the Holy Spirit would guide them in this task: that He would preserve their teaching infallible for "the Spirit of Truth shall abide with you and be in you" (John 14, 16-17).

It is true that Our Lord left His Church no written Gospel, but of course His disciples had at all times at their disposal the Holy Scriptures of Israel, and of them Our Lord said "They Testify of Me." Is that not to the point? Can any man claim that of the fourteen hundred and twenty pages in the Revised Version Brevier 16 mo. reference Bible of Oxford University Press, more than 328 pages (the N.T.) owe their authorship to the Christian Church? Moreover, if we add, as the Roman Catholic Church does, the Books of the Apocrypha of the Old Testament, the portion of the entire volume which has Christian antecedents is made even smaller.

This is something very much to the point. The Christian Church (however we explain the term) never had any control over the Scriptures we call the Old Testament. The Hebrew Scriptures were authoritative for Our Lord's Apostles and for all believers in the Gospel by virtue of the fact that they were "the Word of God." They are still authoritative for the Church of Christ for the same reason. Our Lord Himself freely quoted them and appealed to them—that itself would confer authority upon them if they had not possessed it already.

The testimony of the New Testament to the Old Testament is not ambiguous or patronising—"whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope" (Romans 15, 4). So then, if we cannot claim that Our Lord left us a written record of His words and work, we must still hold that He endorsed for His people for all future days the Holy Scriptures which were His Father's Word to Israel, and to all who should believe in Him as the Incarnate Word.

An examination of the text in the better Reference Bibles will show us how much Our Lord used and quoted the Old Testament. It will also show, we believe, that He did not give the authority which would arise from "His" use of it to the books we call Apocrypha. We understand that He never quoted those works. This is in marked distinction from His use of nearly all the books of canonical Old Testament Scripture.

* * *

Next we may take note of the fact that the New Testament describes the Old as "God-breathed." Without entering upon any study of the nature of inspiration we may extend the use of the word "God-breathed" to the writings of the New Testament since we accept the guidance and safeguarding of its writers by the Spirit of Truth. Here we repeat what we have said on other occasions, that if the Holy Spirit is the Author, that fact was bound to impose itself on the attention and mind of the Christians. Recognition of divinely inspired writings is not at all the same as "authorising" or "sanctioning" them. The early Christian writings which the Holy Spirit meant to be authoritative Scripture, and the Rule of Faith for believers within the Church, easily distinguished themselves from other valuable though "uninspired" writings. It was in a sense "the survival of the fittest"—those which bore the seal and purpose of the Spirit inevitably declared themselves, and the Church could not have set them aside or arbitrated upon them.

The books of the New Testament were written "within the Church." This is, we believe, a sounder way of putting it than to say they were written "by the Church." Further, there is no difficulty in holding that the Holy Spirit took care of His own. If He inspired the Sacred writers (and such writers only, in the real sense of inspiration), then the Church was bound to bow to them, not to make choice and trust to its own sense of fitness to make up its mind about what are, or are not, "canonical."

* * *

In the early centuries of Christianity the Church apparently came near to disregarding the Epistle to the Hebrews. But the Epistle to the Hebrews prevailed—why? Because the Church eventually accepted it? It was inspired Scripture from the day its penman wrote it, whether "the Church" hesitated for a century or more about it or not. As inspired Scripture it was of such character as to compel recognition and acceptance. It did not become inspired Scripture because the Church adopted it: the Church inevitably accepted it because it could not do otherwise. In the same age there was a fairly widely read "Epistle of Barnabas." Many thought it was the work of St. Paul's companion from Cyprus. No doubt numerous Christians here and there thought it was an inspired Apostolic writing. At length it dropped out of circulation. Why? Because it could not maintain itself and endure the scrutiny of all who studied it in the light of the spiritual truth they had from other sources. Its own intrinsic qualities or defects defeated it.

There was also a work called "The Shepherd of Hermas." This was valued for long enough in certain quarters, and was read with interest as if it shared the same quality as other Christian books. But it too faded out of use and memory because it had no "staying power." Why had it no power to be permanent? Because it lacked that inner spiritual quality which we may find hard to define, but which made itself felt in the early Church in the case of those writings which exclusively form the New Testament.

Recognition by the Church did not confer any qualities or character upon the writings: it was an admission of those qualities which were there from the beginning.

* * *

We write thus with no intention of disparaging the Church. We are firm and convinced men of the Church. But we are not prepared to take the view that the Church brought any collective, deliberative, or organisational activity to bear upon the formation of the New Testament. The first evidence of any action which might be called "official" is so late in point of time (after Christianity had been a going concern for more than three centuries) that it could have had no effective influence in settling the question of canonicity. Suffice it to say that the New Testament was written within the Church and enshrines the Church's message, faith, and witness. We know what the message, faith, and witness of Christianity at the outset were, because they are set down for us in the sacred writings. Hence these sacred writings became a standard of judgment and a court of appeal in all doctrinal conflicts. Little wonder then that the Church of Ireland and the Church of England and all other Reformed Churches agree in this sentiment that "Holy Scripture contains all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein nor may be proved thereby, is not required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation" (Articles of the Church of England).

* * *

We are also bound to note that "the Church" of the first, second, third, and fourth centuries was very different in language, outlook, organisation, atmosphere, and law from the Western Latin Church of the late Middle Ages, or the Roman Catholic Church of the centuries subsequent to the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century, or of to-day. In early days it was a fellowship rather than an institution. It was "the Body of Christ" rather than "the Kingdom of Christ." It was collectively the holy and royal priesthood, rather than an hierarchical organisation. Its clergy and bishops and laity were united as brethren rather than as subjects of a supreme Pontiff. It had not yet learned to deny Our Lord's declaration "My Kingdom is not of this World."

So, when we speak of the "the Church" in those early days we must keep in mind its real simplicity of arrangement, and its immediate and still urgent awareness of its primary purpose—to preach salvation in Christ, and to declare the existence of the new and living way into the Holiest. It was not then an ecclesiastical imitation of Imperial Rome. The Emperor Constantine, "equal of the apostles," had not yet made the Church part of the empire; the doctrine of "the Two Swords" had not so far seized upon men's imaginations and desire for power.

* * *

To return to Fr. Ripley. He writes "In a sense it would be true to say that there is only one source of revelation, divine tradition, that is, the body of revealed truth handed down from the Apostles. However, a great and important part of that tradition was put into writing and is to be found in the Bible."

We agree that there is but one source of revelation—God. Tradition means "something handed down from one generation to another." Let us call Tradition "God's revelation as it has been given to men." Fr. Ripley says that a great and important part has been written as "the Bible." That may imply that an equally great and equally (or more) important part has remained unwritten, and is nevertheless available to teach us. This part is commonly called "Tradition." Here is our question—"Can we say that any necessary truth was left out of the written part of tradition?" It seems to us that what was written down must obviously be the necessary part, the requisite for Salvation, and therefore the truths which it was essential to record in exact words and undeviating form. What remained unwritten could contain nothing of comparable importance. It might, and did, contain much of interest—practical usages and customs, methods of procedure, rudimentary liturgical forms, and the like. All of this might be memories and survivals of practices of the Christians of the last half of the first century, and of the century following. The traditions of different large centres of Christian life were bound to vary a good deal. Only gradually they were partly assimilated. Let us be clear and definite that no essential truth of our religion has been omitted from the New Testament.

* * *

Fr. Ripley calls Tradition "that body of revealed truth which was not committed to writings under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, but has been handed down by the living authority of the Catholic Church."

This is far too great a claim to make for Tradition. We pose a simple question—"Why has the Orthodox Eastern Church, which continues the unbroken tradition from the Apostles, never added a new dogma to the faith of Christendom or taken into its Creed the additions of the Creed of Pope Pius or the Vatican Council?" Eastern Orthodoxy claims to be "the Christian Church," untouched by Roman or Protestant influence, and its testimony on the subject of Tradition will be very different from Fr. Ripley's. From Tradition Orthodoxy has gathered many pious opinions, but unlike Rome it has not declared these pious opinions to be dogmas necessary to salvation. Members of Reformed Churches may always validly contrast Orthodoxy's use of Tradition with Rome's.

Fr. Ripley's view seems to lead to the conclusion that a doctrine drawn from unwritten tradition may be just as true, just as vital, just as necessary to salvation, as any to be learned from the New Testament. This is, we think, borne out by the fact that in the new Creed of the Council of Trent the Scriptures and unwritten Tradition are equally the sources of Christian truth.

* * *

Fr. Ripley claims that "it is only by this living tradition that we know the contents of the Bible." He says that in the time of the Apostles the Jews had no definite list of the books of the Old Testament. But it must be observed that this way of speaking is misleading. The first-century Jews had a reasonably clear idea of their sacred books—we read in Matthew 21, 42 "Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the Scriptures 'The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner'?" Here Our Lord obviously refers to a well recognised body of writings collectively called "the Scriptures." In John 5, 29 Our Lord says "search the Scriptures." Surely He did not mean a vague uncertain number of writings, but a co-ordinated group called in that day by a recognised title.

In Acts 17, 11 the people of Berea "searched the Scriptures daily" to confirm or confute the appeal made to the Scriptures by St. Paul regarding Jesus as the Messiah. Here again we are bound to assume a recognised group of writings of unique character. "This usage is all the more significant when we remember that the fourteen Apocryphal books receive no direct recognition" (W. G. Jordan in "A New Standard Bible Dictionary," 1926).

"It is safe to say that the Jews never have recognised as belonging to the Canon of Scriptures any other books than those which now constitute our Old Testament" (i.e. the "Protestant" O.T.). "The Apostles held to the same Canon as their Jewish brethren" (J. S. Riggs and W. G. Jordan in above dictionary). The Canon of the O.T. is the Palestinian Canon, and the Greek Apocryphal books (some with Hebrew background), though read by the Jews of Alexandria, had no equal status with the Palestinian Canon which is accepted among us.

It came about that Gentile Christians (unable to read Hebrew) early acquired Greek translations of the O.T. from Alexandria, and as these volumes often contained the Greek Apocryphal books they sometimes quoted them as Scripture. But when Christians studied Hebrew they realised the difference. The greatest Biblical scholar of the early Church, St. Jerome who made the "Vulgate" Latin Bible now held in the highest honour as authentic Scripture by Rome, declared that these Greek Apocryphal books were not to be taken as canonical. Fr. Ripley can tell us that "the fact that Julius Africanus objected to the story of Susanna (in the Apocrypha) is so unique that it only serves to prove how strong the Church's tradition was on this point," but he does not tell us about St. Jerome and how he, with learning unheard of by the negligible Julius Africanus, broke down "the Church's tradition" on this point.

* * *

Fr. Ripley adds "The one and only way in which any man can be sure that the books of the Bible are true and inspired is through the infallible authority of the Catholic Church." Can any reader tell us how we are to be sure of the "infallible authority of the Church"? We must have proof of that before we can accept the Bible on the basis of the claim.

* * *

We are told also that "to argue that the Bible is the only rule of faith is to contradict the Bible itself, which clearly teaches the opposite." We confess that we cannot recall any place in the Bible in which the Bible declares that it is not the only rule of faith. We do not maintain that it asserts that it is the only rule of faith, but explicit words are not called for. The simple fact remains that the faith necessary to Salvation is plainly set out in the New Testament. All the rest of Christian tradition which remained unwritten is secondary and subordinate. It may be instructive and edifying, but it is not essential to man's eternal welfare.

We have traversed familiar ground, but true explanations must be repeated often.

COMMENT.

(Roman Catholic Lourdes Celebration in Belfast).

"The witness of three centuries confirms the 'fact, as the learned Cardinal Newman 'pointedly observes that 'Catholics who have 'honoured the Mother still Worship the Son; 'while those who now have ceased to confess 'the Son began by scoffing at the Mother'."

This quotation is from the Sermon on the occasion of the Lourdes Centenary Celebration at St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church, Belfast. We take our information from "The Irish News," of Belfast, 23rd June, 1958.

The preacher was the Very Rev. J. J. Gorey, C.S.S.R. His reference to Cardinal Newman followed upon a rejection of the view that devotion to the Mother is something distracting us from devotion to the Sacred Person of Jesus. Now the evangelical Protestant is not one who scoffs at the Mother of Our Lord, for he accepts her own prediction "all generations shall call me 'blessed'" (Luke II). But the evangelical Protestant does not desire to go beyond (nor to fall short of) the teaching of Holy Scripture; and Holy Scripture does not contain any indication whatever that Our Lord's Apostles and first followers used any devotion to Our Lord's Mother. The silence of the sacred writers is remarkable in contrast with the modern growth of devotion to the Blessed Virgin. It is also remarkable that the New Testament contains nothing which is even the shadow of a dogma about Our Lord's Mother (the Virgin Birth concerns Our Lord, and is, in any case derived from the Old Testament). When we consider the dogmatic decisions and definitions of our own time, i.e. the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and the dogma of the Corporal Assumption we find a different situation.

Note that the quotation from Cardinal Newman does not bear upon evangelical Christianity at all. Evangelical Christians still Worship the Son, and always have done so.

They honour the Mother, but know that it would be contrary to the Spirit of God's Word to consider her a more potent and effective, or even more approachable, mediator or intercessor than the Saviour who is "the one mediator between God and men."

The lapses from the Christian faith referred to by Cardinal Newman must be those occurring in non-Protestant lands. The free-thinking and atheism of countries in which there is little or no evangelical witness are well-known. It is plain that the rebuke of Cardinal Newman or of Fr. Gorey is not addressed to people like us.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 86.

usually provoked by annoyance at not getting alms from the clergy. It is plain that in Italy an evangelical witness to Christian truth is sorely needed. Pray for the Waldensian Church in its witness.]

* * *

Bible Reading — Increase Among Roman Catholics.

The spring issue of the United Bible Societies' "Bulletin" says that the modern study of the Bible has not yet "penetrated very deeply into the masses of the Roman Catholic Church except perhaps in France and Belgium, where large sections of the intellectual middle classes and a number of the industrial workers have been touched." One of the centres of the movement in Europe is the Benedictine abbey of Maredsous, in Belgium, where a modern translation of the Bible has been issued in large numbers, and in France the "Ligue Catholique de l'Evangile" has recently sold 250,000 copies of its translation.

In Rome itself the Papal Bible Institute has over 250 students from 30 countries, and in Paris a team of Roman Catholic scholars has begun work on preparing a complete Bible concordance in French based on Roman Catholic translations. In Spain, under the leadership of the Benedictines of Montserrat a new translation of the Bible in Spanish is also being prepared. In Spain, too, a society for the development of Bible studies has in the last three years circulated 60,000 testaments and 200,000 Gospels and Acts of the Apostles.

One of the leading features of the Vatican pavilion at the Brussels exhibition is to be a display of Bible and biblical documents.

—"Manchester Guardian," 19/4/58.

[We must welcome any evidence of serious appreciation of Holy Scripture, wherever it is found. The information above is a sign that the disregard of the Bible which was acquiesced in till recently may be passing. Still, what is needed is not merely the availability of the sacred volume in convenient and cheap editions, but a definite policy to foster Bible reading. When this is promoted by the highest Roman Catholic authorities as a duty upon all the faithful, a great blessing will follow.]

* * *

Light and Shade in Colombia.

It is encouraging to learn that a recent change in the regime in Colombia has brought about a decrease in cases of violence against Protestants, but the repressive decrees of the former dictatorship remain. As so often, violence and persecution, involving destruction of property, injury and death, have been over-ruled to spread the Gospel as well as to strengthen the spiritual life of the churches. Evangelical Christianity has continued to grow in Colombia, and its members and adherents are now estimated to number 60,000. A sign of the times is that the Roman Catholic authorities now propose an objective inquiry into the persecution. It is to be hoped that as a result there will be remedial action, including a repeal of the decrees which deny religious freedom in the republic.

—"The Christian," 9th May, 1958.

* * *

Ban On Graham Ignored by Latins.

Although "The Catholic Almanac" claims that Guatemala is more than 91 per cent Roman Catholic, the efforts of the Catholic hierarchy to boycott the recent mass meeting of Billy Graham in that country completely failed. About 25,000 people turned out to hear the American evangelist at Guatemala Stadium, in spite of the publication of Catholic advertisements in the newspapers warning the faithful not to offer any kind of "collaboration." Guatemala with only 3 million people, has an archbishop, a papal nuncio and an ambassador at the Vatican.

Another tiny Central American republic, Costa Rica, with less than one million people, an archbishop and a papal nuncio, defied the pronouncement of its archbishop that listening to Billy Graham would be a sin, and gave him a giant reception. The attendance at Graham mass meetings in Latin America is significant chiefly because it indicates the increasing opposition of the people to clerical censorship. Although all Roman Catholics are forbidden by canon law to attend Protestant services, this prohibition is being defied in many Latin countries.

A survey by Father Albert J. Nevins, summarized in "The Catholic Almanac," 1957, indicates that although the church claims 93 per cent of the population in Latin American countries, "only about 10 per cent actually practice the faith." The survey indicates that the church is "dying" in Bolivia, Ecuador, Paraguay and the rural sections of Brazil, Panama, Honduras, Haiti and the Dominican Republic. According to Methodist Bishop Barbiéri more than 100 million Latin Americans are outside any Christian church. In many of the countries where the church is "dying" or "standing still," the Vatican has achieved partial union of church and state, with contributions of public revenue to its schools and clergy. Far from vitalizing the church in these areas the subsidies seem to be hastening its decadence.

A prominent Protestant layman recently made this observation: "In view of the fact that the U.S. has spent more than $6 billion in Italy to defend freedom there, it would be interesting to know whether Billy Graham would be free to preach in Rome."—"Church and State."

[Quoted in "Protestant Action," Toronto, May, 1958].

* * *

More Churches In Russia—500,000 Baptists.

While it is generally agreed that the number of churches in Russia is far less than it was before the Bolshevik Revolution, the number to-day is probably six times as large as twenty years ago. This estimate, based on recent visitor's observations, shows that the Orthodox Church has some 25,000 churches, 30,000 priests and 69 monasteries and convents, eight theological seminaries, and two academies. Thirty-three of the churches are in Moscow itself, and nearly fifty miles from the capital is the thriving religious centre of Zagorsk with its collection of ornate cathedrals and churches and its learned academies. Zagorsk is doing a thriving business in pilgrimages and the sight of thousands of people queueing outside the religious building is a common one.

The Baptists form the largest non-Orthodox group, with more than half a million baptised members and five thousand chapels and three thousand pastors. They have been more successful than most religious groups in Russia in maintaining contacts with the West, and have had two young pastors in training at Spurgeon's College, in London, during the last twelve months. The "Old Believers"—an unreformed Orthodox group which elects its priests by free choice of the congregations—have five hundred churches, while the Byelokrinitsa Congregations have four hundred. Each of these groups has a well attended Moscow cathedral.

The Moscow Roman Catholic Church now has a thousand regular worshippers as compared with the 150 in 1949. Adventist groups—which practise the washing of feet as a sacrament additional to Baptism and holy communion—number 25,000 members in some three hundred congregations.

The control of religious publications by the State is still a strict one, but the Synod of the Orthodox Church now has its own publishing house for bibles and religious calendars and is said to be printing and selling bibles at the rate of half a million a year.

—"Manchester Guardian," 30th May, 1958.

* * *

Most U.S. Adults Are Protestants, Survey Suggests.

Two out of three adult Americans class themselves as Protestants and one in four as Roman Catholics, the U.S. Census Bureau reported in February, "Newsweek" reported recently. A question on religion will not be included in the 1960 census, the bureau said the question had been asked in a sample survey last March, in which answers were voluntary.

The tabulation indicates that 96 per cent of Americans of age 14 and older had a religion, 3 per cent had none, and 1 per cent gave no report.

Some 79,000,000 persons regard themselves as Protestant, 30,700,000 as Roman Catholic, 3,900,000 as Jewish, 1,500,000 as having some other religion, and 3,200,000 as having no religion the report revealed.

Among the Protestants, 23,500,000 consider themselves Baptists, 16,700,000 Methodists, 8,400,000 Lutherans, and 6,700,000 Presbyterians. The 23,700,000 other Protestants of 14 and over "were distributed," the bureau said, and were shown separately in the report.

—"The Sentinel," Toronto, May, 1958.

* * *

Anti-Clericalism In Europe.

A Swiss subscriber writes to "Protestant Action," Toronto, May '58.

We must not forget that Switzerland is faced with a situation in some ways different from that in Canada: Whilst officially 41.6 per cent. of the total population are Roman Catholic (up from 40.7 per cent. in 1860, due to bigger families in R.C. areas of the country), less than one third of the votes are cast for the (Roman) Catholic Conservative Party, or "Christian Democrats" as they prefer to call themselves these days (what's in a name!).

In other words, a sizeable number of R.C.'s prefer other party principles than those advocated by their own church. Not a few of those Catholics, especially those who give their votes to the Socialists who form one of the three major parties, all about equal in strength: the Liberals, the Socialists and the "Christian Democrats."

The rest of the Catholics who do not vote for their own party mostly support the Liberals. You will know that Liberalism on the Continent differs considerably from Liberalism in the U.K. and even more from Liberalism in Canada. On the Continent the Liberals played an important historic role by advocating and fighting for the civil-rights which we take for granted in our age: freedom of religion, freedom of the press and free speech, separation of Church and State; separation of legislative, executive and judicial powers, etc. In fighting for the realization of these principles, they were strongly opposed by the Conservatives, notably and to this very day by the Catholic Conservatives who still stand for their "ultramontane" ideals.

Surprisingly enough, there are a considerable number of Catholics who adhere to their faith, but at the same time dislike to see their church meddling in politics. This is where the complication comes in. Those liberal Catholics are tolerant in their beliefs, but they are equally sensitive towards attacks on their own; this despite the fact that the priests vilify Liberal Catholics almost as badly as they do Protestants.

* * *

Place Window In Church To Mark Wesley's Decision.

John Wesley, as an unsuccessful young clergyman, attended a meeting of an obscure religious society in a little room near Aldersgate in London. A humble layman read Martin Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans and to quote Wesley's own words:

"While he was describing the change God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins."

No longer depending upon his own strength and wisdom but upon the power of the Holy Spirit, he resumed his ministry with such effect upon the nation that his experience has been described as: "The turning point in English history."

To mark this crucial change in Wesley, a new stained-glass window, depicting him preaching in the open to the people, was recently dedicated by the Bishop of London in the Church of St. Botolph-without-Aldersgate, now restored after bombing.

Revival! — or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT "BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE

NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

		s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH

*"If I take the wings of the morning,
and dwell in the uttermost parts of the
sea. Even there shall Thy hand lead me."*

Just published:

Selections from the Scriptures in Arë-
Arë for the Arë-Arë, Koio, and Dorio
peoples.

This little book of 193 pages contains selected chapters and portions from the Old and New Testaments in the language of people of the Solomon Islands. It is the first issue of the Scriptures in these dialects. The Solomon Islands are off the N.E. coast of Australia.

Produced by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenný, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

C all us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

M ay we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 9—LXVII.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of auto-
biography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	97
The Church of Rome and Freedom of Thought	99
Editor's Chair	102
The Story of a Priest	105

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Civil Marriage In Spain.—New "Burden of Proof."

A further modification in the Spanish civil code now make it compulsory for non-Roman Catholics in Spain to prove that they do not belong to the Catholic Church before a civil marriage licence is issued. This fresh obstacle to complete religious liberty in Spain follows various measures which have been used to strengthen the Church-State control of marriage and to prevent the growth of civil marriages which would lighten the burdens of the small Evangelical groups in Spain.

The local bishop still has the power to withhold a civil marriage licence, and may excommunicate parties to a marriage if they are baptised Catholics. In some cases persons who act as "witnesses" in furnishing proof of the non-Catholic belief of parties to a civil marriage have also been excommunicated. It is not yet clear whether the evidence of Protestant ministers or laymen will be accepted by the courts as sufficient proof that a party to a civil marriage is a non-Catholic.

This insertion of "burden of proof" into the law codifies recent administrative regulations in Spain. While simplifying various practices, it subtly strengthens the bias against civil marriages and blocks the freedom of the Evangelical groups.

—"Manchester Guardian," 30th May, 1958.

Missionary Societies Still Needed.

In his presidential address at the annual meeting of members of the Church Missionary Society, Sir Kenneth Grubb, who a few months ago attended the centenary celebrations of the Niger Mission, had some timely things to say about missionary societies. He had particularly in mind people who think that the day of the missionary society, as such, is past. In other words, that whatever justification there was for voluntary societies to carry the Gospel overseas in years gone by, special societies are now otiose, because the Church (and he had the Church of England specially in mind) today is awake to its missionary obligation. But Sir Kenneth firmly challenged this complacent view. He declared that he found it hard to believe that the Church is ready to be its own missionary society. "I doubt if it could call forth the necessary enthusiasm and support, or if it contains within itself the necessary oneness of outlook and purpose." He went on to express a fear that the missionary enterprise might also be smothered by patronage. He believed that every age needed its challengers, "every army its skirmishers, every church its protestants," for in both Church and State the tendency to centralise seems inevitable. It becomes, with some people a kind of bureaucratic obsession . . . It is easier to administer than to create, and the bureaucrat tends to supersede the pioneer. But a society conceived and brought forth for the preaching of the Gospel must have an inexhaustible capacity for breaking bounds; if it ceases to have this it is ready to perish." That is well said, and it applies to other denominations besides the Church of England.

—"The Christian," 9th May, 1958.

* * *

Trinitarian Bible Society.

At the annual meeting of the Trinitarian Bible Society at the Caxton Hall, Rev. W. Dodgson Sykes, presiding, it was reported that the total circulation during the year amounted to 233,644 Bibles, Testaments and portions of Scriptures. Large supplies of Bibles had been distributed in Spain. Polish New Testaments were being asked for, and Gospels had been sent to Cyprus and Greece.

Communism and Roman Catholicism the Secretary, Rev. R. Chambers, stated, placed every obstacle in the way of Scripture circulation. Although this year the Society's income exceeded its expenditure the increasing cost of printing and binding was a constant anxiety. Mr. Chambers also mentioned his impending retirement, and his appreciation of the loyal help given to him during the years.

Mr. H. T. Haynes, Secretary of the Committee of Management, spoke in warm terms of Mr. Chambers' service to the Society. He added that Rev. T. H. Brown, who was following him, had all the qualifications for his work.

Rev. C. T. M. Browne, Vicar of St. James', Clerkenwell, spoke of the help given him by the Society when he distributed Bibles, Testaments and Gospels to people in the mining and industrial areas in the north. Rev. Donald Hill thanked God for His goodness to the Society during the year and Pastor J. D. Turner spoke from the words, "Go, stand in the Temple and speak to the people all the words of this life."

* * *

Unesco and Bible Translations

The Press Service of the World Council of Churches has called attention to misleading figures about Bible translations published in the journal of Unesco (the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organisation). According to the figures given, the Bible came sixth on the list of "the world's most translated authors in 1956." The figures showed Lenin, Jules Verne, Tolstoy, Maxim Gorky, and Micky Spillane in front of the Bible, in that order. Representatives of the Bible societies have examined the Unesco figures, and say that their publications in some countries have been overlooked. Britain and the United States, where the Scriptures are being issued in many languages, were among the omissions. The societies have told inquirers that almost certainly the Bible, in whole or in part, remains the most translated book in the world, appearing in more editions and more languages than any other.

—"The Christian," 13/6/'58.

* * *

Latin America Evangelising South American Indians.

Speed of Evangelism

The speed of evangelism in many parts of Latin America is breathtaking. The facilities for proclaiming the Good News to every creature are being multiplied. From the southernmost tip of Patagonia to the northernmost border of Mexico, the Gospel is being preached to a growing constituency by voice and pen, by personal witness and Scripture colportage, by evangelistic campaigns and literature distribution, and is being hastened on by Gospel broadcasting and missionary aviation.

Some of the most vigorous evangelistic work is undertaken by those who are popularly known as Pentecostals. Much of it has been quite spontaneous. In Chile, for example, the movement began nearly 50 years ago by a remarkable revival in a local church. To-day, there are almost half a million Pentecostals in Chile, forming the fastest-growing and most influential Evangelical body in the country. Similar growth is to be found, in varying degrees, in Brazil, Mexico, Puerto Rico and Argentina. They are remarkable for their fervour in witness, adaptability in method, and sacrificial giving.

An illustration of this may be taken from the rebuilding of the large Pentecostal chapel in Rio de Janeiro after the original building had been destroyed by fire. Groups throughout the land set aside a Lord's day to bring special offerings. Between them, they gave several million cruzeiros in one day. Tithing is a feature of Evangelical work in Brazil, and Pentecostals have distinguished themselves by the demands they make from their members.

Uncultivated Fields

While reports of evangelization in Latin America are impressive, it must not be forgotten that there remain many uncultivated fields among aboriginal peoples, among rural populations on the vast plains, in industrial areas, among immigrants, students, and other special classes of people.

One of the challenges in Latin America is to reach the inaccessible and oft unapproachable nomadic Indians. Statistically, they appear to be an insignificant minority amounting to something less than a million all told. Nevertheless, they are souls for whom Christ died, distributed among some 300 tribes or more, pitiful remnants of peoples who once roamed from the Atlantic to the Andean foothills, from the Caribbean to Patagonia. No Indian now remains in the bleak region where Allen Gardiner laid down his life to reach them in 1851. A Spanish-speaking population has taken their place, among whom the Evangelical Union of South America is pioneering in what must surely be the southernmost mission field in the world. And the South American Missionary Society, which came into being to reach the Indians which have since disappeared from that field, are now concentrating on the tribes in the Chaco and Araucania.

Another major challenge is the effective evangelization of the Quechua-speaking and Aymara-speaking Indians of the High Andes. The former are found largely in Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador, constituting a language block of some six to seven million strong, with regional dialects, while there are reckoned to be about a million Aymara-speaking Indians around Lake Titicaca. This is a rugged field for tough men, men who can endure hardness for Christ. The two Missions which have worked longest among them are the Bolivian Indian Mission and the Evangelical Union of South America. Both are working among a predominantly Quechua-speaking Indian population in their respective countries.

* * *

A Glorious Ideal and A Promising Work.

A notable development is that of the Wycliffe Bible Translators who are focussing their endeavours on reaching the remaining tribes, reducing their languages to writing, translating the Scriptures, and teaching the Indians. The new organisation came into being in 1942 as the result of tackling such work in Mexico. After successful labours in that country, Dr. Townsend, the leader, went to Peru in 1945, opening the way for a team of twenty translators and their supporting personnel to follow him in 1946. The team in Peru has grown to 175 during the past eleven years, reaching twenty-nine different language groups in that space of time. There are now believers in the Lord Jesus Christ in seventeen of these tribes. The Wycliffe Bible Translators are also moving ahead in Mexico, Guatemala, Ecuador, Bolivia and Brazil. They do not claim to be a mission and do not aim at establishing churches. They specialise in linguistics and spearhead the way for others. Their goal is the Word of God in every language on the face of the earth in this generation.

* * *

New Evangelism in South America.

Literature Evangelism

As for the remaining challenges, it is impossible to over-estimate the hunger of a growingly-literate Spanish-speaking and Portuguese-speaking people for reading matter. South America is plastered with paper. The visitor is impressed with the multiplicity of books, magazines, and papers which are made available to him on almost every street corner. A fine opportunity is afforded for evangelism at a book counter. Evangelical bookshops are among the finest fishing nets for catching thinking men alive. The production of essential books in Spanish proceeds apace. An organization known as Literature Evangélica para América Latina is doing a magnificent job of co-ordinating the movement. The Evangelical Union of South America regards it an honour that two of its missionaries, Messrs. Glass and Harrison, should have been appointed as two out of six to serve the first three-year term on the Directorate of L.E.A.L.

While British missionaries pioneered in establishing Evangelical bookshops in South America—to mention as an example, the Liberia “El Inca” in Peru, founded over 50 years ago by Messrs. Ritchie and Millham—North American organisations are entering the field increasingly. Nevertheless, the remarkable development of the Livaria Evangélica in Brazil, under the leadership of Mr. Glass, shows that the British contribution is still much needed.

Two advances of great significance during 1957 were the publishing of “Verbo” for a potential Spanish-speaking public of over 100

(Continued on p. 107.)

THE CHURCH OF ROME AND FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

By Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D.

It is now agreed that there is need for the presentation of different points of view in order that the general public may be able to form a sound judgment on particular issues. But demagoguery is the bane of democracy. We have to be careful that we do not declaim when we should reason. “Trifles light as air are to the jealous confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ.” That is the fact that makes discussion so difficult and substitutes the demagogue for the reasoner in popular acclaim. It makes the path of the propagandist easy and the way of the reasoner hard. People are looking for what they want and are impatient if it comes to them by the long route of patient investigation. But it would be false to the best interests of the community to yield to the temptation and supply cheap assertion where serious proof is demanded. We can only claim the indulgence of listeners and go on in the right course. Our task is to support the Protestant doctrine of the right of private judgment against what we think are serious assaults on it made by the Church of Rome.

We shall take the positive side first. Then we shall show how the principles positively laid down are imperilled. For centuries the great mass of mankind has been regimented. It has followed leaders often not wisely but too well. We have not altogether escaped from the influence of these centuries of domination by the few. We thought we had and slept easy. But now we have experienced a rude awakening in the political world. Some of our dearly bought and cherished liberties are being filched from us. The movement is not wholly in one direction: Nazism and Fascism represented one phase.

* * *

Intellectual Marxism represents another. And in our judgment the arbitrary demands of the Roman Catholic Church represent another. What then is the essence of the right of private judgment? It is the declaration that a man's conscience is the final court to which he can appeal. Where it speaks neither state nor Church, Trades Union, Employers' Federation nor any other creation can validly oppose its dictates. And yet just here cannot he get down to his subject?" That is only natural, but really I am on my subject. There is a limit to the extent to which a citizen in a State can be allowed to follow his private judgment. If everyone were to be free to do exactly what he chooses, government would soon become impossible. That is the condition into which some are drifting in relation to morals. They think that morals are not made for man, but man for morals. They think that circumstances alter cases and take the "not" out of the Ten Commandments. That is very dangerous. But the question is how are we to overcome this mistake. There are two ways that have been adopted. One is to make the will of a few people supreme. Force is used when persuasion fails. But persuasion and a careful system of teaching as the base of it is widely and cunningly employed. That is the German way. Give the multitude a slogan and see that they act upon it. If they do not, fall back upon the concentration camp and elimination by the firing squad or the lethal chamber. The rulers must bend or break the spirit of the mass. It cannot be denied that up to a point it is a successful way. Great bodies of people have persuaded themselves that their leaders have a heaven-sent mission for them and have placed pathetic confidence in them. Why then do we call it a final failure? Because it does not make men. It turns God-given conscience into a mere recording machine of an external will. It leaves men helpless apart from leadership. In the true sense of a much-abused word it feeds men on dope. And just because men will remain men and can never be machines there will always be the stirrings of revolt. We will never get rid of the need of "purges." Hence the ambitious schemes for getting hold of all means of production and of all educational systems to make the control absolute. The Nazi and the Communist alike dislike private enterprise. The other way we believe to be the truly Christian way. It consists in developing man's power of correct thinking, of eliminating self-seeking and the baser motives and training the individual to see that he has an obligation to God and to his neighbour which is indefeasible. The Christian way consists in teaching men to do the will of God from the heart. It lays great stress upon the right of the individual conscience but it points out that finally it is a "judgment" that is sought from it. In order to form a judgment the individual must have accurate knowledge. The highest knowledge is knowledge of the will of God. It is not an accident that the sturdiest upholders of the right of private judgment are foremost in the claim that education should be in the reach of all. The following facts concerning the percentage of illiterates in various countries that appeared recently in an article in the magazine "World Dominion" will illustrate this: Italy 19, Spain 31, Portugal 31, Brazil 67, Mexico 59, Denmark 16, Sweden 3, England 5.8, U.S.A. 7.7. I have added England and U.S.A. for purposes of comparison. The two ideals are in conflict. The Nazi theory is to devise a scheme amongst the enlightened and force the mass to conformity by education where possible, by violent methods where education fails. The true Christian ideal is to train the individual conscience by sound teachings, above all by the preaching of the Gospel so that the individual chooses freely the good and the true way and the mass of individuals reflect it in the government of their country. Both methods experience difficulty, but the Christian way gives man his inalienable right as a distinct moral being, answerable finally to God. The truly Christian method gives the widest possible freedom to the individual. Every State has to secure suitable conditions for its continued existence. This sets bounds to individual freedom. But the State that recognises that the conscience of free minds in the development of nation-hood is the highest achievement that it can attain, will be slow to check free expression. It will recognise that unless the freedom claimed threatens its stability at the base it is better to endure minor inconveniences than to check the expressions of spontaneous loyalty. Certainly it is not possible to have both. A regimented people may have a passionate devotion to a dominant cult but it is the product of regimentation and will perish under a new system dictated from above. A free people are much more difficult to manage but much harder to dislodge from their loyalties which are born of direct personal conviction. Our Roman Catholic friends who talk so much of a divided Protestantism might take note of that fact. Protestants are divided because they are free.

* * *

They are passionately devoted to great principles because their freedom is the expression of inner convictions. An old Irishman who was a bit of a philosopher expressed it once rather quaintly: "Them Protestants are quare people. If you touch wan of 'em they're out like bees. Mind ye I admire them for it." Now it is our convinced opinion that the elaborate ecclesiastical system devised by the Church of Rome does not finally favour this independent spirit of judgment which is the base of all true liberty. Let us put some accurate facts before you in support of this contention. The law of the Church of Rome, often ignored in practice, is that no one can publish a religious book without the approval of the recognised authority. The Council of Trent had not time to examine the list of "books either suspected or pernicious" drawn up by the Fathers to whom that work was committed, but it enjoined that the work should be laid before the Pope, and "by his judgment and authority terminated and made public." What other churches did when as yet there was a vast amount of ignorance, the Roman Church continues to do unto this day. We have dropped the leading strings, believing that where there is no sordidness or direct incitement to treason the best method is to permit publication and depend on the common sense of the people. The Church of Rome has not taken this view and most important books which could not be called obscene or treasonable have been placed on the Index. All Bibles printed or circulated by Protestants come under this category. Strictly speaking, this is a restriction on freedom of expression, as our thoughts are our own and no machinery has yet been devised to read thoughts. But, like Nazism, it re-acts on thought itself. Being persuaded, sometimes by force, that a certain view is dangerous, the mind is closed against it and progress is hindered. Then the tendency to prevarication arises in a new form. An illustration of this is found in a comparatively recent defence of the condemnation of Galileo. The Rev. Sydney F. Smith, in the "Month" for March, 1890, defends that decision on the ground that it was not the doctrine that the sun went around the earth that was in question. On the contrary, according to Mr. Smith, "The absolute insistency was throughout on the irrefragable authority of Holy Scripture, and only extended to the Pythagorean Theory on the supposition that this was necessarily involved in the Biblical statements." That looks very like an evasion. The Pope condemned Galileo on an interpretation of Scripture that every Roman Catholic now holds to be false. The condemnation was regarded at the time and long afterwards as authoritatively being the meaning of the Bible. That is a warning against repression which we need to heed. To say that the decree merely insisted on the authority of Holy Scripture is to block the issue. It insisted on a certain interpretation and it was in force up to 1828. The pitiable shift of mathematical teachers to conform to recognised scientific research and remain free from heresy is well-known. The so-called Jesuit edition of Newton's Principia offers startling evidence. The preface reads: "Newton in this third book supposes the motion of the earth. We could not explain the author's propositions otherwise than by making the same supposition. We are therefore forced to sustain a character which is not our own, but we profess to pay the obsequious reverence which is due to Decrees pronounced by the sovereign Pontiffs against the motion of the earth."

Here is evidence alike of the danger of repressing serious thought and of the incapacity of the Roman Church competently to guide research. So long as the principle remains which demands obedience to an external power in matters of the mind and soul, so long the power claiming such obedience is in grave danger of being a clog upon progress. But we are sometimes told—all this belongs to the past. Everyone now teaches the mobility of the earth. That is so, but it is a case of the triumph of truth over authority. If the Church of Rome had the power equal to her will this truth would have lingered long before it found expression. Would it not be better to say that the right of private judgment conquered and we should acknowledge its right.

* * *

If the Church of Rome apologises for her mistakes; if she withdraws her claims to decree, declare and define what men should believe; if she is content to press her views like every other religious body in the great forum of the market place—well and good. Until she is so prepared, we must contend she is a menace to free thought at least so far as its expression is concerned.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE CHURCH AND ST. PETER.

Our Lord said to Simon His disciple "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16, 18). These are very well known words. They have been argued about for centuries, and by constant iteration many people have been persuaded to accept a particular meaning for them. The official creed of the Roman Catholic Church requires us to promise that "we shall never take or interpret the Holy Scriptures otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." But when we look for "the unanimous consent" of the Fathers of the Church (i.e. the broadly Orthodox Christian writers of the early centuries and the early and accepted General Councils), we are not able to discover it. Not only is there a want of unanimity in minor matters, but there is a want of it in the very explanation of Our Lord's Words quoted above. For instance, early writers disapproved of images. They did not hesitate to deny the status of canonical Scripture to many writings now in the Roman Catholic version of the Bible, and at least one bishop of Rome thought that the title "universal bishop" was anti-Christian. The fact is that the idea of a standardised view of everything was wisely ignored by early Christians. Of course they thought to avoid false doctrine, but they did not think it necessary to have a single view about everything relating to religion—that came long after. So it appears that the Fathers laid down no single explanation of our text. If some understood it to mean Peter in person, others took a different sense out of the words. Dr. Blakeney in his Manual (page 219) gives a long extract from St. Augustine who paraphrases the text thus "I say unto you, thou art Peter, because I am Petra, a rock, thou art Petrus, Peter; for Petra the rock is not from Petrus, but Petrus is from Petra the rock: for Christ is not so called from the Christian, but the Christian from Christ. 'And upon this rock I will build My Church': not upon Peter, whom thou art, but upon the rock whom thou has confessed." This may serve to show the absence of a settled interpretation among the Fathers of a crucial point in the claim that Peter is the foundation of the Church of God.

* * *

That St. Augustine is giving a reasonable exposition of the saying of Jesus is plain enough, for the contrast between "Thou art . . ." and "upon this . . ." is clear. Our Lord did not say "upon thee I will build My Church." When He spoke directly to Peter it was to say "I will give unto thee the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven." "This Rock" refers to something which was present, but was not St. Peter, and that something was the confession of faith which Peter had just made as expressing the faith of his companions. The Rock is the basic conviction, divinely revealed, that Christ is "the Son of the living God." He is the expected Messiah. Upon that faith, and on it alone the Church can be built.

* * *

But it may be said, "are not the words about the Keys of the Kingdom decisive?" They are, but of what opinion are they decisive? The Church is one thing, and the Kingdom is another. There is always need to distinguish them clearly. Oddly enough, we do not recall seeing the claim that Peter is the foundation of God's Kingdom. When we read a little farther we find (Matt. 18) that the disciples wanted to know who is greatest in the Kingdom of heaven—plainly the promise of the Keys to Peter did not suggest to the others that as a consequence, Peter must be the greatest. Neither did their understanding of the words they had recently heard about "this Rock" convey to them the impression that Peter's spiritual and temporal supremacy were now established.

The answer to their question was "Except ye turn, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of heaven"—that instruction applied to Peter as much as to any one else.

* * *

But how shall we react to the other saying of Our Lord—"Simon, Simon, behold, Satan asked to have you, that he might sift you as wheat: but I made supplication for thee that thy faith fail not: and do thou, when once thou hast turned again, stablish thy brethren," (Luke 22, 31)?

We note that Our Lord immediately after this told Peter that he would deny that very day that he knew Him. Peter's instability (a bad example to the others whose natural spokesman he appeared to be) needed to be shown as a temptation of Satan, and the unstable man's realisation that Our Lord had foreseen his downfall, and had prayed that he might have divine aid to rise again, must have been a potent instrument in his recovery of faith (courage, we mark, did not come until Pentecost).

What more effective way was there for Peter to "stablish" his brethren than to be frank and open about his cowardice, and later heroism? The weak made strong are better examples for all of us than the strong who have never yielded to weakness. Peter was not directed to "stablish" his brethren because of any spiritual superiority conferred upon him, but because of the experience he had had of failure and recovery. If we were to set up a statue of St. Peter in a Protestant place of Worship we could pick out no more fitting text to engrave upon it than the words of Revelation—"To him that overcometh . . . I will give . . . a new name."

Yet once more we may be confronted with the words in the Gospel of St. John—"Simon, lovest thou Me more than these?" In answer Simon Peter made no such claim: he said simply "Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee." The Risen Lord said to him "Feed My lambs." Did Our Lord there and then transfer to Peter His own function "I am the good shepherd"? we cannot think so. Peter has never been known as "the good shepherd" even among those who consider that he was Christ's Vicar. Indeed the thought cannot have been in Peter's mind when, years after, he wrote to his fellow-elect "ye were going astray like sheep; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls." For him, still, Christ was "the Shepherd."

If "Feed My Lambs" conveyed unique responsibility to Peter, permanently distinguishing him above all the rest of the Apostles, the New Testament should give us unmistakeable evidence of it. But that is just what it does not do. Could St. Paul's secretary St. Luke have recorded St. Paul's words to the presbyters of Ephesus had he been aware of any privilege or duty restricting Christ's pastorate to St. Peter? Those words are "Take heed unto yourselves and to all the flock in the which the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops, to feed the Church of God" (Acts 20, 28). Every minister of the Church, be he bishop, presbyter, or deacon, must "Feed My Lambs" Every Christian must do the same—St. Paul said that to the Romans—"I am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able to admonish one another." He said it also to the Colossians—"Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs."

Peter himself sought no monopoly either of status or pastoral control. He wrote to fellow Christians in the presbyterate (or eldership) "The elders I exhort, who am a fellow-elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, who am also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: tend the flock of God which is among you, exercising the oversight, according unto God; making yourselves examples to the flock. And when the chief shepherd shall be manifested, ye shall receive the crown of Glory that fadeth not away" (1 Peter 5. 1-4).

* * *

The New Testament contains no evidence of any significance beyond what we have considered here. It shows us Peter in Samaria, in Antioch, in Babylon. Some say that Babylon is a name for Rome, but there does not appear to be any real evidence that this is so, or that Peter cannot have been in the real Babylon on the river Euphrates. We do not deny that there is old and pervasive tradition that Peter was in imperial Rome. We dismiss as mere fancy the old story that he was for twenty-five years Bishop of Rome. He may have visited Rome: he may have been put to death there. Nothing is in fact gained or lost by saying that he was in Rome, for the matter is incapable of proof.

We are of course aware that it is believed that Peter's remains were interred in ground where later was built a shrine and later still a great Church. We have read of the recent excavations beneath St. Peter's, Rome to locate the burial place, but we do not believe that the identity of place or remains can be absolutely established. But even if they were completely demonstrated we would not be able to deduce from it that the so-called privileges and prerogatives of St. Peter descended as a matter of divine appointment upon each and all of the men who have been bishops of Rome since the second century. Rome is not the most ancient Christian bishopric, and even if it were, it might be entitled to veneration, and its occupants to respect, without according to it the status of "mother and mistress of all churches," or to them "supremacy and infallibility." Rome ecclesiastical twined like a strong-growing ivy round Rome imperial, and drew from Rome imperial prestige, standing, system, and security. As Rome imperial died Rome ecclesiastical continued to stand in its place. The remarkable fusion of things Christian and Secular in that city whose name and reputation have proved inextinguishable must go a long way to explain the undeniable importance in European history of the Papacy.

* * *

Since the temporal power collapsed ninety years ago (to be precise eighty-eight), the claims of Rome have been largely based on Petrine considerations, and on the Papacy as God's present vicegerency on earth. What really began with the Frankish Kings of a thousand years ago now rests on the divine right derived from St. Peter. That seems to be the claim. Orthodox Protestantism, relying on 1. Holy Scripture, and 2. the history of the Christian Church, must refuse the claim. It does not do so merely in self-defence, or for pride and obstinacy. It refuses it in the interests of truth.

* * *

If it is said that "Our Lord gave Peter authority over the Church, which was going to last till the end of the world" and therefore that Peter's "living voice, his authority, would remain in the Church, otherwise it would not be Christ's Church," the next step is to accept the Papal authority over all Christians. But is the issue as simple as that? How can we assume that "the living voice" is essential to perpetuate the authority? What is the record in history of the supposed "living voice," i.e. the successors of St. Peter? Have they faithfully discharged the apostolic, the Petrine, the Christ-ordered task "Feed My Lambs"? We deny the perpetual succession of the living voice of Peter because of the very contradiction between the real Peter's teaching and admonition, and the teaching or example of the very mixed multitude of bishops who have occupied the See of Rome. The theory of "the living voice" breaks down lamentably when the facts of history are brought forward. Had Peter's "successors" honestly and consistently fulfilled their course from then till now the record would have convinced us. But while through the centuries there have been some worthy men, and some eminent scholars, and some saints, the general level has been disappointing, and in the Dark Ages often disillusioning. The position has been no guarantee of learning, or holiness, or goodness. In modern times we gladly recognise much improvement, an elevated tone, earnestness, and devotion. But our point remains, that "the living voice" is but a phrase. History here has the final word.

* * *

"The Pope does not get his powers (like Infallibility) from those who elect him: he gets them from his position as Bishop of Rome and head of the Church. Our Lord created that position and made it permanent" (The Catholic Truth Society pamphlet "What do you know about St. Peter and his successors?" Rev. F. J. Ripley). This is a statement for which we are given no evidence. Our Lord is Himself the Head of the Church. He said "All authority hath been given unto Me in heaven and on earth." He did not say "I therefore give My authority on earth to Simon Peter." He said to Peter and the rest "Go therefore and make disciples of all the nations." That was the command of the living and reigning Head to His subordinates. How could any man become head of the Church without transference of power from Christ to him? Where is the proof of this to be found? Not certainly in Holy Scripture. Is it in tradition? This is doubtful since Pope Gregory the Great thought it sinful to be called "universal bishop." He was bishop of Rome towards the close of the sixth century.

* * *

These powers are said to devolve upon the one who is validly elected (since the twelfth century this election is made by the Cardinals). But what real meaning can be attached to the words "validly elected"? In many periods it can have meant no more than successful occupancy of the See. In others, not even that, but the support of some of the Cardinals and a powerful prince or two. In a disputed election there might be, two popes—one was called "anti-pope" if he failed to hold on, or to buy enough support. At least once both popes were thrust out and a third was installed, and he was reckoned "valid". The word lost any significance. With such facts in view (Milman, Creighton, and other historians of Western Christianity will supply details), we may securely set aside the claim to divinely constituted headships.

* * *

"The basic truth emerges as the constant belief of the Church: where the Bishop of Rome is, there is Peter: where Peter is, there is Christ; therefore, where the Bishop of Rome is, there is Christ" (op. cit.). We wish it were all as simple as this! What is left out of consideration is that "the constant belief of the Church" is in fact only the belief of a part of the Church; just its western extension. The Eastern part of the Church to which the Christians of Rome originally belonged, (and they were subject to the Emperors who reigned in the East as well as the West, for a thousand years) never took the view that the "successors" of Peter in Rome were exercising Christ's Headship. When Pope Leo the Great once pronounced a strongly orthodox opinion on a controverted point, an enthusiastic group cried out "Peter has spoken by Leo"! That cry may have been organised of set purpose, but at best the sentiment is rhetoric. We cannot conscientiously believe that there is either divine purpose (unless in common with all events) or necessity in the papal supremacy. Considered as the patriarchal and most ancient see of the West the Roman bishopric is a historic fact. Considered as the bishopric of the capital of the great Empire it is also a fact of great distinction. But considered spiritually, we decline its jurisdiction and humbly yield our loyalty to Christ Himself, the Church's sole and ever-present Head (Matt. 28. 20).

"THE STORY OF A PRIEST."

THE PEOPLE'S PADRE

I should like to invite our readers to study the story of the Rev. Father Emmett McLaughlin, O.F.M. It is to be had as an autobiography, published in 1955, entitled "The People's Padre," and can be had from the Sabbath School Society, Belfast, or any other good book shop, at 15/-. A friend put it into my hands some months ago and it is interesting indeed. It gives us an inside view of the Franciscan Order.

Father McLaughlin is the eldest son of two Irish emigrants from Co. Sligo. Barney McLaughlin, his father, found his way to the home of a wealthy New York magnate, and got work there. Barney's sweetheart made her way to San Francisco on the same errand. The terrible earthquake which destroyed a large part of San Francisco in 1907 brought the two together again. Barney made his way across the U.S.A. and with the help of what Father McLaughlin calls "the Irish Grapevine" in the police force, he discovered his lass living in a tent in the Golden Gate Park. He had no great difficulty in persuading her to marry him. Their eldest son was born, and baptised John Patrick, in due course. He was later to be known as "The People's Padre."

He tells us that there were four children of the marriage, two boys and two girls. Both the boys became priests. He tells us also of his early efforts to supplement the family income, first by selling newspapers, and later by caddying on a golf course. He tells us further of the prejudices which were instilled into him as a lad: of the boys who were supposed to be "laying for" Roman Catholic lads. How he learned to carry stones in his pockets in self defence. He even joined in a plot to avenge the faith by throwing a "stink-bomb" into a Protestant Church after he and his friends had returned from Mass. Fortunately his father overheard the plotting and gave them a stern lecture on fair play, and the American way of life, and freedom of religion.

Presently he entered the Seminary to prepare for his lifework. It was the obvious course for him. His ancestors had been Irish Roman Catholics for 1,000 years. Thus family pride was involved, for it meant almost as much to his friends that one of the family should become a priest, as if he were to become President of the United States.

He points out that a boy of between 11 and 15 years is not old enough to make such a choice as this involved. Yet at 15 he entered the Seminary of the Franciscan Order at Santa Barbara, California. When a lad does that he begins 12 years of the most thorough indoctrination the world knows. It ends 12 years later "with a mental rigidity and acceptance of mediaeval superstitions as archaic as those of the Buddhist Monks in Tibet."

During the junior years a boy may leave the Seminary if he so desires. Many do, and others are dismissed as being too worldly, or intellectually unqualified for the indoctrination ahead. Finally there comes Ordination. Of that he gives us a vivid description. He received it at the age of 26, and in connection with it he received a new name in token of the new life now opening before him. He had been baptised John Patrick, as we have seen. He was now called Emantus, or Emmett, in memory of an Irish Saint, he tells us, but it also savours of the leader of the attempted Irish Revolution of 1803. He was ordained with the words of Hebrews 5, 6: "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Thirteen young priests were ordained together. The Provincial Authorities scattered them over the Western States to help to do the work of turning America Roman Catholic. His own assignment was at St. Mary's Church, Phoenix, Arizona. In 1934 he arrived there and found six priests ministering to about 1,000 parishioners.

There too he found a fringe area of south-west Phoenix, a shack district, premeated with most offensive odours, very badly provided in the vital matters of water and sanitation; an area which helped Arizona to attain the highest infant death rate in the nation. Officials of the government awarded it the distinction of being the worst slum area in the United States. The town of Phoenix pretended not to know that it had such slums. In them lived Negroes, Mexicans and "white trash." There too in 1935 were criminals, and people who suffered the consequences of criminal conduct in diseases of all sorts. It was one certainly in great need of Christlike leadership.

He was called into the district to minister to a lad who was dying of tuberculosis. In the same family thirteen children had already died of the same disease. The lad had been baptised by a Baptist pastor. His neighbours were Baptists, as his parents were. Father McLaughlin received hearty encouragement to win him and his friends from the Baptists—a denomination, as he points out which has done more for the Negro than any other in America.

In the midst of this district was a grocer's store which had been robbed so often that its owners had put it up for sale. He set his heart on securing it as a centre for his work in the neighbourhood. It became the centre for far more than social work. "Medical clinics, paved streets, three housing projects and one of the largest hospitals in Arizona" sprang out of it, and finally "MY RENUNCIATION OF MY PRIESTHOOD AND ROMAN CATHOLICISM."

He bought the store with the support of the wealthier Roman Catholics of Phoenix. He thanked them for their missionary zeal, but later he was to discover that their interest was not so disinterested as it seemed. In spite of the words of St. Paul—oft quoted by the Roman Catholic Hierarchy and priests—"One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all" (Eph. 4: 5), there was a strong wish for a separate Negro institution lest the community might have to worship at one common altar. When he proposed that these Negroes should be received into the Order of the Knights of Columbus, the parish societies, local school, or into a Catholic school of nursing, the opposition came from priests and nuns and from some of the laity. In order to secure fair hospital treatment for the Negroes he asked the nun who was head of the school of nursing to receive negresses for training. She refused. The argument grew so hot that he came away declaring that he would start a nursing school for the purpose. The next day she rang him up to find out if he had changed his mind. Later the Bishop asked him to withdraw the statement and apologise to the nun. But by that time his resolution was fixed, he refused the Bishop.

Meantime the Second World War was stirring the whole world to action and Phoenix became a centre of Air Force Training, and further hospital accommodation became necessary. The Latham Act provided funds to build sewage disposal works, schools and hospitals, etc. So Father McLaughlin got his chance. He took it, and secured the placing of a hospital in his district. Then he had to take an action in Court to secure recognition for it as a nursing school. There also he was successful.

Finally on February 14, 1944, at a ceremony which included State Officials, Bishop Gerke of Tucson, and representatives of the U.S. Public Health Services, St. Monica's Hospital began its proud history.

The People's Padre, as he had come to be called, is very proud of the cosmopolitan nature of the staff. A Negro girl became the office posting machine operator; a Japanese girl was his secretary; a Mexican girl looked after the switchboard; an ambitious Negro janitor became a fully-qualified X-ray technician, he is now employed by the U.S. Indian Service as supervising X-ray Technician for the Western States.

Los Angeles "Catholic Sentinel," of 19th June, 1947, stated: "Standing as a beacon light in the sea of racial intolerance, prejudice and bigotry and as a monument to the courage, vision and loyalty of its founder to the principles of brotherly love, is St. Monica's Hospital School of Nursing in Phoenix."

Meantime Father Emmett had been told that he might look out for trouble. "You will be forced out by your superiors in the hierarchy."

When at length the test of strength came—four years later—thirteen of the sixteen men on the Board of Directors were Masons.

In his efforts to get the Hospital started he had appealed to an hierarchial superior for funds. He knew that in spite of the vow of poverty by which the Franciscan Order was bound they had recently gained a Will case in court involving a large income from California Oil Wells.

This Bishop not only refused his plea, but denounced him as being too worldly, UnFranciscan, and embarrassing to the Sisters' hospital. Finally the Bishop added, "The Catholic Church has no responsibility to these people. As far as I am concerned they can die in the streets. They are the responsibility of the city."

"A tree is known by its fruits," Father Emmett quotes the words of Jesus. He goes on to add the words of Paul (1 Cor. xiii), "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

Then his superiors called him up. He had to go to one of the most luxurious buildings on the Milibu Beach—a building as ornate as the Waldorf-Astoria, to see the men who claimed to be the chief representatives of St. Francis of Assisi—whose great text was, "Sell all that thou hast and give it to the poor, and come and follow me." When he had seen the Provincial Council and heard the charges he was given an ultimatum. He must give up his work at the hospital and submit himself to the orders of his superior.

He came away to think. He had heard of about 100 priests who had left the Roman Catholic Church. Some had turned Protestant. Others had gone into business. He estimated that about ONE THIRD OF THOSE ORDAINED WITH HIM HAD LEFT THE CHURCH.

He thought that average might hold over the whole of the U.S.A. Of the 45,000 priests who serve the Roman Catholic Church there probably one third would turn back. At length on December 1, 1948, he sent in his resignation to his Principal, and retired from the priesthood and from the Franciscan Order.

He received congratulations from many Roman Catholics, including Mr. Dudley Field Malone who said, "If every priest in the U.S.A. did what you have done, it might bring the hierarchy to their senses."

He points out "the poverty, disease and backwardness of the countries where the Roman Catholic 'mind' prevails in education and politics." What he asks will happen to America if the Hierarchy's drive should succeed in making America Roman Catholic?

His book has many very interesting facts which would enlighten our people in Ireland. I commend it to our readers. I trust that the day is not far off when the truth will be more fully known throughout our land and that Christ's Kingdom will stretch from shore to shore and bring true freedom to our people. I hope to add a little more to the same point in your next issue.

—Rev W. P. Young, B.D. in "The Christian Irishman," May 1958.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 99.

millions and "Caribbean Challenge" for English-speaking people in the West Indies. Both magazines are the kind of thing which may be offered with confidence to the doctor or bank manager, neighbour or friend, knowing that the Gospel will be presented in an attractive way. Mr. Glass returned to Brazil from furlough early this year fired with the desire to see a similar magazine brought out for a Portuguese-speaking population of over 55 millions in his vast country.

[These South American notes are from a recent article by the Rev. John Savage in "The Christian." They give us much for which to pray, and to thank God.]

* * *

Cardinal's Warning On Education—Should Not Merge Universities.

He hoped that the happy relations which existed between Maynooth College and the National University of Ireland and the President and professors of University College, Dublin, would not be impaired by any "ill-considered experiment in the educational field," said Cardinal D'Alton, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland, at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, recently.

The Cardinal was addressing the students in the Aula Maxima during the annual prize-giving, at which he presided. Most of the Hierarchy were present.

Looking back on almost fifty years of close connection with Maynooth, he said, he had seen important developments in its academic life. When he joined the staff in 1910, the College was in the process of integrating itself as a Recognised College of the recently founded National University.

"I cherish as one of my most pleasant memories during my years on the staff, the kindness and considerateness shown to Maynooth of the Senate of the National University and the unfailing help we received from the President and Professors of University College, Dublin.

Melting Pot

He hoped that these happy relations would not be impaired by any ill-considered experiment in the educational field. He had recently seen reference to the possibility of such experiments.

His memory went back to the time when Catholics were struggling desperately to obtain facilities for higher education which would not violate their consciences. The National University was established as a solution of the problem. It was not a wholly ideal solution, but it placed in their hands an instrument that could be shaped into harmony with their national and Catholic ideals.

"Now there seems to be a desire on the part of some to throw the university question once more into the melting pot, and to aim at some kind of merger between the existing universities. That, as I see it, would be an attempt at a union of incompatibles.

—"Irish Press," 24/6/'58.

[We hope that we shall not see a re-opening of the old controversies of the "Irish Universities question" which harrassed the whole problem of higher education here for sixty years till the settlement of some fifty years ago. A merging of the National University of Ireland and Dublin University may alarm the Cardinal who is concerned about the effect on Maynooth College. We on the other hand would be alarmed over the effect upon Dublin University. Dublin University (otherwise Trinity College, Dublin) is, since its foundation in 1591 a Protestant institution. That fact has governed all its work and worth. Learning has been pursued in a free atmosphere. Were it merged in its great younger contemporary (for which we have both admiration and respect) it would no longer be the "T.C.D." of Usher, Bedell, Swift, Berkeley, Stokes, Salmon, Joly and a host of great liberal thinkers.]

* * *

Rights Of India's Minorities.

The Supreme Court of India has decided that clauses in the Kerala State Education Bill are contrary to the Indian Constitution. The Bill has been referred back to the Kerala Government for alteration. The Government of the State, which is Communist in character, sought to control schools run by minority groups, and its provisions were strongly opposed by both Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. The Supreme Court has ruled that several provisions in the Bill violate guarantees in the Indian Constitution giving minorities the right to establish and administer their own schools. Those minorities include Christians, Moslems, and Anglo-Indians. Kerala is a predominantly Hindu State. The court's decision is widely regarded as favourable for the future of minority schools throughout India.

—"The Christian."

Revival! — or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT
"BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE

NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON
(Founder and Director,
THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),
11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—O—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

INDIA

One of India's most ancient languages in a new dress.

Just issued

The New Testament and Psalms in roman Tamil

Much of the illiteracy in India is owing to the complications of the native scripts. Without any change in the Spoken language the introduction of this easier type prepares the way for progress to literacy.

Published by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Contributions toward the cost of this production will be much appreciated.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 10—LXVII.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,
5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of auto-
biography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	109
"Salvation and The Church"	111
Editor's Chair	114
Reviews	117

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Double-thinking Is Criticised—Advantages For Eire in Partition.

Industrial competition from the North, a clash of opinions on education, divorce and other moral questions and heavier taxation on the middle classes for increased social services were listed by Professor Desmond Williams in Dublin as the main disadvantages for the Republic "if the Border were to be removed to-morrow."

Professor Williams, who holds the chair of Modern History at University College, Dublin, was speaking during the annual congress of the Irish Association of Catholic University Students.

He said their political tradition in the South in contemporary times was "depressingly utilitarian" and the charge was made that modern Irishmen often indulged in what was known as "double thinking."

That involved speaking on one level of thought and thinking on another. There were two recent examples.

The Government in 1949 refused to join the Atlantic Pact on the grounds that the treaty allegedly committed the parties to the maintenance of the territorial status quo.

Bantry Incident

This was an absurd explanation for a policy that could otherwise be defended reasonably. The small nations were wise to remain out of all great wars for as long as they could—but the decision was publicly discussed in terms of the existence of partition, which had nothing to do with the case.

Double-thinking, continued Professor Williams, was also seen in the Bantry incident. The refusal of permission for the British naval cadets to hold a regatta was justified in terms of the effect it would have on partition.

But the real reason that might have been advanced against it was the existence of I.R.A. and Sinn Féin elements in the affected areas.

"If one judges policies by the formal reason publicly advanced in their justification one may easily be misled into misunderstanding the real determinants of Irish political life," said Professor Williams.

The role and repute of Ireland in the world was primarily associated with Roman Catholicism.

The political ideology of modern Ireland, however, had been largely the product of Protestant thinkers since 1789.

—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 11/8/'58.

[More honest and out-spoken thought along these lines would enable all of us in Ireland to reach clearer and more intelligent convictions. In a world which is menaced by total destruction, or by the spread of atheistic materialism, Ireland ought not to hide in its illusions, and pretend that small strifes, religious or political, are of cosmic importance.]

* * *

Religious Liberty In Italy.

Since the end of the war the Protestant bodies in Italy have attempted, with some success, to prove that administrative restrictions on religious freedom, which operated under Mussolini's Fascist régime, are unconstitutional and therefore invalid. Now the Italian Federation of Evangelical Churches has issued a statement calling on the newly-elected Italian Government to take steps to enforce the parts of Italy's post-war Constitution that guarantee religious liberty. The Federation's executive says: "Italian Protestants, after waiting patiently for ten years, expect the new Government and legislature—whatever form it may take after the recent elections—to apply the Constitution fully and faithfully, more especially the parts dealing with religious liberty, which is now again threatened by the old restrictive provisions dating from the former régime." The declaration goes on to assure Italian Protestants that the Federation will take all necessary steps to obtain the full implementation of the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution, so that arbitrary acts, such as have recently again taken place, may not be repeated.

* * *

Roman Catholic Clergyman and Irish Protestantism.

We take the following from a report in "The Irish Press" of 7th August, 1958.

"Catholics could not be expected to display wholehearted enthusiasm for the Health Service when the Mater Hospital in Belfast was unjustly excluded, said Rev. Michael P. Kelly, Dean of Residence at Queen's University, Belfast, speaking at the Social Study conference being held in St. MacNissis College, Garron Tower, Co. Antrim.

"If something was not done about this soon, those who at the moment refused to regard the position of the Mater Hospital as a political issue would be forced to the conclusion that it was regarded by others as a political matter, and that the participation of Catholics in the Health Service was not welcomed, because it too had become a matter of politics and jobbery, said Father Kelly.

Religious Motives

"Father Kelly said the planners of the health service gave little indication that religious consideration and spiritual motives weighed heavily with them. The one religious influence, he said, that might have been exerted with any value was Catholic, for religious Protestantism (as distinct from political Protestantism) was dying.

"The percentage of Catholics nominated to serve on boards, authorities and committees was relatively insignificant, said Father Kelly. By their enforced absence, the Health Services were deprived of a contribution that would be based primarily on spiritual and religious convictions. Their absence, if continued indefinitely, could only be interpreted as official policy to exclude Catholic influence, Catholic teaching, as well as Catholic personnel, from a service that claimed to be for the good of all.

"The insinuation that we are not to be trusted in these matters and cannot be invested with any authority is a continuing source of frustration," he added."

[We cannot enter upon a general discussion of the several points made by the Rev. M. P. Kelly, unless to say that they may be reasonably answered. But what we take exception to is the statement that "religious Protestantism is dying.

If Fr. Kelly had paused to think, he might have asked why in the North the Protestants are building new churches, and establishing new parishes and congregations. Are these buildings in which the Orthodox Worship of God goes on week by week merely political? If new Protestant Churches are political edifices, what are new Roman Catholic ones?

The fact is that there is abounding religious life among Northern Protestants, as indeed throughout Ireland, and no useful purpose is served by a belittling or derogatory reference. Protestants believe in the Holy Trinity, in God's Word, in the Sacraments of the Gospel, in the Precious Blood, in the spiritual nature of man, in eternal life through Christ. An appreciation of these facts rather than an ignoring of them would be beneficial to all of us.]

* * *

Methodist Synod and Ireland—Synod Discussed "Disease in Soul of Ireland."

"God gave to every Church a specific problem in each generation; in South Africa, for example, it was apartheid," the Rev. F. B. Rea, principal of Epworth Theological College, Southern Rhodesia, said at the Dublin Methodist Synod in Rathgar. The subject under discussion was "Ourselves and our mission in Ireland."

Mr. Rea stated that the distinctive problem in the South was that for a long time Ireland had hated England. In earlier days, England was part of an arrogant empire and our national pride and righteous anger rebelled at the memories of deep injustices. Now, however, England was a fallen power, and, with the passing of her pre-eminence much good was lost. In the main, in recent years, Britain had been generous, but our people remained embittered. There was a disease in the soul of Ireland; she was using England as a scapegoat for her own failures; and she was using England as a way of escapism.

Air of Unreality

There was, said Mr. Rea, an air of unreality in public utterances and discussions. This was a danger point in the soul of the people. The result of that loose talking amongst the majority led young and romantic elements to take up methods of violence; they were taking the logical step and putting into action what others were saying.

The complementary truth was that, in Northern Ireland, the extreme Nationalists and the Roman Catholics were associated in the public mind; consequently, the Northerner was negative in his attitude towards the Roman Catholic Church. "We could not let it rest there, as that Church although infected, no doubt, has much that is glorious and beautiful and is part of the living Church. Further, the 'unchanging' Church is changing and being influenced more than it knows. In the Roman Catholic libraries are the Biblical works of the great Protestant scholars. Seminary studies are centred on Scripture, if not here, at least on the Continent. In the liturgical movement, the winds of the Spirit are blowing. For ourselves, it is a day of small things and we must occupy a holding position with patience and tenacity."

One of the questions which confronted them, he said, was that of union with other reformed Churches. They must seek to promote evangelism, cultivate holiness and create fellowship with others. The spirit of Methodism was more important than the Methodist Church.

—"Irish Times," 12/9/'58.

[The Rev. F. B. Rea, with experience of the wider world, is probably far better informed than we are about the changing situation in "the unchanging church." But we confess that when we reflect on the vast development of Mariology (to give a simple instance), or study the Encyclical "Humani Generis," we are not as impressed as Mr. Rea is by movements such as he refers to. Such movements, interests, and studies have always been features of that church.]

* * *

Fulton-street Prayer Meeting.

Memories of the 1859 Revival will be stirred at the forthcoming 101st anniversary of the Fulton-street Prayer Meeting in New York, which will be celebrated on September 23rd. To mark the occasion a series of meetings will be held during that week and the speakers will include Mr. LeRoy Swift, Superintendent of the McAuley Mission; Dr. Daniel A. Poling, Editor of the American "Christian Herald"; and Dr. David J. Fant, President of the New York Bible Society. Visitors are expected from many lands. The meeting is now under the leadership of Mr. Warren Buehholz.

(Continued on p. 119.)

Archdeacon T. C. Hammond on "SALVATION AND THE CHURCH."

Father Johnstone in "A Critic Looks at the Catholic Church" constitutes himself an advocate for the prisoner at the bar and enters a plea of "not guilty" against the charge that the Church of Rome asserts that there is no hope of salvation for those who do not acknowledge themselves the subjects of the Church of Rome. Father Johnstone acknowledges the seriousness of the assertion. He admits that in the words of Canon Maynard "Millions of humble and devoted lovers of Jesus" are shut off from His New Covenant. Father Johnstone enters a plea of "not guilty" and we are glad he does. He asserts quite unequivocally that in the world to-day many Anglicans, Presbyterians and Methodists—to go no further—love our Lord more truly and serve Him more faithfully than many Catholics. A generous tribute from a Roman Catholic priest which it would be churlish to repudiate. Yet we have to say, with regret, that Father Johnstone has in our judgment entirely missed the point of the accusation.

He is a disciple of his distinguished brother Jesuit, Cardinal Bellarmine, and believes with him that some belong to the soul of the Church who do not belong to the body, just as some belong to the body who do not belong to the soul. It is certainly necessary to keep that distinction in mind. We confess it relieves the situation somewhat. But it does not meet the ground of our objection. I warn my hearers that the development of the argument will tax their powers of reflection. But it is silly to imagine that great problems can be solved by the turn of a few happy phrases.

* * *

One curious fact strikes us at the outset. Father Johnstone complains that Canon Maynard is content with a mere assertion that those outside the borders of the Roman Church are cut off from Christ and salvation. He roundly declares that "mere assertion is taken for proof." Yet when we turn to the reply it is noticeable that Father Johnstone himself enters the plea of "not guilty" instead of advising his client to do so. It is the prisoner who enters the plea usually and supplies his advocate with the evidence in support of his pleading. But this might only be a mere slip on Father Johnstone's part were it not that no evidence is really supplied. We can retort to him "He does not cite any decision of her doctors or theologians. His defence occupies three and a half pages. We have five lines on the victims of Mwanga's persecution in Uganda which express the hope that, as the victims died for the truth of Christianity and in no way for the defence of a specifically Protestant doctrine, there is every reason to agree that they laid down their lives with the special assistance of divine grace." We have four lines from Newman declaring that "Conscience is the aboriginal Vicar of Christ." We have two lines from Pope Leo XIII praising the Christian virtues of the English people, and three more paying the same tribute to the Scottish people who do not agree with Roman Catholics in faith. That is the full list of the witnesses for the defence. Is it not fair to say again "Father Johnstone takes his own medicine in very small doses"? The whole defence reduces itself to the plea that the doctrine of "invincible ignorance" relieves the Church of Rome from the painful position of teaching that all outside her borders are definitely lost.

* * *

Everybody believes that there is such a thing as invincible ignorance. The secrets of all hearts belong to God. We cannot be sure that a conscientious person who is ill-instructed may not have mistaken error for truth and, in a sincere effort to follow God, may deny an important fact of His revelation? It is scarcely correct to say, however, as does Father Johnstone that "The man who says—and means it—'To hell with the Pope'" might conceivably (according to Catholic doctrine) be performing a meritorious act. He might be simply expressing in a forcible way his detestation of everything evil. That carries the doctrine of "invincible ignorance" to an absurd length. It obliterates the distinction between truth and error altogether and makes a man's motive the final and only test of the worthiness of his action. That may be a certain form of Jesuit theology developed in the bitter contest with the Jansenists, but it is not sound Roman Catholic theology.

We prefer Bishop Milner's way of putting the matter. Referring to the Blanchardists of France who accused Pope Pius VII of violating the canons of the General Councils and the Divine right of Bishops. Dr. Milner wrote, "Hundreds, if not thousands of the emigrant French . . . died in acknowledged schism, without any other chance for eternity, but that which invincible ignorance afforded." To Dr. Milner invincible ignorance offered a chance; he regarded it evidently as a slender chance of a happy eternity, but, safety and security were found in conscious communion with the Roman Catholic Church. The Roman soldiers who crucified our Lord came under the wide mercy of invincible ignorance. For them our Lord prayed. "Father, forgive them they know not what they do"! To suggest that therefore their act was meritorious even if they believed sincerely that our Lord had been justly condemned is to make a subjective feeling the touchstone of reality and truth. Father Johnstone, like the lady, doth protest too much. But Father Johnstone seems to fail in applying his own argument.

* * *

The conclusion to which we are driven when we recognise that a man may be misled and, while doing evil, may honestly believe that he is doing good, is that in matters of the soul God alone must be the judge. The State is concerned with maintaining civil order and takes steps accordingly. It may press upon conscience in so doing but there is an appeal finally from the State to God. Into that region the State does not pretend to enter.

The Protestant view is that the same restraint ought to bind the Church. Beyond fixing the conditions of membership she cannot go; she can exclude from her communion those who refuse her interpretation of scripture but she can employ no force to compel their allegiance. A man who is not honestly convinced that the Roman Church is the mother and mistress of all churches can not only refuse to submit to her claims but can repudiate her claims once they seem to him untenable. The Church can do nothing to him but entreat him to return to the fold and dare not declare that he is outside the Church of God in its deepest spiritual reality. If that is the Roman doctrine there is no more to be said. The Church which ministers salvation is the true Church of Christ and every sincere follower of truth is numbered in that Church whether he knows it or not. But that means that the only weapon that can be employed against the heretic is the weapon of argument and persuasion. Where these fail he must be left alone.

If there are any privileges in the Communion of the faithful he must forfeit these just as a trades unionist must forego his rights in a trades union if he refuses to abide by its rules. But there the matter must end.

* * *

That is certainly not the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. It might have been thought that Father Johnstone would have introduced to the notice of his hearers the famous Bull of Boniface VIII: "Wherefore we declare, affirm, define and pronounce it to be altogether necessary for salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff." This Bull has been confirmed by the Fifth Lateran Council held under Leo X in 1525. Cardinal Manning declared: "It is infallible and beyond all doubt an Act ex cathedra (Vatican Decrees, pp. 14, 35.)

We may admit that a man who never heard of the Roman Pontiff may be blameless in not rendering him obedience just as we may admit that a man who never heard of our Lord Jesus Christ may be blameless in not believing in Him. But in both cases the real obligation rests on the soul, though it has not been and could not be perceived. Such a one is materially a rebel, though formally at least, a potential subject of the Pope. But it might reasonably be expected that having opened the problem of "invincible ignorance," Father Johnstone would have assisted his hearers by outlining at least in brief the attitude taken by leading divines on this subject. This was the more to be expected because of his complaint directed against Canon Maynard. Father Johnstone might have assisted inquirers by pointing out that the theory of invincible ignorance is not employed in the matter of dealing with heretics.

* * *

Thomas Aquinas distinctly points out that here is a matter in which the Church is compelled to act differently from Almighty God. God knows the heart and judges directly of the sincerity or insincerity of the individual. The Church does not know the heart and must therefore be judged by general considerations. Answering the question: "Whether the Church should receive those who return from heresy?" Aquinas writes: "In God's tribunal, those who return are always received because God is a searcher of hearts, and knows who return in sincerity. But the Church cannot imitate God in this, for she assumes that those who relapse after being once received, are not sincere in their return; hence she does not debar them from the way of salvation, but neither does she protect them from the sentence of death." (Summa Secunda Secundae Q. XII.) So then the Church claims to be the appointed way of salvation with such definiteness that she regards admission to her fold as the only hope of the relapsed heretic.

If he happens to be sincere he must be given the chance at least of dying in the true fold. How does that square with Father Johnstone's ingenious theory about the man who says "To hell with the Pope" sincerely? In fact, Father Johnstone assumes that the prosecution has much less to say than it has. He never touches on the subtle distinction made by Aquinas between the unbelief of heretics as contrasted with the unbelief of Jews. He regards the unbelief of heretics as greater because "they confess their belief in the Gospel and resist that faith by corrupting it," while Jews "accept the figure of that faith . . . which they corrupt by their false interpretations." Hence Jews should not be compelled to accept the faith, but heretics, such as Protestants, "should be submitted even to bodily compulsion that they may fulfil what they have promised, and hold what they at one time received." Again, "The rites of heretics are not to be tolerated, except to avoid disturbance and scandal, or because to do so would hinder their conversion."

* * *

We have an illuminating example of the modern working out of this medieval theory in the case of Franco's treatment of the Protestant Churches in Spain. Further, Father Johnstone does not help us very much in determining what is the final canon of authority. If as he must, he believes that the Roman Church has been appointed by God as the normal way of salvation he must sooner or later come to grips with the question, "Is the individual conscience the test of truth?"

His colleague, Father Walker, in his interesting discussion with Dr. Coulton assailed very stoutly the idea which Newman appears to advocate. Father Walker said, "If . . . the sole authority in religion as in scientific belief, is an appeal to reason, or to the spiritual faculties of the individual, and if . . . this authority must always be ready to submit to correction, it follows that we can never be quite sure that our religious beliefs are true beliefs . . . It is . . . to the widespread acceptance of this doctrine that the indifference of the Protestant multitude is due." (Medieval Studies 17, p. 37). But if there is an independent ability who defines truth as Father Walker implies and that arbiter is the Roman Catholic Church, then it must follow that it belongs to the Church to determine at what stage truth has been adequately presented and mere ignorance has degenerated into pertinacious adherence to error. Once this stage is reached, "invincible ignorance" no longer offers its slender chance to the pertinacious. For in the judgment of the Church he knows and obstinately refuses to accept the truth. Give me six months' coaching from Father Johnstone and if I still continue to broadcast opinions contrary to the received Roman faith I place myself outside the Church by a perverse act of will, and unless I repent before I die I have forfeited all claim to salvation. The more I know the graver my danger.

And, as I am also a menace to others, it would be well if disturbance and scandal could be avoided to remove me. It cannot be denied that I have an interest in keeping Australia Protestant.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE BISHOPS AND THE BIBLE.

On two occasions recently we wrote about the efforts of certain theological leaders in Great Britain to create a "problem" of the conservative evangelical attitude to Holy Scripture. We objected to the use of the emotional word "Fundamentalism," and to its being applied to the conservative view because it is intended to create at the outset an atmosphere of prejudice. The attempt is often made to alienate interest and support from evangelicalism by suggesting that it is intellectually disreputable. "Fundamentalism" is supposed to shut its eyes and ears to sound learning, so the young man or woman starting University or other literate career is led to think that a positive faith in the Bible is hardly compatible with higher education or aspirations after an honours degree.

In spite of this, it appears that a very substantial proportion of average and above average students hold to a conservative view; and believe that the expansion of the sciences relating to the Bible (i.e. ancient history, archaeology, philology) have transformed the situation to-day as contrasted with say, forty years ago.

We believe that it is not an exaggeration to say that the Biblical studies of the past forty years have tended to strengthen the conservative approach, and to make a positive, constructive, affirmative Biblical faith reasonable. Of course the new conservative view is not identical with the old. A hundred and fifty years ago the then Regius Professor of Divinity in Dublin, Dr. Graves, published a book on the Pentateuch. In it he considered the problem of the non-mosaic parts of the Five Books as set out by another scholar, le Clerc. He enumerated sixteen separate verses, and, in addition, the last (34th) chapter of Deuteronomy, Dr. Graves refers to these as "all the passages which the ingenuity and diligence of le Clerc, a most acute critic, could discover in the Pentateuch, calculated to raise a doubt whether it was not composed by some writer later than Moses; which in a hasty view of the subject he maintained as a fact. On maturer consideration he distinctly said and candidly acknowledged that these passages did not bear him out in this opinion; which he accordingly publicly retracted." Dr. Graves further adds that he himself has adduced "a mass of direct proofs that the entire Pentateuch was the work of Moses himself."

Now we are inclined to think that a man might be a present-day conservative evangelical in his view of the Bible without holding, as Dr. Graves seemed to do, that Moses was the original author of the entire contents of the Pentateuch. As we no longer deny Mosaic authorship on the ground that writing was unknown in the time of Moses, so we can affirm, if we will, that Moses incorporated in his writings much older writings, and also that some later elements may be there.

We do not think that a believing attitude to God's word to-day compels us to ignore the advance in knowledge of the past hundred years: only, we ask that it shall be knowledge and not conjecture. We also ask that the Bible as a source of historical evidence shall not be regarded as inferior to non-scriptural sources; and that what is said in the Bible shall not be hesitated over until we can confirm it from outside sources.

* * *

As we say, we have noted that some people want to treat the conservative view of the Bible as though it were a dangerous heresy. Others appear to think it the only menace to advancing Christian thought, and therefore the one issue over which they may wax indignant. We have already said that we know that there are problems and dangers in the world which threaten to engulf not only the Bible, but civilisation itself. If we are set "in the midst of so many and great dangers" (to quote a phrase from the collect of the fourth Sunday after the Epiphany), it seems plain that we ought to be mindful of Our Saviour's words—"He that is not against us is for us" (Mark 9. 40). To quarrel with one's friends is to encourage one's enemies, and it is surely wisdom to realise who are our friends.

Further, the censures against conservative views which were common among the liberals and modernists of thirty years ago are being issued to-day by many who would hotly deny that they are either liberal or modernistic. They too consider themselves conservative; or better, they like the designation "neo-conservative." We believe that they have approximated so closely to those they try to combat that their opposition is merely a hindrance. It cannot be a really worthwhile duty they owe to the practical development of Christ's Kingdom.

* * *

Perhaps it should be said, at this point, that some conservative evangelicals tend to isolate themselves from all except the like-minded. Spiritual aloofness, we may frankly admit, is not a Christian virtue—"Be ye separate" is not a behest which has any relevance whatever in this context though it is often misapplied to it. What we need is to meet on the common ground of discipleship (on the Gospel basis), and in discipleship to welcome all who want to serve Christ's Kingdom.

* * *

All this is preliminary to the information given to us (whose accuracy we do not vouch for, but are inclined to accept) that a good deal of pressure and persuasion was brought to bear upon the Anglican bishops (or those of them immediately concerned), that in their Conference deliberations they should condemn (or express disapproval of) "Fundamentalism."

It was known long ahead of course that the Lambeth Conference programme contained a section on "The Holy Bible: Its Authority and Message." Some people hoped that the Conference would express at least surprise and regret that "old-fashioned" views of the Bible still lingered in Universities and similar places—if not among the staffs (though by no means unknown there), at least among students. It may indeed be kept in mind that where conservative evangelical views are attacked, it is the intention of certain people to attack the evangelical rather than the conservative. If conservative views of the Bible are really to be deplored: if they are to be thought inimical to true spirituality and enlightenment, why are they not challenged in the case of Rome, and made a weighty accusation against the Roman Catholic system?

If conservatism is impossible for the intelligent man we may well enquire how it became possible for the late Monsignor Ronald Knox. Mgr. Knox was a remarkably well-informed Bible student. As a Roman Catholic he was bound to hold a very conservative outlook on the Bible. Need we suppose that Mgr. Knox only pretended to hold the conservative view? Such a supposition would reflect more on us than on him.

The fact is, that those who deride the conservative evangelical for his Biblical "obscurantism" do not say anything about Rome's views which are more or less identical. We are free to ask why? We cannot compel an answer.

* * *

What did the Lambeth Conference say on this important subject? The bishops say:

"This present age urgently needs the Divine Message of the Bible if its predicament is to be met. Our Lord Jesus Christ is God's ultimate Word to man. In his light all Scripture is to be interpreted, the Old Testament in terms of promise, the New in terms of fulfilment. Though our understanding of the Bible has been greatly assisted by those scholars who have taught us to see more clearly the varied ways in which the human factor has contributed to the books we call the Bible, the great realities—life and death, sin and righteousness, war and peace, famine and plenty, good and evil—remain always the same, and the Bible speaks to these situations as it did when its various books were written."

"... there may be before us a new experience of the living power of the Bible in the worship of the Church and in the hearts of Christian people. We are coming to see once more that the Bible has a deep underlying unity in spite of many different facets."

"Church people everywhere must join in the great rediscovery of the Bible as a means of grace to the individual and as the inspiration of corporate worship and witness." These are brief quotations from the Lambeth Encyclical Letter.

* * *

The Resolution of the Conference convey the same faith and emphasis.

"The Bible discloses the truths about the relation of God and Man which are the key to the world's predicament, and is therefore deeply relevant to the modern world."

"The Conference gratefully acknowledges our debt to the most of devoted scholars who, worshipping the God of Truth, have enriched and deepened our understanding of the Bible, not least by facing with intellectual integrity the questions raised by modern knowledge and modern criticism."

"The Conference . . . calls all church people to re-establish the habit of Bible-reading at home, and commends the practise of group Bible study."

"The Conference calls upon Christian people . . . to bear witness to the Biblical message of a God and Saviour apart from whom no gift can be rightly used."

The Conference also urges increased support for all Bible Societies.

In these summarised resolutions regarding Holy Scripture the work of Biblical scholars is commended without distinguishing them one from another. The over-all consideration is the deepening and enriching of our understanding of the Bible. We think we can honestly say that this must openly welcome the contributions of definitely conservative scholars as well as those of somewhat more "liberal" views.

* * *

We note thankfully that the centrality and primacy of Holy Scripture are firmly asserted. This has ecclesiastical as well as critical significance. Further, the Old Testament is declared to be the key to the New Testament, since it is spoken of as prophetic of Our Lord.

* * *

Many people reading the Conference resolutions may wish that they had said more on the Bible: many also may wish that they had said less.

* * *

In the Committee report (a department of the Conference spent much time in considering "The Holy Bible; Its Authority and Message") the Bible is described as "possessing an urgent message for the modern world, probing deeply to the roots of its distress and bringing God's own remedy to it."

"The Church is not 'over' the Holy Scriptures, but 'under' them, in the sense that the process of canonisation was not one whereby the Church conferred authority on the books, but one whereby the Church acknowledged them to possess authority." Readers of our pages over the last year or two may recall that we have often made this very point.

The committee report goes on to describe the characteristics of the work of Biblical criticism in the usual terms, and asks the question "How has it affected our attitude to the Bible as the revealed Word of God?" The report sets aside the attitude of "evolutionary liberalism," and lays emphasis upon "belief in the living God who is active in history." "The Bible has its origin in the unique action of God in Israel and in Jesus Christ." This, it is said, is the point of view powerfully represented at the present day under the name of "Biblical Theology." It is pointed out that "while subjecting the records about Jesus Christ, no less than those of the Old Testament, to a criticism which does not accept every detail of the narratives as historical, 'Biblical Theology' is able none the less to affirm that Jesus Christ is the Divine Son of God, whose life and death and resurrection is not understood apart from the Apostles' own interpretation of them as a Gospel of divine salvation."

We think that at this point it might have been emphasised that the Gospel of divine salvation rests much more on the words of Christ Himself than on "the Apostles' own interpretation." But we must regard "Biblical Theology" in our day as subject to the limitations of "Biblical Theology" which arise at all times from the fact that it is a varying human interpretation of the Divine Message.

* * *

On "the Word of the Lord" right emphasis is laid on Our Lord as the key to the word in the Old Testament, and to the Word in the New Testament, for in Him "the Word became flesh."

"If we are to understand the way in which the Bible is the Word of God we need to take as our central thought the fact that Jesus Christ is the Word of God . . . It is because of their connection with Jesus Christ that the books have authority."

"In the light of the relation of the Bible to Jesus Christ we can affirm that the Bible possesses the authority of God's truth and is the work of God's inspiration, without ascribing inerrancy to every statement which the Bible contains." The last clause here can refer only to the existing text of the Bible, transmitted through generations of human agents. Opinions can be expressed about the text we have, not about what that text may have been originally.

"Inspiration means that the spirit of God has been at work in a writer; and just as the Bible as a whole is the record of God's revelation of Himself in Israel and in Jesus, so we believe that as a whole it is inspired by God . . . Correlative with the divine revelation in the whole is the belief that His Spirit was at work in all the books which serve that revelation."

"The Church must live by the Bible."

* * *

We can say now that the Lambeth Conference has declared the very positive and believing approach to the Bible as integral to Anglicanism as to all Orthodox churches. There is no place for dilettantism or scepticism now. For that we may thank God Himself.

REVIEWS.

H. R. Trevor-Roper, "Historical Essays". Macmillan & Co., London, 1957. Pp. 297.

This most interesting book is a reprint of forty-two short essays or reviews. The subjects are mainly English, but there is a fair proportion of non-English topics, ranging from the Holy Land in ancient times to Karl Marx. Among these we may name essays on Homer, the mediaeval Italian capitalists, Barbary, Erasmus, and Machiavelli.

Of the non-English subjects we were most interested in "the mediaeval Italian capitalists," for Mr. Trevor-Roper shows (as, indeed, others have done) that capitalism is not to be thought of as a consequence of the Reformation. Vapid writers have often put up a pretentious case for capitalism as the child of Calvinism: this is plainly shown not only to be wrong, but absurd. Italy is the mother-land of capitalism, and many of the technical terms of financial dealing are still Italian. We have only to think of the significance of the word "Lombard" to realise that North Italy rather than Geneva is the home of high finance. The fact is that polemical theology is not the master-key to economic history. Those who write as if it is are neither theologians nor historians.

The essay on Erasmus, a man whose interest for the thinking world is perennial, is one of the very best. We can never afford to neglect the testimony of Erasmus—the Christian man who was simply Christian without feeling: the compulsion to be either Lutheran or Roman—the man whose name still signifies the scholar; the student of truth first and always.

Mr. Trevor-Roper gives us a just appreciation of Machiavelli. That name suggests to the uninformed the more disreputable and unprincipled aspects of statecraft and diplomacy. Mr. Trevor-Roper suggests that this view is exaggerated, and no doubt it is. The manoeuvres of statesmen are often no more devious than those of average respectable persons apart from the consideration that the scale in which they operate and the effects of their schemes must be far greater. Yet Machiavelli is regarded as making "reasons of state" the justification for many actions which, by ethical standards, are reprehensible.

It might seem that these essays are too short—forty-two in a volume of two hundred and ninety-seven pages—to be more than mere sketches. That is not so. The author has the splendid ability to give us a great deal of solid information and sound judgment without padding, or moralising, or irrelevancies. He is a Professor of history at Oxford and well maintains the high standards of scholarship and skillful presentation of result which were set by his predecessors in the last century.

* * *

The essays on English history are of course the ones which readers must turn to with eagerness. So much "history" is written as though the people involved had never lived and thought and felt and believed; as though they had been puppets and marionettes, or actors in a historical play, that it is a relief to find that the men Mr. Trevor-Roper writes about are recognised as living sentient personalities and the author can hold and express very decided opinions and estimates of them.

Further, Mr. Trevor-Roper does not ignore, belittle, or apologise for, the Protestantism of many of his subjects. He does not surrender to the fashionable (if contemptible) policy of siding with Rome on the presentation of counter-Reformation events. Some may emphasise the Machiavellian statecraft of Elizabeth's advisers, Cecil and the rest: but Mr. Trevor-Roper reminds us that an English Roman Catholic, a Jesuit, was at the Spanish Court, constantly advising the Spanish King how to conquer England. Is it Satanic criminality to take steps to defend one's country? Did not Jesuit policy practically force English Roman Catholics into a situation in which they were inevitably suspect as "fifth-columnists"? Did not the spectacle of what the Dutch Protestants were enduring under the same Spanish King tell plainly what England might count on experiencing if Jesuit policy succeeded?

An essay on "Fuller's Worthies" reminds us that the bishops of the Church of England in the time of Elizabeth and James I were noted for their charities—mere greed is not the whole explanation of the Anglican settlement!

A very provocative essay contrasts the French Huguenots and the English Roman Catholics. These two minority groups in the post-Reformation period may very fairly be considered together. Of course the sufferings of English Roman Catholics were negligible as compared with the sufferings of the French Protestants. But the Protestants of France, in spite of everything, became the elite of the nation, and made great contributions to public life from the time of Napoleon onward. English Roman Catholics made no such record.

We can describe Mr. Trevor-Roper's book as comprehensive, intelligent, and courageous. He is never ungenerous, and while we know nothing of his ecclesiastical allegiance or Christian convictions, we can say that he is Protestant in a broad sense. He does not, unlike many supposedly dispassionate "historians," take the view that the Protestant standpoint may be dismissed.

J. Van der Ploeg, "The Excavations at Qumran." Longmans, London, 1958. Pp. 233.

This is a translation from the Dutch made by the Rev. Kevin Smyth, S.J. of Dublin. Dr. J. Van der Ploeg is Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew in the University of Nijmegen, Holland, and has studied in Palestine and for the last ten years has been much interested in "the Dead Sea Scrolls." He is obviously a competent scholar, and therefore his statement (in the preface) regarding the Scrolls "a large number of publications appeared which succeeded in misleading a portion of the public in an irresponsible fashion. Efforts were even made to bring discredit upon scholars who were devoting themselves seriously and dispassionately to the study of the texts, simply because they refused to subscribe to certain views," is important. As a Roman Catholic teacher Dr. Van der Ploeg is naturally conservative, and rightly so, for he shows plainly the stupidities foisted upon the public by some writers who never had the equipment to justify them in publishing anything. He also protests against the views of certain scholars, who while possessed of much first-hand knowledge of the Scrolls have given conflicting interpretations.

In our May number we had a review of "The Message of the Scrolls" by Yigael Yadin, the Israeli archaeologist and military leader. That book was probably published after the original Dutch edition of Dr. Van der Ploeg's book. We have consequently no comment on it in the survey of accounts of the Scrolls, but we think that Dr. Van der Ploeg would agree with General Yadin that "research on the Scrolls is still in its initial stages."

In our review of Yadin's book we referred to a popular book by an American Unitarian, a Dr. Davies, which Dr. Rowley of Manchester properly criticised for groundless assumptions and innuendoes. Van der Ploeg in surveying the competing theories (many now discredited) of expositors of the Scrolls says "others have claimed that the Dead Sea texts clearly demand a radical rethinking of some doctrinal positions of Christianity. With a few strange exceptions, no one who knows the texts well agrees with this. What matter, answers another, anyone who does not agree is thereby branded as a theologian who sees his position endangered and therefore prefers not to recognise the truth, or at least refuses to impart it clearly and unambiguously to the layman! So A. P. Davies."

In that review we also made reference to the short book by the American literary man Edmund Wilson. Dr. Van der Ploeg says that Wilson "made up the matter very creditably," saw the important people, visited the Dead Sea, and wrote his book. "It was, in his opinion, an incontrovertible fact that the characteristic doctrines of Christianity had gradually evolved from a dissident sect of Judaism, the community of Qumran. And he came to the conclusion that scholars were deeply disturbed by this discovery. They were, he pointed out, mostly Catholic or Anglican clergymen or Protestant ministers, brought up on the idea that Christianity is a revealed religion or at least a very distinctive and exceptional one, whose origin cannot be explained by the adoption and development of the doctrines of a Jewish sect till then little known, that of Qumran. He thought that pious Jews were also upset at finding that Christianity was historically so closely connected with Judaism as now appeared. He concluded that only persons with no religious affiliations at all are capable of forming an objective judgment about the significance of the Dead Sea finds."

Wilson's view seemingly is that only the non-religious can be honest. This conceited assumption, made by a journalist, belongs to the world of entertainment, not to the world of scholarship.

Dr. Van der Ploeg also criticises Dr. Allegro of Manchester who published in the Pelican Books his views on the Scrolls. He criticises however, a broadcast talk by Allegro rather than his book, and quotes a letter in the London "Times," 16th March, 1956 in which Allegro's colleagues disagreed with Allegro's assertions on the ground that nothing in the Scrolls supported them.

The lamentable effect of hasty, partisan, and unscholarly dogmatism about the effect of the non-Scriptural Scrolls on the Christian faith is, as Dr. Van der Ploeg points out, to create the impression that the Scrolls have shaken the foundations of Christianity. He carefully states the original principles of Christianity as found in the New Testament and compares them with the known principles of the Qumran sect. It is plain that the Qumran sect had none of the universalism of Christianity, and none of the ideal spirit of love. For it the law of Moses was fundamental.

These are, necessarily, superficial resemblances, for Christianity had its roots in Judaism, and especially in the Old Testament.

But the feature of the Qumran sect which has attracted great attention is the existence in it of "The Teacher of Righteousness." Certain interpreters of the Scrolls have elaborated the parallels of resemblances between Our Lord's life, teaching, and death, and the life, teaching, and death of the Qumran leader—Dupont-Sommer and Allegro have been outstanding in this. Dr. Van der Ploeg writes "Dupont-Sommer said of his series of parallels that they were 'almost hallucinating.' No one but himself and an odd disciple of his has been able to see them in the text of the Sérolls, and practically nothing of them survives a dispassionate consideration of them. A general protest has been entered against them by students of the texts, but in the meantime they have made their way into radio, television and popular writing where they have created an unwholesome atmosphere, and caused doubts or even disturbance among the non-experts, who cannot tell who is right and who is wrong."

Dr. Van der Ploeg carefully sets out the facts in both sides and demonstrates that the supposed identity of Jesus and the Teacher of the Qumran sect is untenable. His study of "Qumran and Christianity" (chapter 7 of the book) seems to us conclusive. His final word is "Qumran and the New Testament speak each their own language."

We recommend this book to all who are seriously interested in this new subject. It's author, a Dominican priest, has written with knowledge and good sense.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 111.

[The Ulster Revival of 1859 is often traced to the influence of the Fulton St., New York prayer-meeting of a century ago. It was linked up with the North America Revival which gave the human impetus to the awakening in Ulster. In 1959, if God will, we shall be hearing and reading a great deal about the events of 1859 and their influence.]

* * *

"Religion Is Above The Courts"—District Justice.

District Justice Gordon Hurley said in Killaloe recently: "Religion is above the courts, the main business of which is to preserve peace. When men come into the Irish village and provoke the people by foisting their views on them, they are abusing whatever rights they have under the Constitution, which guarantees freedom of religious worship. Such action is bound to draw down the rod of the people whose hospitality they have received."

He applied the Probation Act in a case which Michael Boland and John (Christy) McKenna of Ballyloughnane, Killaloe, and Patrick Daly, Killestry, Killaloe, were charged with unlawfully assaulting Robert Glen Lindsay, Samuel Glen Lindsay and Christopher Rowe on June 26th at Killaloe, thereby causing them actual bodily harm.

The defendants, who pleaded guilty, were represented by Mr. I. M. Houlihan, solicitor, and Inspector E. McDonnell prosecuted.

Mr. Houlihan said his clients were under great provocation. They were respectable farmers and had been attending a fair in Killaloe when they were confronted by three young men "vending Christianity." His clients took offence, as it was the wrong time and place for these men—two of whom, he understood, came from Limerick, and a friend of theirs from England—to go foisting their special brand of Christianity on a people steeped in Christianity.

Furthermore, the position was aggravated by the fact that some time before, leaflets had been left in the confessional of the Catholic church in the parish from which his clients came, and the parish priest had protested from the altar and asked for more vigilance from his parishioners.

Not First Time

Mr. Houlihan said that he did not want to associate the complainants with circulating these leaflets, for the simple reason that it had not been proved, but it was not the first time that "pseudo-evangelists" had visited the area.

"The judiciary in England have described these people as a sect of canting humbugs," went on Mr. Houlihan, who added that it was fantastic for these young men from Limerick to come into Clare vending the Bible and Christianity on a people who were steeped in it. To say they were preaching Christianity to a people ignorant of it was only adding to the blaze. The Irish had Christianity since the time of St. Patrick, and had spread it all over the world.

Another of his clients, Mr. Boland, he said, was highly commended for coming to the rescue of a member of the Civic Guards when there was trouble before between members of some sect or other and the people.

Inspector E. McDonnell said the men came to Killaloe to hold a religious meeting on the steps of the church. Mr. Rowe held the Bible in his hand and this was taken from him by Mr. Boland, who gave it a couple of kicks down the street. The guards then had a conversation with the men, and they went to their car, but the defendants got around by another street, intercepted them and hit them with fists and sticks.

One of the Lindsays fell from a blow on the forehead and lost two teeth. He was unconscious for about 20 minutes. He was treated by his family doctor and taken to hospital next day. There were no serious injuries, but Lindsay had concussion for some time.

District Justice Hurley said he recalled a similar case in Limerick some time ago. He had gone into the matter very deeply then, and he still held the same views. As he saw it, that case was a precedent for future findings of the court. No costs were allowed.

—"Irish Times," 16/9/58.

[A correspondent in "The Irish Times" after this report appeared, wrote that if the young men disliked the words of the street preachers all they had need to do was to walk away and not listen. Kicking a Bible about the street may be an emotional release, but is not seemly treatment for those writings which, as the Roman Catholic faith holds "have God for their Author." Is this action evidence of "being steeped in Christianity?" Does Christianity not say "Turn the other cheek?"]

Revival! — or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT
"BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE

NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

		s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE ENDS OF THE EARTH

*"If I take the wings of the morning,
and dwell in the uttermost parts of the
sea. Even there shall Thy hand lead me."*

Just published:

Selections from the Scriptures in Arë-
Arë for the Arë-Arë, Koio, and Dorio
peoples.

This little book of 193 pages contains selected chapters and portions from the Old and New Testaments in the language of people of the Solomon Islands. It is the first issue of the Scriptures in these dialects. The Solomon Islands are off the N.E. coast of Australia.

Produced by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 11—LXVII.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	121
Archdeacon Hammond versus the Rev. H. A. Johnstone, S.J., on Unity	123
Editor's Chair	126
The Story of a Priest	128
Killaloe	129

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Lambeth Conference Report.

The Report of the Lambeth Conference published this week, is a volume of over 100,000 words. Perhaps the first impression that will strike most people is the wide range of subjects covered during the five and a half weeks of discussion. No fewer than 131 resolutions were adopted. Many of these dealt with Church Unity in relation to the Universal Church. It is evident that definite progress has been made here, and it is reported that many parts of the Anglican Communion are now in limited intercommunion with the South Indian Church, which is an amalgamation of episcopal and non-episcopal bodies. Evangelicals in the Church of England, however, will not join in the expressed hope of "the healing of the breach between ourselves and the Church of Rome." It cannot be affirmed too emphatically that while the Roman Church refuses to abandon the heretical doctrines of Transubstantiation, a Sacrificing Priesthood, the Worship of the Virgin Mary, and Salvation by Works, there can be no healing of the breach. Union with an unreformed Roman Church would not be union but surrender. One is glad to note, however, that the Report states that "no Anglican need entertain any doubt concerning the orthodoxy of the Faith of the resulting Churches." This is with direct reference to the proposals for a United Church of North India, Pakistan, and Ceylon, especially as provision is made for non-episcopally ordained ministers to celebrate Holy Communion in a United Church. If we mistake not, this proposal is far from gaining the assent of the Anglo-Catholic section of the Anglican Church. Many will question a claim that "there is now a larger measure of agreement on the formerly controversial subject of the Eucharistic Sacrifice." The employment of the words "Eucharistic Sacrifice," instead of the "Lord's Supper," is itself provocative.

—"The Christian," 29/9/'58.

* * *

Lambeth and The Bible.

The resolution of the Lambeth Conference on the Bible will, with one or two slight reservations, be welcomed by Evangelical Christians. The Conference affirmed its belief that the Bible discloses the truths about the revelation of God and Man which are the key to the world's predicament and is therefore deeply relevant to the modern world. Equally unambiguous was the affirmation that the Lord Jesus Christ is God's final Word to man, and that in His light all Holy Scripture must be seen and interpreted, the Old Testament in terms of Promise and the New Testament in terms of Fulfilment. It is in the relation of the Church to Scripture that there is one of the fundamental differences between Rome and the Reformed Churches. In regard to this the Conference is on the side of the Reformers in affirming that "Jesus Christ lives in His Church through the Holy Spirit according to His promise, and that the Church is therefore both guardian and interpreter of Holy Scripture; nevertheless the Church may teach nothing as 'necessary for eternal salvation but what may be concluded and proved by the Scripture'". The resolution acknowledged the debt to "the host of devoted scholars who, worshipping the God of truth (we are glad this distinction was emphasized) have enriched and deepened our understanding of the Bible." The Conference also welcomed every sign of the revival of Bible study within the common life of the Church, but called for the re-establishment of the habit of Bible-reading at home, and commended the practice of group study. It stressed the importance of evangelistic and expository preaching "by men who have experienced the power of the Gospel in their own lives." Welcome was also given to new translations of the Scriptures in many languages.—"The Christian," 5/9/'58.

[These two excerpts are, we think, worth special attention. The first has much to commend it, but the hope of healing "the breach with Rome" may in effect be the hope that Rome will reform its dogmas. That is a hope however tenuous that we ought not to give up. We regret the current use of the phrase "Eucharistic Sacrifice" because it is inevitably misunderstood, and for that reason alone ought to be discontinued.]

The second excerpt is close to what we have written elsewhere, and so we welcome it.]

* * *

Religious Communities in Israel.

According to the latest figures there are nearly 50,000 Christians in Israel to-day, 15,000 more than ten years ago. They belong to differing Churches and therefore to differing communities. A community is an ethnic and also a religious entity. It is described as "almost a little nation constituted as and moulded by a Church." Some of their supreme leaders are called Patriarchs. None of these has his seat in Israel but all are free to enter and leave the country at will, and to exercise there pastoral and other functions. The rulings of their courts are recognised by Israeli law. The most ancient Community is the Greek Orthodox headed by an archbishop. In close touch with this is the Russian Orthodox Mission, but the largest Christian Group in the country is the Greek Catholic Community, which is making considerable progress. In addition are the Menonite, Armenian, Coptic and Ethiopian Communities. Protestantism and Evangelical Groups are not strong comparatively but these are freely practising their faith. It is hoped that their witness will gradually make for support and success. In its Ministry for Religious Affairs there is a Government Department for Christian Communities. There are 50 Christian schools in the country with about 10,000 pupils. May continued and increasing freedom to preach and teach be granted!

—"The Christian," 8/8/'58.

* * *

KILLALOE.

Last month we printed some particulars of proceedings in Court arising out of an assault upon some lay-preachers in the town of Killaloe, Co. Clare, Eire. Since then the "Irish Times" has published in its columns many letters on the subject of freedom of speech under the Constitution of Eire. The Bishop of Limerick (Church of Ireland) the Rt. Revd. Dr. E. C. Hodges addressed the following charge to the clergyman of his diocese and it appeared in the "Irish Times."

"In this charge, I bring before you an important incident with serious and sinister implications. It is not the wisdom or the consideration of the would-be preacher; it is not the vigour or the brutality of the attackers which offers serious and sinister implications. These are matters of sportsmanship. It is the pronouncement of the district justice appointed by the Government, maintained from public funds, speaking in his official capacity, ignoring the injuries of citizens and defining the rights of freedom and protection belonging to those who profess a minority religion in the Republic.

Recent Events

Dr. Hodges said: The subject of this charge has been thrust upon me by recent events. An Irishman, a citizen of Limerick, within the past few months, has suffered damage to his person and his property, and more recently has received no redress from the official responsible for the administration of justice in the area concerned. According to the account in the public press, the individuals in question came to the village of Killaloe to hold a religious meeting on the steps of the church. The Bible which one of them held in his hand, was taken from him and given a couple of kicks down the street. After a conversation with the guards the young men went to their car, but the attackers got round by another street and intercepted them, and hit them with fists and sticks. One of them fell from a blow on the forehead and lost two teeth. He was unconscious for about twenty minutes, and kept spitting and vomiting blood. He had concussion.

No Penalty

The district justice, before whom the police inspector brought the case, inflicted no penalty on the attackers, expressed no criticism of their action, administered no rebuke, and gave no advice to desist from similar actions in future.

The question at issue is the right of the citizen to the protection of the law. The words spoken were not seditious or treasonable. Many members of the community will agree that street preaching is undesirable. Many will question the adequacy and accuracy of the preaching proposed. These are side issues. The main question is: Can the citizens of Ireland depend upon the protection of the law to preserve him from bodily harm if he expresses what are thought to be views unacceptable to the religious loyalties of persons who happen to be present in the public street when the words are used. Apparently not! He can be mobbed and battered with impunity by anyone who is "provoked" by the words used. Such at least is the ruling of the district justice involved.

Just As Before

He reacted according to precedent. Some time ago, also in the neighbourhood of Limerick, this same official did not rebuke ten or twelve men who attacked two men whose views had provoked them. In that case, the views were those of the Jehovah's Witnesses. In the present case, the provoking views were basically Christian.

The district justice stated that he had gone into the matter very deeply then, and he still held the same views as on the previous occasion. These views included the doctrine "that religion is above the courts, the main business of which is to preserve peace."

Neither clause seems applicable. Certainly, the absence of any penalty will not discourage similar breaches of the peace in future unless, indirectly, by the intimidation of free speech.

"Free For All"

As regards the first part of the pronouncement, it does not make sense unless religion means the Roman Catholic form of faith. Alternatively, the judge may mean that when religion of any kind is involved the courts must not interfere even to protect from bodily harm. It is an ecclesiastical "free for all." In a country where the Roman Catholic religion claims in the Republic about 95% of the population such an affray could only have one result unless some miraculous intervention took place—a possibility probably not envisaged by the district justice.

His second pronouncement was that the injured parties had provoked their assailants by foisting their views on them. But this is exactly what is done by the Legion of Mary—a branch of the Roman Catholic Church's propaganda—when it displays its books and pictures on hand-carts in the public street and moreover, invades the houses and homes of private citizens who are not members of that Church, thrusting their views in at the very doors and demanding access so that they may expound their particular form of Christianity.

Double Standard?

Has the district justice one law for one group and another law for another? Does justice depend upon the religious loyalty of the citizen? Can it be that the Church of Rome has one policy for England, another for Dublin, and yet another for Co. Clare.

The district justice's next remark is more serious—"the Constitution which guarantees freedom of religious worship." The Constitution guarantees something much more—recognition of the various branches of the Christian faith. Surely this involves the right of expression and of propagation? In Soviet Russia and in China, rumour states, that religious worship is allowed.

A similar situation, we are told, exists in Spain and in the more bigoted of the South American States. To worship behind closed doors is one thing; to be recognised as belonging to a Christian body whose right of faith is guaranteed is quite another. The right to move out of the

(Continued on p. 130.)

ARCHDEACON HAMMOND VERSUS THE REV. H. A. JOHNSTONE, S.J. ON UNITY.

I find myself in complete agreement with the position laid down by Father Johnstone as to the proper way to reach a solution of the disunity of Christendom. That does not mean, of course, that I am in agreement with Father Johnstone's position. He will be relieved to know that. He is quite safe, so far, from the inquisition of his superior in the Order. I find myself at the very outset both puzzled and disturbed by the chapters entitled "Witnesses for the Prosecution" and "Proof by Quotation," and I believe it is important to draw attention to the curious procedure therein adopted. The opening paragraph in "Witnesses for the Prosecution" fairly puzzled me. Here it is: "Most people will admit the fairness of the principle: 'Hear the other side.' An adjudicator does not give his decision when he has heard one side of a debate; the jury does not give its verdict when the case for the prosecution has been completed."

* * *

We ought to hear the other side. But I respectfully suggest to my hearers that it is best for them to hear the other side from Dr. Rumble and Father Johnstone and not from me. With native conceit, I claim that I do give the other side. Have I not quoted the Council of Trent, Thomas Aquinas, Bernadine of Sienna and even Pope Clement XIV on the Jesuits? But Father Johnstone would not be satisfied, least of all with the dictum of a Pope who was infallible in spots. He would contend earnestly that I had the misfortune to strike a fallible spot. I am afraid the metaphor is greatly in my favour. And so we come to the important distinction which the quotation ignores: the distinction between an advocate and a judge. I pay an advocate to present my case, but he tells the judge all about the other fellow's grievance. When I remonstrate he replies, "Most people will admit the fairness of the principle: 'Hear the other side'." I am afraid I could reply in the words of a famous historic character, "We are not amused." The joke would seem all the poorer if I lost my case. Father Johnstone contends that many who are unfavourably disposed towards what he regards as the Catholic Church "base their judgments entirely on the evidence of hostile witnesses."

* * *

He complains that in Canon Maynard's book "There is not a single Catholic author, nor even what might be called a neutral author." This opens the ball in rare fashion. I am to divide my authorities into hostile, neutral and favourable. I give both sides of a question by a judicious sprinkling of authorities. This has become such a common fallacy that Roman Catholic Apologists get away with it.

Look at the absurdity of it. Every man with a burning conviction becomes suspect. A certain type of Baptist becomes the best authority on the conflict between Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, and a Mohammedan can speak impartially on the vestarian controversy. Apart from the fact that an advocate is always at liberty to choose his own authorities, the underlying principle would make the colourless latitudinarian the best exemplar of sound judgments on matters that have divided the world. Do we get the rights and wrongs of the international quarrel when Moscow, Washington and London have spoken? The answer that a sensible man gives is that we may or we may not. If we can show that Berlin and Tokio are both governed by a wrong principle, it is true they present the other side, but it is the wrong side. What we have to look for is evidence, not emotional reactions. Where the evidence is established, the conclusion ought to be assured.

* * *

Father Johnstone has a different and I believe a fallacious method of valuing authorities. He complains that Canon Maynard gives a list of stock Anglican writers and controversialists. That surely is not an offence. What would you expect him to do? "But," says his critic, "There is nothing whatever to suggest—what is really true—that both the facts and the conclusions of several of these authors have been questioned by competent authority." This is a style of evaluation that would make any book worthless. You have only to make up an opposing competent authority and heigh-presto, all credit disappears.

That is not the way to meet a writer's objections. If his facts are wrong the facts should be stated and the point of departure from truth clearly indicated. A man may be wrong on nine facts and right on the tenth. If it is the tenth that is cited his nine errors do not in the least diminish his authority. A man may be wrong in details and yet right in the main. In such circumstances he is a competent witness notwithstanding the fact that critics have disparaged his work. Again the attitude of a writer does not invalidate his testimony. Denny's Papalism is described by Foakes-Jackson, so we are told, as "very hostile." There is an economy of quotation here that strikes the reader as surprising. We are given no reference which might enable us to locate two words in a voluminous record. But a hostile attitude, even a very hostile attitude, may be the result of close inquiry. The Germans could wipe out the whole testimony of the Bryce commission by describing it as "very hostile." They would be right, but the facts justify the attitude.

* * *

Then we have an amusing interlude. Dom Chapman replies to Bishop Gore. Not unnaturally Father Johnstone thinks that Gore does not appear quite as convincing when studied side by side with Dom Chapman. But the testimony he adduces provokes a smile. There is a simplicity about it that is not associated in the popular mind with Jesuitry. Father Johnstone writes: "Here, at any rate, is what one Anglican clergyman thought after reading both! 'When I had finished Dom John Chapman, I simply said to myself: 'Poor old Gore' Chapman has completely demolished every one of his arguments. He has not left him a leg to stand on.'" The funny thing is that a footnote informs us "He ended by becoming a Catholic, so I suppose that will discount his testimony." My hearers will wonder if this is an editorial note or if it were duly registered over the air. And here there is nothing to suggest that the conclusion of this author has been questioned. Father Johnstone takes his own medicine in very small doses. Father Johnstone makes capital out of the fact that reviewers of Anglo-Catholic writers point out that in some instances such writers (he instances Mr. Milner-White and Mr. Knox) are not quite free from prejudices that their own arguments would explode. Here is an instance in which he is caught in his own net.

* * *

Father Johnstone insists on telling us that "The Church Times" does not like Dr. Coulton. To adopt his own method of reply for a moment he does not tell us that Dr. Coulton returns the dislike with interest. Yet it is interesting to see how little reliance can be placed on extracts from journals supplied in scraps. Here is what "The Church Times" wrote about Dr. Coulton's controversy with Cardinal Gasquet: "His challenger is not an unimportant and irresponsible person; he is a scholar of real learning whose word on such a matter as this carries weight." (July 25th, 1921.) Dr. Coulton sums up rather neatly the consequences of following Father Johnstone's lead. He refers to "That consistent principle that Romanists have a right to regard nobody but the Romanist public and nothing but Romanist values." (Romanism and Truth p. 292.) Father Johnstone carries his principle or lack of principle so far that he makes personal attacks on the good faith of those who oppose the Christian presentation. Mr. Poynter is attacked with the assistance of "The Church Times" because "He has been a Roman, an Anglican . . . a Roman again and now he is a Rationalist." Hardly, says Father Johnstone, one would think, an author worthy of special recommendation. But were not Gardiner, Smith and Harding Romanists who became Anglicans and then became Romans again? Have they nothing of value to contribute? How many changes, assuming them to be all sincere, can be tolerated before a man's capacity to contribute useful matter to a controversy has been destroyed?

* * *

With reference to Professor J. B. Bury, who was an avowed agnostic, Father Johnstone allows himself to pen the calumnious line: "If I wanted to know the truth about the Jews should I go to Hitler?" It is not Hitler's hostility to the Jews that renders him an unsafe guide on Jewish matters; it is his proved mendacity. Of Bury, my friend, Rev. R. H. Murray, Litt. D., writes: "He was never oppressively serious, but it was impossible not to recognise his high standard of right, and his detestation of anything mean or base. He lived the life of a historian for the sake of truth and not for his own glorification." (The Papacy in The Nineteenth Century, p. LX). This is the man who is compared with Hitler. There is something radically wrong with the method which invites such a comparison.

* * *

Having treated us to long list of quotations and resting on "The Church Times" as pathetically as ever the Israelites leant on Pharaoh, the broken reed, Father Johnstone positively electrifies us by sententiously declaring: "Quotations of selected opinions then, may be a good way of confirming the reader in his settled convictions; it can hardly be regarded as the right method of enabling him to form an unbiased and useful judgment." Now if any of my hearers think I have misjudged Father Johnstone I appeal to his published work. I assert without fear of contradiction that Chapter I consists solely of an attempt by quotation to confirm Roman Catholics in their settled convictions. And it seems to me a very poor attempt at that. Chapter II is much more extravagant and runs on the same lines. Having complained that all the writers listed for further reading by Canon Maynard are hostile witnesses and therefore should not be heard, the actual quotations come next under review. Here is a strange sentence: "I must not seem to imply that none of the quotations given in this book is trustworthy. Lingard, for example, is referred to frequently, and Pastor occasionally, on points of fact. But whatever good such authors might have is ruined by the quotation of many others of quite a different type. A single line can put a drawing out of perspective, a single wrong note will spoil a harmony." So Father Johnstone wants us to paint his picture and play his tune.

* * *

Father Johnstone not unnaturally joins the army of detractors that assails Froude. But if a single line can put a drawing out of perspective, what are we to think of a controversialist who quotes the following statement, attributed to Professor A. F. Pollard (Froude's) History of England is an historical drama representing the triumph of the Reformation over the powers of darkness typified by Philip of Spain and the Pope of Rome, and Froude himself admits that the dramatic poet is not bound, when it is inconvenient to what may be called the "accidents of facts." At the same time this pleader for hearing both sides ignores the following testimony from the same writer: "The general modern histories, such as Lingard's and Froude's, are too well known to need further description, but it may be remarked that there is inadequate justification for the systematic detraction of Froude's History which has become the fashion. He held strong views, and he made some mistakes, but his mistakes were no greater than those of other historians, and there are not half a dozen histories in the English language which have been based on so exhaustive a survey of original materials" (Thomas Cranmer, p. VIII.)

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE PATHS OF LIFE.

One of the oldest views of the life of man, considered from the standpoint of conduct, is to picture it as the choice of one of two paths: the upward path, or the downward; the broad path or the narrow; the easy path to destruction or the hard path to safety. This view emphasises the human possibilities, and reminds us constantly of our own wills and their responsibilities. Ancient wisdom spoke of the easy descent to Avernus, and also gave us the familiar precept "per ardua ad astra." There is nothing new in the employment of this thought in Christian teaching. What is new is, we think, the far fuller sense of the right path, and of the assistance available to us in our effort to follow it.

* * *

Our Lord said "Follow Me" two simple words of inexhaustible meaning. We cannot set out their entire application, but we can illustrate them. We once followed a guide across the face of a rocky slope overhanging a deep lake. The guide, creeping forward, directed us to each hand-hold and foot-hold: it was completely safe provided that we did what we were told to do without hesitation or debate. To "trust and obey" removed all danger, and took away all uneasiness and tension. We felt as secure above the precipice as on level ground. In the spiritual onward march there will be awkward places, dangerous turns, insecure surfaces—"follow Me" is Christ's command, and if we obey the goal will be safely reached.

Suppose the path of life is not dangerous in the usual sense: that the temptations are not specially strong or in any way remarkable: that the enemies of the soul are not very alluring—the path may be merely uphill, monotonously rough, and mostly drudgery—in short, the sort of path through life most people must follow: what then? Can we be content to accept the verdict of Henry David Thoreau that "most men lead lives of quiet desperation"? Does that verdict not pin-point the sin that easily besets most of us—the sin of losing hope and surrendering to deadly routine? Plodding perseverance may get us to the end of the road, but it is worthwhile to remember that Our Lord had an observant eye for the things of earth, and could note those joys of God's creation which are ends in themselves, and at the same time enrich and cheer us. "Consider the lilies of the field": "Behold the birds of the heaven." Lessons may indeed be drawn from them, but they can remind us of the miracle of life in all its forms and of Him who "hath made everything beautiful in its time" (Eccl. 3. 11).

The sins which tempt the life of routine, of unavoidable toil, of struggle in adverse circumstance, are not the glittering sins of the senses, but the sins which dishearten. Losing the vision of God is a possibility if we lose the sense of serving Him. How well George Herbert understood this when he wrote in his hymn—

"All may of Thee partake;
"Nothing can be so mean,
"Which with this tincture 'for Thy sake,'
"Will not grow bright and clean."
"A servant with this clause
"Makes drudgery divine,
"Who sweeps a room, as for Thy laws,
"Makes that and the action fine."

* * *

The paths of life then are either Godward, or must end in sheer negation—the unending blank of blind purposeless existence. With Christ as Lord and Master, as Friend and Leader, all dangers may be overcome and all difficulties surmounted. Without Christ we can only lose ourselves in darkness, surrender to despair, or fool ourselves that defiance will accomplish anything.

* * *

St. Paul devoted a good deal of attention to the paths of life in the epistle to the Church in Ephesus. He described the course followed by his readers before their enlightenment and rebirth through the Holy Spirit—"You did He quicken when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins, wherein aforetime ye walked according to the course of this world according to the prince of the power of the air, of the spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience; amongst whom we also all once lived in the lusts of our flesh, doing the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath even as the rest."

That is a faithful picture of the followers of the downhill path; that path which is broad because so many errant feet have walked its verges down. But some were recalled to the true path and to the infallible Guide upon it.

"But God, being rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses and sins quickened us together with Christ, and raised us up with Him."

* * *

If St. Paul describes the former path we followed, and our recall to the right one, he also describes our progress upon it and the conditions of successful accomplishment.

1. "We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them." No Christian can despise or neglect good works, otherwise the claim to be Christ's follower is falsified, and the Gospel teaching flouted. Good works are not the means of salvation but are the fruits of faith.

2. "I beseech you to walk worthily of the calling wherewith ye were called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love." To walk worthily is to illustrate our vocation with the proper qualities. Self-respect does not rule out meekness or forbearance. We need no aggressiveness to advertise our self-respect, and the Christian will proceed on his path with a constant desire to be a help to others who are on the same road.

* * *

3. "This I say . . . That ye no longer walk as the gentiles also walk, in the vanity of their mind, being darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardening of their heart." These words may be a reprimand to all who try to let the profession of the Gospel mean as little to them as possible, to all who suppose that the name "Christian" must convey to them all spiritual and eternal realities. But they may be a rebuke to intellectual conceit, to learned ignorance, to the self-sufficiency which makes man "the measure of all things." "Vanity" is the error of those who think that man can always handle the situation. To abandon a false religion for no religion is not the wisest course—for what we loosely call "a false religion" is not likely to be totally false (e.g. Islam or Buddhism), and the good in it maintains a standard, whereas the negatives of "no religion" will, in a generation or less, produce a being who having lost the way to God, has lost the sense of being truly man. He has severed the family ties of humanity and turned the truth of God ("our Father") into a lie.

* * *

4. "Be imitators of God as beloved children; and walk in love, even as Christ loved us." In contrast with what has gone before; in opposition to the vanity or emptiness of soul which makes men indifferent to suffering and the miseries of life, and even morbidly ready to intensify them, the Apostle sets before us the noblest and happiest of ideals for our pilgrimage—"walk in love"—this is not sentiment but solidarity; the realisation of the common lot, of brotherhood. But it is not merely for common advantage, but it is compassion—fellow-feeling. It is well illustrated by two passages in the Bible—in Ezekiel we read that the prophet went to his fellow-countrymen in their captivity in Babylon, and he says "I sat where they sat" (Ez. 2. 15). Only thus could Ezekiel understand what it meant to be a captive in a heathen land; only by sharing the exiles' experiences could the prophet feel for them. The other passage is in the epistle to the Hebrews (13. 3), the request "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them." It is not difficult to remember with pity the misfortunes of others, and behind our pity may be a strain of self-congratulation that their lot is not our lot. To remember "as bound with them" translates our pity from mere benevolence into genuine sharing. That is what "walking in love" means for ourselves and our fellow-travellers.

* * *

5. "Walk as children of light." The sons of light are those of the light of truth. In the epistle to the Hebrews the experience of conversion to the Christian faith is called "illumination" (Heb. 10. 32). Truth has dawned on the believer, and darkness, the condition of error and ignorance, has gone away. We are to live and travel in the light of all the truth. We can practise no economies with the lessons of God, and have no right to choose spiritual twilight instead of the noonday blaze of the Son of Righteousness. For the Christian, even at eventide, it shall be light, for the Light of the World is with us.

* * *

6. "Look carefully how ye walk, not as unwise, but as wise; redeeming the time, because the days are evil." "To redeem the time" may be a puzzling phrase, but it is "buying up the opportunity." Plainly, that means to neglect no opportunity of Christian service, and witness, and to behave prudently in doing so. We may well recall the fact that very often "actions speak louder than words," and the good Samaritan was not content with audible regrets and censure of the highwaymen—he wasted no time, and by prompt action redeemed the hours of distress which, if he had not been there, must have ended in death.

* * *

7. "Walk worthily of the Lord."

"As ye received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk in Him."

"Walk in wisdom towards them that are without" (i.e. outside the Christian flock).

"Walk in newness of life." These four precepts, the first three from the epistle to the Colossians, and the fourth from Romans, may fitly sum up what we try to say about the paths of life. Add to them the discovery "all the paths of the Lord are loving kindness and truth unto such as keep His covenant" (Ps. 25).

THE STORY OF A PRIEST. THE REV. JOHN ARRIEN.

The Rev. John Arrien was born about sixty years ago in the Biscayan province of Spain. We do not hear much about the spiritual affairs of Spain to-day, beyond the well-authenticated reports which reach us from time to time of the hindrances put in the way of evangelical witness. Sixty years ago we suppose it was not easy to foster any sort of Protestant faith in most parts of that very large country, though we believe that round Barcelona and in Madrid there was a good deal of active evangelical religion.

John Arrien grew up as a devout child with an early interest in pious matters. He probably had access to Roman Catholic devotional books for he was much attracted by the lives of the Saints, which are mostly edifying stories in which miraculous elements have a large place. Like vast numbers of boys in the Roman Catholic world he became "an altar boy," i.e. a server or acolyte. Thus brought into close contact with the sacraments and ceremonies of the Church, he developed a natural tendency to look forward to the fulfilment of his "vocation" in a convent or monastery. We have often heard good young men refer to the monastic life as "the 'number one way' to Heaven." It is by being persuaded that this is so that young men join religious orders. The ascetic system appears to be the great defence against the world, the flesh and the devil. We have no right to deny that many find the community life a useful one, but it appears from time to time that some do not, and we are inclined to think that the Orders which are engaged in active public duties are better suited to most people than the others. Teaching, tending the sick, and similar occupations provide a useful way of life for large numbers. But of course no system can ensure peace of mind and genuine spiritual contentment. The realities of the Christian faith and life cannot be mediated to us through organisations—they require the vivifying experience of the Holy Spirit—like the wind that blows where it lists.

This young man tried by every course he knew to attain spiritual renewal and control, but was never at peace within—"something evaded the heroism of my will." Four years were passed in making ready for the novitiate. They corresponded to our grammar school, or secondary school training. There followed the novitiate and then the solemn profession as a member of the Order. Then there was what corresponds to the undergraduate course in Arts (or as they call it in the seminaries "philosophy"). After that there was the long course of theological study, and the conferring of the various minor forms of clerical status. Later there was the diaconate, and at length the priesthood, in 1921. This ordination took place in Segovia on 21st May.

Fr. Arrien had longed for the joy and peace of soul promised as the reward of pursuing spiritual perfection in the monastic state. He believed with all the idealism of youth that the upward climb to the city of God would be an experience of spiritual victories and of the happiness of conquest. Instead, he found too often the darkness of despondency.

In spite of the high expectations and the spiritual exaltation implicit in the theory of the Conventual habit, and the imposition of the various Holy Orders, it must happen that the sense of vocation to the Service of God in that particular way rests dissatisfied. Inner peace is not always found, and greater perseverance in the appointed observances does not bring nearer to the desired haven: rather, the goal eludes the seeker. Fr. Arrien says that he travelled these roads of supposed spiritual progress with energy and sincerity. "What I did, I did with all my might." Still, he found that he did not reach the state of holiness the recommended spiritual observances were expected to give. Some rigorists may say it was due to failure in himself, and that innumerable souls have succeeded where he did not succeed. The answer is that he did his best, and was disappointed—"If holiness were a building built brick by brick, heroic acts being the material for construction, my soul would be a Basilica capable of housing the God of my aspirations." Holiness is not like that however; it is allied to justifying and saving faith, and is the gift of God through the Holy Spirit. We must look to the Holy Spirit, not to duties and ascetic exercises to confer it.

Fr. Arrien at length ministered in churches in England, and in 1929 went to North America. He taught in a Seminary in California, and later worked in parishes in the South Western States where many are Spanish-speaking Mexicans in the main.

At length, feeling that his work was useless he retired from the priesthood, or ceased to exercise it. Shortly after, in the providence of God he entered upon a personal experience of the redeeming power of Christ. Then at last he realised that the path he had been trying to follow could never give him the conquest of the mystical ideal he sought. He found that we have to live with faith to obtain more faith, and that the only faith which truly satisfies is the faith which is surrender to God in Jesus Christ.

"After I went over the Scriptures, I felt something that was Spirit and Truth; something omnipotent that invaded my soul to materialise the longings of my childhood and I felt the warmth of the justice and peace that embraced me. Christ stretched out his hands on the Cross; one reached the Father and the other reached out to me and to you and reconciled us to the Father: "He is our Peace," Eph. 2: 14. When I accepted that peace the sluices of heaven opened and showers of blessings are falling on me ever since."

The date of this realisation of new life was 1945. Since then Mr. Arrien has travelled as an evangelist far and wide in U.S.A. and Canada. He spent much time preaching in South America and Cuba. The fact that Spanish is his native tongue makes him specially suitable for that sort of mission work.

In North America many men like Mr. Arrien are engaged in similar work, having passed through the same experience. We hope that their ministry will be remembered in prayer by all who know of it.

(Based on an article in the "Churchman's Magazine," 1958).

KILLALOE.

We have given our readers a great deal about the trouble in Killaloe; in fact, this issue is largely occupied with the affair. We believe that the Bishop of Limerick has given us a forthright and necessary warning that our right, legal and moral and constitutional, are not just "liberty of worship" (which Protestants in Spain have) but liberty of speech. None is compelled to listen, but any man has the right to declare "all the counsel of God." Further, we will not deny the right of public utterance to those we disagree with. If our present government were to try to prevent free speech on the part of opposition groups every honest man would be outraged (we need not worry over the possibility for the party in office is a democratic one); why should honest men not be outraged when free speech in a non-political matter is met by violence?

We have given a paragraph which summarises a statement of Fr. Burke Savage. We acknowledge his timely words of regret over the Killaloe outrage. It was scarcely necessary to emphasise that Irish Protestants are the children of the persecutors of Irish Roman Catholics, for Irish Protestants, the vast majority at all events, are very ordinary people, farmers, shopkeepers, professional men—no different from anybody else, and no grander. It is a long long time since Cromwell (three centuries), and we must not keep on reiterating these long dead grievances.

It may interest readers to know that in the past fortnight attempts were made to set fire to two Protestant churches in the suburbs of Dublin, in Sandford and Ranelagh. The attempt in Sandford was recorded in the Dublin "Evening Press," and the other in one of the daily papers. A week or two ago an open-air religious meeting in Dublin (a long established custom) was prevented by some young men. The promoters of the meeting were plain evangelical Christians, not Witnesses or Mormons or such-like.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 123.

church building and to speak, to expound, to teach, to train, and to develop—these are the privileges contained in recognition.

"Rod Of The People"

The final statement in the paragraph dealing with the district justice's views is the most amazing. This expression of their views by non-Roman Catholics is bound to draw down "the rod of the people whose hospitality they have received."

What does the district justice mean? Does he imply that non-Roman Catholics are only guests in this country? Does he say that those who have done as much and more for this country as any other group of citizens (and without reward), are only to live here on sufferance, behind closed doors, with shut mouths, and silenced pen? Are the great names of Protestants in Irish history to be expunged from the roll of honour and dubbed "useful visitors?"

In Strange Contrast

The district justice's remarks are in strange contrast to those of His Holiness the Pope and of political leaders. These authorities have frequently expressed the policy of "live and let live" as being part of Christian teaching. True living involves freedom of speech as well as freedom to breathe.

This word "freedom" is more often used in Ireland and of Ireland than in any other connection. Public speeches invariably include some reference to the servitude of the past and to the freedom of the present in the Republic of Ireland. If the district justice is correct, the word "freedom" must be used in a technical and restricted sense.

The trial at Killaloe was remarkable also for the speech made by the solicitor defending the attackers. Such phrases as "vending Christianity," "foisting their special brand of Christianity," "pseudo-evangelists," "canting humbugs," are hardly in the best legal or Christian tradition. However, the solicitor was acting on behalf of his clients and his language need not necessarily reveal his character or capacity. He was making an ad hoc or business speech.

Another Case

By a curious coincidence, the same paper contained an account of a trial in another court of justice. The scene changes from "holy" Ireland to "pagan" England. The clash is between colour, not creeds; the attackers are youths between 17 and 20; not "respectable farmers," as in Killaloe; the attackers are in a minority, though armed with weapons; the attacked are in a great majority. The voice of the judge rings out with Christian clarity—"as far as the law is concerned, you are entitled to think what you like, to feel what you like, to say what you like, provided you do not infringe the rights of others and imperil the Queen's peace. But once you translate your dark thoughts and brutal feelings into savage acts, the law will be swift to punish you and to protect your victim."

In the London court there is an atmosphere of sportsmanship and commonsense justice which at once gives confidence and satisfaction.

Sinister Implications

In this charge, my brethren, I bring before you an important incident with serious and sinister implications. It is not the wisdom or the consideration of the would-be preacher; it is not the vigour or the brutality of the attackers which offer serious and sinister implications. These are matters of sportsmanship. It is the pronouncement of the district justice appointed by the Government, maintained from public funds, speaking in his official capacity, ignoring the injuries of citizens and defining the rights of freedom and protection belonging to those who profess a minority religion in the Republic.

Small wonder if this incident in a remote village will in many larger and more influential circles suggest the creaking of the ecclesiastical Iron Curtain closing down on thought and speech and action. Small wonder if freedom loving people everywhere, and not least in northern latitudes, will determine to keep the curtain up and the fresh air in and will listen with a doubting ear to the speeches promising this "freedom" in a united Ireland.

Threefold Reaction

The reaction of ourselves, my brethren, and those whom we represent must be threefold.

(1) A sense of thankfulness and pride in the freedom to think and speak and act at least within our Communion. Our differences are often disappointing yet they are a precious sign of life.

(2) A realisation that in matters even remotely connected with difference in religious belief a member of the non-Roman Catholic Church cannot be certain of justice. Our churches are protected, our schools are assisted, but ourselves must conform to the "tempo" of the majority if our persons and property are to be preserved in peace.

(3) A determination that the goodwill and friendliness which exists between us and our neighbours, not of our form of faith, shall be maintained by our Church to the uttermost; that no miscarriage of justice, no outbreak of religious zeal will break our faith in the innate kindness of the Irish people; that we shall continue to make our contribution as far as our power and their permission allow, to the well-being of the country which belongs exclusively to no particular class or creed.

It is well to remember that the Christian faith was born in a background of opposition and persecution. Persecuted it is at its best; prosperous it is at its worst. Cushioned Christianity is a poor substitute for the faith of the Cross.

—"Irish Times," 30-9-1958.

* * *

A Word On Behalf of Goodwill.

The following paragraphs from a reported lecture by the Rev. R. Burke-Savage, S.J. show that the conduct of the aggressors at Killaloe is deplored by this eminent Jesuit, and no doubt by many of his co-religionists. Fr. Burke-Savage said:—

It was time the Irish people built into their ideal of patriotism the spiritual aspirations of a Catholic people. Only thus could we develop the energy of the single-minded.

"In saying this I am not unmindful of our fellow-citizens who do not share our faith. If they consider the matter dispassionately they will discover for themselves that the more Catholic-minded we are, the better fellow-citizens we will become. They have nothing to fear: the deeper our grasp of the supernatural principles of our belief, the more radiant will be our all-embracing charity."

Father Burke-Savage went on: "It is with sorrow that I have watched in recent years a growing readiness on the part of some to seize on occasional, isolated incidents, and, from the evidence of these incidents, to draw sweeping generalisations about the attitude of Catholics to Protestants in Ireland:

"As a priest I deplore the use of fisticuffs in religious differences because it means that emotion has got the better of reason. But emotion can also get the better of reason when men take up their pens in controversy. Mature men try not to allow a wave of emotional sympathy with individuals who may have had a raw deal so to upset their judgment that they lose all sense of proportion. Human nature being what it is, it is inevitable in the light of our unhappy history, that, on occasion, hurt feelings lead to hasty action. The wonder, surely, is not that there have been incidents but that they have been mercifully few. And, when you come to think of it calmly, is there any example in history of a people so severely persecuted over centuries who on regaining their independence, have treated the children of their persecutors with more magnanimity?"

—"Irish Times," 6/10/58.

Council of Association of Civil Liberties.

This Council issued the following letter to the Press—

Sir,—Immediately after the Killaloe case we wrote to the Minister for Justice expressing our deep concern at the conduct of the district justice. We stated that we regarded it "as calculated to cause serious harm to the reputation of the Republic abroad and also as affording extremely valuable material for the opponents of Irish union." For these reasons we urged the Government to lessen the damage District Justice Hurley had done by publicly repudiating his statement with the utmost speed and stating the true position under the Constitution.

We have received a formal acknowledgment, but have not yet had any response to our request. As the matter is one of grave urgency, we feel it is our duty to make our protest public.

The Council of this association consider that the pronouncements of the district justice, as reported, are a violation of the Constitution and run contrary to a principle fundamental to Irish nationality from the days of the United Irishmen to the Proclamation of 1916.

The Minister may be waiting for the Dail to reassemble before making his statement. We are asking the Minister to meet, in the meantime, a deputation from this association. Is it too much to hope that the Taoiseach himself may take appropriate action to allay the apprehension felt by many citizens and to repair the damage done to Ireland's good name?—Yours, etc.,

Roger McHugh, President.

Edgar M. Deale, Hon. Secretary.

Sybil Le Brocq, Hon. Treasurer.

R. M. Bell.

Castlemaine.

C. J. Gore-Grimes.

Rosamund Jacob.

Patrick Lynch.

Dorothy Macardle.

T. W. Moody.

John Murtagh.

Sean O Faolain.

W. Bedell Stanford.

Bethel Solomons.

Irish Association of Civil Liberty, Dublin.
October 1st, 1958.

—"Irish Times," 3/10/58.

* * *

KILLALOE.

In addition to the statements above the Methodist Council on Social Welfare sent a letter to the newspapers affirming the right to carry on open-air preaching as a normal practice—the following is part of the statement—

"Normal Procedure"

"Christians, in all times and places, have engaged in open-air preaching as a normal procedure. It is merely incidental that the present scene is Irish and, as a rule, largely Roman Catholic. It is quite normal and natural for members of Reformed Churches to express their religious views in this open way in Ireland.

"As the Methodist Church, with over 200 years' tradition in this work, has many times seen its servants attacked by both Protestant and Roman Catholic crowds and brought before hostile magistrates, we have some reason to feel sympathy with the young evangelists who exalted Christ on this occasion, and some right to plead that they receive the protection of law.

"To those who feel outraged by street preaching it must be pointed out that the Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England use this means. In England and Wales, the Roman Catholics may perhaps number 8% of the population, many of them being of Austrian, Irish, Italian, and Polish origin. Yet, there is an open campaign to win an immediate million converts and restore 'Our Lady's Dowry.' Literature of the C.T.S. is sold and people are canvassed from door to door. Thousands of our Irish emigrants can testify with wonder that many Roman Catholic agencies are preaching controversially in Hyde Park, Birmingham, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and, indeed, areas where Roman Catholic residents are few. In the U.S.A., in southern areas almost entirely Protestant, the Paulist Fathers are pressing open-air missionary work. They put their case. Sometimes people listen, sometimes they go away. These Roman Catholic preachers feel free to offer what they regard as valuable to the people, and are using the methods of St. Francis of Assisi and St. Francis Xavier. With much of their teaching their hearers do not agree, but their liberty to speak remains.

"Evangelical Christians have always made special use of the method of outdoor preaching, seeking men where ever they were. Their acts are patterned on those of the Apostles, who proclaimed the only Saviour of the world in the streets of the capital city and remote villages. Where did the Apostles learn this disorderly and unruly form of Christianity? From One who, on a mountain, from a boat, by a well, in the street, looked with compassion on His beloved land, and desired all the sons of men to turn and find life in Him.

—"Irish Times," 6/10/58.

Revival! — or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT
"BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE
NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

INDIA

One of India's most ancient languages in a new dress.

Just issued

The New Testament and Psalms in roman Tamil

Much of the illiteracy in India is owing to the complications of the native scripts. Without any change in the Spoken language the introduction of this easier type prepares the way for progress to literacy.

Published by

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Contributions toward the cost of this production will be much appreciated.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 12—LXVII.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1958.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,
5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

Passing Events	133
"There is born to you this day a Saviour"				134
A Question on the One True Church			135
Editor's Chair		138
Index	143

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

How Protestant is Ulster?

Under this title a Northern Ireland paper ("Ulster Protestant") published recently a article by the Rev. F. O. Gardner who has been a Congregational Minister in Belfast.

Mr. Gardner urges his readers to see the danger of drifting and spiritual indifference, and points to the Protestant situation in Eire as a warning. To illustrate this he refers to figures given for the Church of Ireland population of certain central parishes in the city of Dublin—in thirteen parishes the population had fallen from 29,000 in 1918 to 4,000 in 1956. We think he ought to have recognised that in all cities the central areas tend more and more to be depopulated. The Roman Catholic population of the central parts of Dublin has shrunk greatly. The cause of city decline is the movement of population to vast new suburbs.

Forty years ago Dublin was ringed by a circle of small desolate villages, each with a handful of Protestants. To-day, without exception, those villages are centres of great suburbs, and each Protestant Church has a very substantial congregation of young families.

The real decline of Eire Protestantism is in rural areas, and there it is serious. Ulster Protestants should be determined to remain on the land as their fathers did.

In Northern Ireland the Protestant population is 65 per cent, tending to be concentrated in the areas within fifty miles of Belfast.

Last census figures which are quoted by Mr. Gardner for the six counties of Northern Ireland are—Roman Catholic, 471,400; Presbyterian, 410,200; Church of Ireland, 353,200; Methodist, 74,900; Brethren, 18,000; Baptist, 12,000; Congregationalist, 9,300; Unitarian, 6,200.

In addition to these, there are groups representing modern American sects and some others.

Mr. Gardner wisely emphasises that the problems we ought to face are not those of ministeries and organisation, but materialism. "Christians of all denominations should be on their guard against this greatest of all perils of our century."

"We have four enemies within our own ranks: fear, indifference, compromise, ignorance."

"We are all in for a rude awakening if we do not bestir ourselves, appraise the situation, take careful and co-ordinated action, stand firm and together and sound the clarion call for the preservation of our faith and our democratic way of life."

* * *

The Giant.

Many long years ago, before two great wars had laid their blight upon the world, Mr. H. G. Wells wrote a book called if I am remembering rightly—"The Sleeper Awakes." Now I am reminded of that by seeing an article which bears the title "Brazil: Awakening Giant."

Just now, much is being read and written about Brazil, so much that it is impossible to read it all. But just as a boy's reflecting glass may show you heaven and earth on a small scale, so an essay may give you the concentrated essence of many books. Let us see what we can see in this essay.

Brazil is said to be the most interesting of the Latin American family of nations. It is the fourth largest country in the world, and in area is greater than the continental United States. It is a land of immense forests and great rivers, the greatest of all being, of course, the Amazon. The Rio Negro, a tributary of the Amazon, at a spot fourteen hundred miles from the sea, is yet wider than the English Channel at Dover, for it is twenty-six miles across. In the twenties the population of Brazil was reckoned to be about twenty-five millions, now it is reckoned to be about sixty millions. The death-rate is low. The author once asked a woman how many children she had and she answered, "Eleven, six living in heaven and five dying on earth." It is good to know that these days are gone. The most rapidly growing city in the world is said to be Sao Paulo. There they tell you with pride that a new house is completed every three quarters of an hour. Brazil has had a peaceful development, free from the revolutions which plague other latin American countries. Even the break from Portugal was without bloodshed and Brazil still speaks Portuguese.

The dominant Church is Roman Catholic, but educated and progressive people are being widely alienated from the Church, and as in France this usually means a drift into secularism.

Protestantism is very rapidly growing in the country. It is not only Protestants who say this, but competent and serious Roman Catholic writers. Protestantism was introduced to Brazil about a century ago by British and American missionaries and their efforts were augmented by the coming of large numbers of Protestant immigrants. In Brazil, Protestants are usually called Evangelicals, and when this writer began to study the religious situation more than thirty years ago there were about a quarter of a million Evangelicals. Now there are about five millions. Indeed it is said that the Evangelicals are doubling their numbers about every eighteen years. What the future trend of religion will be no one can say. Defections from the dominant Church will probably continue.

—From "The Bulwark," November, 1958.

* * *

The Pre-marriage Pact—A Canadian View-point.

A most important question rises in the minds of many Protestants is that of the validity or force of the agreement which the Roman Church compels the Protestant partner in a "mixed" marriage to sign before the ceremony. This agreement demands that any children of the marriage be brought up as Roman Catholics and that no impediment be placed in the way of the Roman Catholic partner in fulfilling his or her religious duties. There is also the additional requirement that the R.C. party shall use every means of persuasion to convert the Protestant partner.

This is a serious question and in Toronto some months ago it was aggravated by the "Daily Star" in its question and answer column stating that this pact was binding, and presumably of-

(Continued on p. 141.)

"THERE IS BORN TO YOU THIS DAY A SAVIOUR."

Here we have a proclamation from Heaven. It was made close on two thousand years ago to the Shepherds of Bethlehem, the city of David. They fed their flocks on stony pastures, and guarded them just as David had guarded Jesse's flock a thousand years before in the same place. Now they heard at last of the Advent of "great David's greater Son." The passage of time has never dimmed the radiance of that event. We can picture the scene—the frosty star-lit sky; the chilly wind; the shepherds, now drowsy, now grumbling, now a little overcome by the silence and solemnity of night. Then came the supernatural experience—the skies lit up with a glory before which Aurora pales to insignificance, the glory of the Lord; and among them stood God's messenger and in their ears sounded God's message "Be not afraid; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people: for there is born to you in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

You and I, reader, can face all the changes and chances of this mortal life and be not afraid, if we realise our personal interest in the best of all tidings, that we have a Saviour, the Lord's Anointed One: His beloved Son in Whom He is well-pleased. St. Paul began his preaching with the words "we bring you good tidings of the promise made unto the fathers, how that God hath fulfilled the same . . ." Here is assurance and reassurance: here is the message, that as the glory of God transformed for a moment the heavens and earth where the Shepherds were, and overcame the darkness of night so now the new light of the Incarnate Word is ours to dispel spiritual error, to display sin's true nature, and to guide our feet into the way of peace.

"Great joy" was promised, and through the centuries the people of God have been receiving it. It has been poured into countless hearts which otherwise would have yielded to suffering or despair. The presence of the living Christ our Emmanuel, has made all the difference between drifting through life in self-pity or futility, and facing the natural problems and difficulties (which few escape) in quiet perseverance and humble courage. The same presence, in others, has taught the strong to be pitiful, the hasty to be patient, the successful to be stewards, the proud to be modest, the callous to love their neighbours as themselves.

The joy of Christ's presence is indeed a discovery each of us has to make for himself: hearsay is necessary, for "how shall they hear without a preacher?" (Rom. 10), but hearsay, and other men's faith may challenge and encourage us, but cannot be a substitute before God for the want of personal fellowship—"He came unto His own, and they that were His own received Him not. But as many as received Him, to them gave He the right to become children of God, even to them that believe in His Name: which were born . . . of God" (John 1). Let it be recollected that the shepherds said one to another, "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing that is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us" (Luke 2): they were not doubters, for they accepted that God had communicated to them the fact of Christ's Nativity, but they went to pay homage to the infant Jesus. The people of God do not simply hear the glad tidings and acquiesce in them—they realise that they must respond actively and thankfully and whole-heartedly.

We meet, in our daily round, many of our fellow-men and women whose attitude to our Redeemer is one of mere casual goodwill. We meet others who follow a conventional ecclesiastical observance. They are good people, but the glory of the Lord has not shone about them, and they have not gone in heart and mind and imagination to Bethlehem. If we do not meet Christ in personal fellowship as He humbled Himself in His incarnate life, and became obedient unto death for us, we will never say, as His two disciples did where He met them in His risen power "was not our heart burning within us while He spake to us in the way?"

The shadows deepen around our world, and nuclear power speaks more of total ruin than of the arts of peace. The time is very late, and the prospect grim indeed, and we refuse to acknowledge the power and the glory that might be ours if we took to ourselves the full truth, that once "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." How can we go on pretending to ourselves, or persuading ourselves that no utterly stupendous, unprecedented, and unique event took place in Nazareth when "the Angel Gabriel was sent from God into a city of Galilee named Nazareth to a virgin betrothed to a man, whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary"? The Annunciation and the Incarnation and the Nativity are a single Divine event which (as was intended) has changed the course of human history, recast all human values, restored the image of God in man, and pledged to us the gift of eternal life in Christ.

If this world recognised itself to be the sphere of God's redemptive work: if men would face the truth that they are both responsible, and accountable, and that the One with whom our reckoning is (Heb. 4. 13, Gr.) is the God of eternal truth and changelessness, the lesson of Bethlehem which tells of the Father's love and the Son's obedience would count for something, and that something would be our salvation. We would abandon the hates, the cruelties, the self-will which make of men, the petty Satans who say with Milton's Lucifer "Evil, be thou my good." If we can envisage a transformed race in which good has control, and love is the mainspring of all conduct, and happiness is realised, we ought to be able to yield to God's terms which alone can make its fulfilment sure. May we all try harder to walk in the light that first shone on the hills of Judah; may the angel voices sound even clearer in teaching us to praise God for the gift of His Son—

"Of the Father's love begotten,
 "Ere the worlds began to be,
 "He is Alpha, He is Omega,
 "He the source, the ending He,
 "Of all things that are, that have been,
 "And that future years shall see."

A QUESTION ON THE ONE TRUE CHURCH.

By Archdeacon T. C. Hammond

I have received a question which says: "Will you explain as simply as you can the Protestant answer to the statement, 'Our Lord founded only one Church and the Church must be the Roman Catholic Church.' I will do my best.

Protestants believe that our Lord founded a Church. Some deny that, but I am not speaking about them. Protestants believe that when our Lord chose twelve Apostles, the twelve with our Lord as their Head and Leader formed the first Christian Church. We must get away from the idea that the Church is a stone building used for purposes of worship. We must get away from the idea that the Church is a body of bishops and priests. The Church that our Lord founded and of which the Apostles were the first members was a company of men who under His command followed Christ. Every true follower of our Lord Jesus Christ was a member of His Church now. The word for Church in the New Testament and in the Greek version of the Old Testament is "ecclesia." It means a company of people called out for a particular purpose. If you look up Acts XIX, verses 32 and 41, you find that the crowd collected by Demetrius in Ephesus is called "the assembly." The word here is the same as the word translated Church. We have confined the word Church to those who are called out to serve God and our Lord Jesus Christ for the sake of convenience but we must not lose sight of its real meaning. When we say our Lord founded a Church we mean that our Lord called a number of people to follow Him and receive His teaching. The simpler we keep the early idea the better we can understand our Lord's work.

So we agree that our Lord founded one Church. We mean by that that our Lord invited people to follow Him and make Him Lord of their lives. Of course if the Church means those who follow the Lord, it must be a collection of people for one purpose and so be one Church. But did they all agree among themselves? You might think they all would. You might say, "These people had the example of our Lord and moreover they could refer any question to Him. His example would be enough to prevent envy and jealousy from arising and His word would keep them right in all questions. They could not be divided." Well! you can say that if you like but the facts are against you. They did not refer everything to our Lord. Also at times they quite misunderstood what He meant when He spoke to them. And in spite of His example they fought like Kilkenny cats. Over and over again we read, "There was a strife among the Apostles." That is the fact. Our Lord founded one Church and the members of it in the very early days fought among themselves. They fought over who should be the greatest. That is a cause of conflict that has come down through the ages. So there we are. Our Lord founded one Church and almost at once its members divided into parties and little petty jealousies sprang up. They had as little or as good a right as any modern Christian to sing. "We are not divided, all one body we." Now it seems to me that the question implies that if our Lord founded one Church there could not be divisions in it. If that is a correct interpretation of the meaning, the whole history of Christendom proves that it is false.

We can go a little further. The idea grew up in the minds of the apostles that anyone who did not belong to their company could not possibly be a Christian. They seemed to have proposed to themselves the notion, "Our Lord called us, to be His Church; anyone therefore that is not in our crowd cannot belong to the Lord." It was a very natural idea, as the question with which I am dealing shows. How did our Lord treat in practice the notion that all His followers must be in one company and, as it were, take their orders from a little select committee? Let us look at the story. I am quoting from the Douay Testament. If you care to look it up you will find the passage in Mark IX, 37 38, 39, and you find the same story repeated in Luke IX, 49 and following verses. Here it is: "John answered Him saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy Name, who followeth not us and we forbade him. But Jesus said, Do not forbid him. For there is no man that doth a miracle in my Name, and can soon speak ill of Me. For he that is not against you is for you. For whosoever shall give you to drink a cup of water in my Name, Amen, I say to you, he shall not lose his reward." Our Lord rebuked the zeal of John and said plainly that there might be a true disciple who yet was not numbered with the twelve and did not follow them.

It is a very hard lesson to learn. It is made harder, I think, by those who go about saying Our Lord founded one Church and that Church is our Church. I am always a little amused at the note in the old Douay Testament, the one of which Gregory Martin was so proud. Evidently the annotator, whoever he was, perhaps Gregory Martin himself, felt that this was an awkward text for those who thought there was only one Church and all who did not belong to a certain visible organisation were certainly no true followers of our Lord. So he put in this curious note which, as I say, seems very funny to me—"Miracles are wrought sometimes by the name of Jesus, whosoever the men be, when it is for the proof of a truth or the glory of God. Insomuch that Julian the Apostate himself did drive away devils with the sign of the cross: as St. Gregory Nazianzen writeth. And so also heretics may do miracles among the Heathens, to prove any article of the Christian faith; but they never did nor ever shall work any miracle to prove any of their erroneous opinions; as, to prove that Christ is not really in the blessed sacrament." That indicates a certain uneasiness about admitting the truth of this text right off. You notice our Lord said, "Do not forbid him." He also said "he that is not against you is for you." Gregory Martin makes no comment on these words. And for a very good reason. Our Lord said, "Forbid him not." Gregory would say, "Burn him." He is quite clear on that. On the text in Revelation, "Drunk with the blood of the saints," we find the following note: "The Protestants foolishly expound it of Rome, for that they put heretics to death, and allow of their punishment in other countries; but their blood is not called the blood of saints, no more than the blood of thieves, man-killers and other malefactors: for the shedding of which, by order of justice, no common-wealth shall answer . . ."

So we see that the idea that Christ founded only one Church and that a certain visible organisation represents that Church led naturally to all the horrors of religious persecution. Is it not better to follow our Lord's teaching closely and to say, "Our Lord calls men to be His followers. Those who follow Him even imperfectly, are part of His Church even if they be so foolish as to differ from me"? Protestants complain that the Church of Rome robs men of this liberty and of this charity. So then our Lord founded one Church but just because men are ignorant and sinful, divisions occur in the Church He founded. It is right to try and stop divisions. It is wrong to say that those who do not follow us do not follow the Lord. Even error unless it extends to a denial of the essential doctrines of the Christian faith does not cut off a soul from Jesus Christ. If Christ still blesses the erring and sees the influence of His teaching notwithstanding all the mistakes and wrong actions, we should try also to see the good in those who do not follow with us.

But when we come to the second half of the question, which is really more of an assertion, Protestants believe they are on very secure ground. The only way we can establish the type of Church that our Lord founded is by asking: What instructions did He give to His apostles? The Church that most nearly carries out these instructions will be the Church that has the strongest claim to be founded by our Lord. Think back again to the meaning we gave to the word Church. The Church consists of a company of people who obey the command to follow our Lord Jesus Christ. He tells them what they should do and their claim to be His followers depends on the closeness with which they observe His teaching. But where is the teaching of our Lord to be found? It is of course to be found in the New Testament.

I have often taken this illustration. Suppose two sons of a good father act very differently. I go to one and say, "Why do you act in the way you are doing?" He replies, "I am carrying out my Father's will." I then go to the other and put the same question, "Why do you act in the way you are doing?" To my surprise he also says, "I am carrying out my Father's will." I get them together and say to both, "You are acting differently and yet you both say you are carrying out your Father's will. There must be something wrong. One son pulls the will out of his pocket and says, "There you are—read it for yourself and you'll soon see that I am carrying out my Father's will." "No! No!" says the other, "you may mistake the words. I'll tell you what my Father's will is and then you'll see at once that I am carrying it out." Which son would you think was most likely carrying out his Father's will? You say, "Of course the son who offered it to me so that I could read it for myself."

We Protestants say, "If you want to find out what the Church founded by our Lord is like, read the New Testament for yourself." The Roman Catholic Church says, "No! No! You may take a wrong meaning out of it. I will tell you exactly what it means and then you will see that I am right." But does the Roman Catholic Church say that? Of course she does. Here is an extract from the preface to the Douay Bible to which I have referred so often of late: "Both just reason and highest authority of the Church judge it not absolutely necessary, nor always convenient, that holy Scripture should be in the vulgar tongue. For being as they are, hard to be understood, even by the learned, reason doth dictate to reasonable men, that they were not written, nor ordained to be read indifferently of all men . . . the careful Chief Pastors in God's Church have always moderated the reading of holy Scriptures, according to persons, times and other circumstances; prohibiting some, and permitting some, to have and read them in their mother tongue."

Protestants contend that this reluctance to place the Bible in the hands of the people so that they can compare the dogmas imposed on them with the direct teaching of Christ and His Apostles is evidence that the Roman Catholic Church has not observed Our Lord's teaching in every particular. The Church that does not teach the doctrine of Christ cannot be the Church founded by Him. Beer, bullets and bibles are licensed. Beer and bullets are licensed by the State because they may do mischief. The Bible is licensed by the Church of Rome because it may do her a mischief. If it is read, people will begin to say: "Is this really what our Lord taught?" Purgatory is not in the Bible. Seven sacraments are not taught in the Bible. Indulgences find no place in the Bible. Prayers to saints are not found in the Bible. Protestants say, "We got rid of these things in order to come back to the meaning of our Lord when He said, 'Follow Me.' Our action purified the Church and brought it back to what it was intended to be when founded by our Lord."

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1958.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"AFTER DEATH."

The dogmatic belief in the existence of a Purgatory (a state into which the dead who are ultimately destined for heaven must pass, and in which they endure torment) is accepted by the vast numbers of professing Christians who belong to the Roman Catholic faith. The practical consequences of this belief are pretty generally known—pious efforts may be made by their friends and other faithful to relieve the sufferings of those who are in Purgatory, and to shorten their stay there. These practical means are prayers, sacrifices of Masses, and other devout acts. The living also may, by their regard to sincere and persevering spiritual obligations secure merit and indulgence which will reduce the term of their severe punishment after death.

* * *

It is obvious that Purgatory is not to be confused with Hell, for Hell is the final state of the hardened and impenitent, whereas Purgatory is the temporary state of the penitent but sinful believer.

It is also obvious that the doctrine of Purgatory is different from belief in what is vaguely described as "the intermediate state." An intermediate state may be thought of according to one's own persuasion—either as purgative in the full Roman Catholic sense, or as simply the condition of the soul between death and the general judgment and general resurrection. Many shades of opinion exist as to the nature of the soul's experience when absent from the body and awaiting what St. Peter called "the times of restoration of all things." "Absent from the body" meant, for St. Paul, to be "present with the Lord." But "present with the Lord" prior to the general resurrection must be less intimate and perfect than the final state of the believer at "the consummation of the ages," for St. Paul (1 Thess. 4. 17), referring to the dead in Christ and those still on earth at the coming of the Lord says "we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." It has not been God's purpose to reveal in the Holy Scriptures a great deal about the state of the dead (so-called, for in fact "all live unto Him"), so that the temptation is there to exercise our false human ingenuities to fill in the details, and to substitute our conjectures for the divine silence.

* * *

It needs to be said also that it is very foolish indeed to solve the problem by denying the existence of the problem. There are some dubious sects which profess to settle the matter by denying any conscious existence after death. If we believe that the doctrine of Purgatory is wrong, we ought not to go to an opposite extreme and say that there is no meaning in the phrase of St. Paul "to depart and to be with Christ which is far better" (than life on earth).

We must answer what we hold to be error in a straightforward intelligent and Scriptural way. We must be faithful to the standard of the Orthodox evangelical truth which the Church has always had even though obscured by mistaken ideas. We must avoid the tendency to provide an answer to everything, for that tendency above all else has been most fruitful in introducing wrong beliefs into the Christian Church. Why can Churchmen (of all persuasions) not be content to say "we don't know," when in fact, they don't know for the sufficient reason that the Holy Spirit has not revealed everything?

* * *

We have known people who turned to Spiritism under the impression that it is able to supply definite proofs of survival, and clear indication of what goes on after death. This is an alternative to the denial that anything whatever goes on after death. It is but symptomatic of the uneasy craving which possesses those who have little positive Christian faith and knowledge. Some people simply cannot endure the Christian hope that we and our fellow Christians may after death "rest in Him." They wish the New Testament was a travel book with maps to tell us about the highlands and lowlands of Heaven—a tourists' guide to "Summerland." As it is not what they think it ought to be, they find more to their task in the séance with the medium, or in clairvoyance or clairaudience or other psychic communication.

Here again we need to emphasise that "we walk by faith, not by sight," and that God's wisdom has measured for His people the amount of information about the Hereafter it is advisable for us to have. If we know the Son of Man "who loved us and gave Himself for us," we shall be more than satisfied with His promise "In My Father's house are many mansions: I go to prepare a place for you: I will come again and receive you unto Myself" (John 14).

* * *

Many believers will say, as to their belief about the dead, that the Souls of the righteous are at their death made perfect in holiness and immediately pass into the presence of God. That is in harmony with the word of God. But it is worth saying that to be made perfect in holiness is to receive one spiritual qualification, and to receive it by virtue of the sacrifice offered, once for all, by our Redeemer on Calvary. Perfected holiness is not perfected knowledge or perfected personality. We may therefore rightly hold that progress in the presence of God is likely. These matters are independent of sin, and sin is taken away, and the people of God are made holy in place of it. The theory of Purgatory is, we understand, altogether concerned with sin, and with getting rid of its effects, and paying our share of the price of sin.

* * *

Here, we are bound to say, is the great issue of the nature and effect of Calvary. Does the New Testament really distinguish between the temporal and eternal punishments of sin? Does it teach us that on the Cross our Saviour made atonement and took away the eternal consequences, and left us still to experience the temporal effects? We believe (in those words in the Book of Common Prayer which express the faith of evangelical Churches) that on the Cross our Saviour made "by His one oblation of Himself once offered, a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world." The warrant for these words will be found everywhere in the New Testament, and conspicuously in the Epistle to the Hebrews. If the temporal punishments for sins have to be endured in painful and protracted sufferings after death, it is remarkable that Holy Scripture does not tell us. Is God's forgiveness only partial? Is it not a small view of God which thinks of Him as calculating how much or how little He will forgive; or bargaining that while He will relieve us of the major consequence of sin (i.e. eternal death) He will exact from us a payment in torments (which may be just short of being eternal) for the minor consequence?

* * *

The Christian who is taught by God's Word, the source of spiritual truth, will not be in doubt about the comprehensiveness of our Lord's atonement: he knows that Christ has set him free from all the spiritual consequences of sin. At death we are at long last delivered from sin's realm and power, and at death the Precious Blood of the Redeemer achieves its destined purpose in that all stain and guilt of sin is for ever washed away. The artificial and fictitious distinctions of temporal and eternal effects are meaningless. It may be very difficult in a world of "nicely calculated less or more" to grasp the full significance of divine deliverance; and it may be very difficult to divest our minds of habits of thought associated with human systems of criminal law, but the Christian should not look to the Institutes of Justinian or of Gaius to see what God is like at the "Grand Assize." No, he should look rather to the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and mark the contrast between how sinful vengeful men think, and how the Incarnate Word of God thinks—the Prodigal returned with the penitent plea "make me as one of thy hired servants," but his father would have none of that. He engaged in no quick calculation as to temporary discipling and permanent relationships: he told his servants "bring forth quickly the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his finger and shoes on his feet . . ." (Luke 15).

* * *

Is the wonder of a free and generous forgiveness too much for us to grasp? Must we replace it by a meaner notion of God's grace which we think more suitable to our base condition? Is the love of God too great for us? Is it God's truth or our own theorising which is decisive when we think about the unseen world? Have our friends preceded us into a world of darkness and pain, or can we say with Henry Vaughan

"They are all gone into the world of light"? We may read Vaughan's poem (of which this is the opening line), and find in it a view of what lies beyond the grave far more in harmony with Holy Scripture than the views current among those who have been brought up to believe in Purgatory.

* * *

We have lately glanced at a Catholic Truth Society pamphlet by the Rev. H. H. J. Crees, B.A. called "To Start You Thinking." It contains a passage on the subject of Purgatory. It did start us thinking, especially when we read "you can find the Scripture references to Purgatory in any manual of Christian doctrine." We are invited "to see that even if there were no revelation about it in Scripture, human reason alone would conclude that the state which we call Purgatory is nothing less than a necessity; a necessity which arises from the very nature of God." We are told that "in Purgatory we are given the opportunity of satisfying God's infinite justice." Two pages further on, under the heading "Thinking about our Lord Jesus Christ" we read "so great was the affront to God's justice that no man could make atonement to God." We accept this of course as requiring the Sacrifice of the Incarnate Son of God, but the previous statement about being given the opportunity of satisfying God's justice in Purgatory appears to us to involve the problem of either discarding the work of Christ on the Cross, or else of applying it to part only of our need. We know that the Roman Catholic faith like ours, sets supreme value on Calvary. But, unlike us, is involved in this mistake, that we must divide the responsibility for atonement between Christ and ourselves. In human affairs on earth the effects of sin may be inescapable—a murderer may serve a life sentence, yet may become a truly converted and Christian man. The law will take no account of his spiritual experience and progress—God has forgiven the sin but men have not, and the human society demands the punishment. But why carry these earthly ideas of temporal punishment beyond the grave into the world of spirit and into the unhampered unfrustrated love of God?

We firmly state that we do not hold that Purgatory is a necessity of reason; and we know that Holy Scripture does not warrant a belief in it. We know no ground in Holy Scripture for a related belief that the sacrifice of the Mass is efficacious "for those who are dead in the Lord, but whose sins have not yet been fully expiated" (Catechism of Council of Trent, ch. 4. and 77). We say that the sins of all who died "in the Lord" have been fully expiated—otherwise they could not be described as they are in Revelation—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours" (Rev. 14. 13)—otherwise indeed, it could not be said that Christ "hath been manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself" (Heb. 9. 26), or that "by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. 10. 14).

* * *

Prayers for the dead may seem to many nowadays very genuine expressions of affection, concern, and duty. Two generations in this past half-century have been devastated by wars and pestilence, and the bereaved are innumerable. The desire to do something for those who are beyond the touch of our hands or the sound of our voices, and the longing to make up in some way for our failures in human relationships in their days with us on earth must explain much of the readiness to pray for the well-being of those who have gone. Affectionate remembrance, loving thought, and ardent hope may keep us close to them, as also the faith that we are one in Christ—but explicit prayer has no sound Scriptural foundation. Some will refer to 2 Maccabees in disproof of this, but 2 Maccabees, as we have pointed out more than once, is not Canonical. It is a secondary and derivative source of informative based on an uninspired and secular narrative. It tells us what the great Maccabee did (i.e. he prayed for dead comrades): it does not command that his example should be copied. Nowhere in Holy Scripture is such a type of prayer directed.

From time to time devout persons reason thus—Our Lord attended the synagogues of Palestine and heard prayers for the dead in them. If such prayers were contrary to the mind of God He would have said so—He uttered no condemnation, therefore such prayers have His approval. The criticism evoked by this reasoning is to ask the question—Did Our Lord really hear such prayers in Jewish Services? Long ago a Dean Luckock argued that Jewish prayers for the dead were used in Synagogues in Palestine in the first century—better scholars than he showed that the evidence of the use of such prayers is much later than Our Lord's day—which is true of the inscription of the like sort on Jewish tombs.

* * *

But our subject is not prayers for the dead which, as private devotions, may commend themselves to devout people for reasons of sentiment or emotion; it is Purgatory, and the Catechism of the Council of Trent says that there is a fire of Purgatory, and that prayer for the dead may liberate them from the fire of Purgatory. Thus the nature of the suffering of the people in Purgatory is explicit. In the nineteenth century the well-known Fr. Furniss in his missions to Roman Catholic children and adults spoke and wrote a great deal about the torments of fire, and must have induced a state of terror of God rather than love for Him in many. "The Middle State" is nowadays, we believe, described in less frightening terms than formerly—for example in Fr. Ryan's "Catholic Doctrines Explained" we read (p. 133) "The Church does not bind us to believe that the punishment is material fire." Fr. Ryan's evidence from Holy Scripture is extremely inconclusive. More up-to-date colleagues have been content to rest on Tradition.

* * *

We have said nothing about indulgences or privileged altars or other modes of assisting the souls in Purgatory, for these are subordinate to the belief in Purgatory and its sufferings. It is a long step from the simple wish expressed on an early Christian tombstone, that "the light may shine" upon the deceased relative, to the belief that certain observances on particular Fidays will release souls from Purgatory, or the belief that certain Scapulars will have similar effect. The fact is that we all need to correct and regulate our doctrinal thinking and our spiritual thought and conduct by the safe and inerrant standard of God's Word, just as we may safely and accurately set our watches by the Greenwich time signal.

* * *

What do we say in conclusion, on the positive side? What does Orthodox Protestantism teach about the soul's submission to God for time and eternity? Simply this, that being justified by faith we are freely accepted by God in the Beloved Son "by whose stripes we are healed" for "the Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all."

PASSING EVENTS—con'd. from p. 134.

fenders could be charged under the Frauds Act. We challenged this contention at once for, so far as could be disclosed, there has been no law enacted in Ontario on this particular issue, and so far as we can ascertain, there has never been any attempt on the part of the Roman Church to force Protestants who have discarded the agreement after marriage to abide by it, by bringing them before the courts.

But the issue has been the subject of litigation in the United States, where a little while ago the Court of Appeals of New York State in a judgment sustained the right of a child of 12 years or over to choose his own religion regardless of a pre-marital agreement made by the parents. The effect of the action was to set aside an earlier order of a lower court that the boy should be reared in the Roman Catholic faith because of an agreement signed by his parents before marriage.

We have often asserted that this iniquitous custom of the Roman Church in forcing the Protestant partner in a mixed marriage to sign this agreement had no legal force whatever in a court of law. The very act of force in the signing of the pact (for no Protestant, no matter how weak his faith may be, ever could sign such an agreement willingly and gladly) would destroy it in any court of law.

But the principal reason why the agreement is not valid and can be ignored by the parents at any time is, as we have stated that in this and every other civilised country the law has not been enacted that would make the agreement legally binding. It is purely a Roman Catholic arrangement or artifice to try and secure any children resulting from the marriage. How any church or people could claim the authority to fix the religion of unborn children, as the Roman Church attempts to do in forcing the signing of its pre-marriage pacts, is something difficult to understand. But the decision of the New York Court makes it clear that the children will have the same religious freedom as other citizens of the Country.

We feel the widest possible publicity should be given to the fact that Rome's pre-marital pact in a mixed marriage is not legally binding.

—"The Sentinel," Toronto, Sept. 1958.

* * *

"In the Centre of the Earth."

In Ezekiel 38, 12 the people of Israel, returned from exile, are described as "dwelling in the midst of the land." But the Revised Standard Version renders this, "the people that dwell at the centre of the earth." A bulletin giving news and views from Israel draws attention to the geographical evidence in support of the Biblical statement. It points out that Israel occupies the historic "land bridge" between the three continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It has direct sea outlets to the Western, Eastern, and Southern oceans, and trade routes in that region of the world where they meet. It lies exactly midway between the coast of U.S.A. to the West, China to the East, and South Africa to the South. The capital cities of countries with more than half the world's total population are within a circle having a radius of little more than 2,000 miles of Jerusalem. The early Church used to speak of Jerusalem as the centre of the world. The thought was, no doubt, that it was from Jerusalem that repentance and remission of sins would be preached in Jesus' name unto all nations. At present the city is, religiously, a "house left desolate." God grant that the day is not far off when the people shall say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord."

—"The Christian," 26/9/1958.

* * *

Broadcasting.

A further advertising campaign in the national newspapers of Eire is about to be undertaken by the Christian Broadcasting Fellowship of 10, D'Olier Street, Dublin, who invite the prayer partnership of friends in this work of making known to the Roman Catholic population details of Gospel broadcasts from Radio Luxembourg.

* * *

The Ministry of Healing.

For the past five years a commission set up by the Anglican archbishops has been considering the vexed question of the church's ministry of healing. Now it has come up with a report in the form of a carefully reasoned 84-page document. By preferring "ministry of healing" to such phrases as "faith healing," spiritual healing" or "divine healing," the commission shrewdly delivers itself from the clutches of the various "healers" who often lure the faithful into confused thinking and disastrous action. It does its best to avoid concentration on physical healing, pointing out that the ministry of healing requires the co-operation of the entire pastoral ministry. It holds that public "healing services" are non-scriptural and dangerous, and constitute a "modern excrescence" on the ministry of healing. And it warns people who believe in such services that the "effected cures" usually carry no weight with the medically qualified. Again the report calls for liaison between pastor and physician—a call often heard but rarely heeded.

—"The Vigilant," August, 1958.

* * *

Where is Tyranny?

The "Watchman-Examiner," Baptist weekly edited in New York by Dr. John W. Bradbury, in a recent editorial on "Religious Tyranny" commented:

"In what nations of the world is there religious tyranny? And in what other nations is there religious freedom? These are legitimate questions. With world-wide news at our disposal it is not difficult to give the answer. Where Protestants are most numerous you will find greater freedom to the point of complete liberty. Where the Roman Catholic Church dominates you will find less freedom to the point of religious oppression and tyranny."

—"The Vigilant," Aug. 1958.

Revival! — or Revolution? WHICH?

BRITAIN NEEDS A PROTESTANT "BACK TO THE BIBLE" CRUSADE

NOW!

*Will You be Our PRAYER
PARTNER?*

Further details from:—

REV. HARRY WHARTON

(Founder and Director,

THE PROTESTANT EDUCATION SOCIETY),

11 ROMAN ROAD, HOVE, SUSSEX,
ENGLAND.

LOURDES CENTENARY 1958

—o—

*For the Church of Ireland Position
Read*

The Exaltation of The Blessed Virgin Mary

By

REV. S. G. POYNTZ, B.D.

Price 1/3. Obtainable from A.P.C.K.,
37 Dawson St., Dublin; Donegall Sq.,
Belfast; Cork and Limerick.

INDEX TO 1958.

A		PAGE	F		PAGE
Austria	1		France	1
Australia	26, 113		Fethard on Sea	21
Ardill, Dr. J.	28		Festival, Drama	24, 28
Armagh and St. Patrick	29		Fisher, Archbishop	27, 85
Alcoholism	36		"Furrow, The"	39
Allegro, Dr.	50, 118		Fundamentalism	69, 114
Archaeology and Bible	74, 118		Freedom of Thought	99
Anglican Orders	74
Anglo-Saxons	81
Apocrypha	92
Arizona	106
Aquinas, St. Thomas	113
Arrien, Rev. J.	128
B			G
Bible Society in Russia	14		God, Praise of	18
Belgian Congo	25, 60		Germany	26
Bieler, Dr. L.	28		Grubb, Sir K.	27
Bryan, W. J.	69		Gallico, Paul	29
Bridging Spiritual Differences	73		Gurteen College	83
British and Foreign Bible Society	85
Belfast	93
Baptists in Russia	95
Bantry	109
Bishops and Bible	114, 121
Bury, Dr. J. B.	125
Burke-Savage, Rev. R.	131
C			H
Commandments	3		Humanism	13
Conference, Lambeth	8		Hill, Mr. H. C.	14
Church Burning	13		Hooft, Dr. V. T.	61
Censorship	24, 26, 28		Hann, Dr.	61
Congo	25		Hebert, Dr.	70
Converts	35		Henry of Saltrey	86
Colombia	38, 94		Hammond, Archdeacon	99, 111, 123, 135
Cranmer, Archbishop	51		Hurley, District Justice	119, 122
Catholic and Protestant	62, 80		Herbert, Geo	126
Church, The	88, 135		Hodges, Rt. Revd. Dr.	122
Church and Bible	90
Comment	93
Council of Civil Liberties	131
D			I
Dublin Drama	24, 26, 28		Italy	1, 2, 37, 47, 86, 109
Dead Sea Scrolls	25, 50, 71, 118		Israel	2, 9, 36, 62, 122, 141
Drink in Eire	36		India	6, 108
Dix, Dr. Gregory	74		International Missionary Council	7
D'Alton, Cardinal	107		Infallibility	20
Double Thinking	109		"In Christ"	30
Davies, Dr. A. P.	118		Ireland, Protestantism in	39, 73
Death, After	138		Ireland, Soul of	110
E			J
Eire, Church Burning in	13, 129		Jesuits and Pope	1
Elizabeth I	80		"Jehovah's Witnesses"	48
Europe, Anti-Clericals	95		Japanese Church	49
			Japan	49
			Joshua, City of	72
			Justification by Faith	75
			K
			Kerr, Bishop W. S.	80
			Killaloe Court	119, 122, 129, 131
			L
			Lambeth Conference	8, 115, 121
			Life, Mystery of	12
			Latin America	37, 64, 94, 98, 133
			Liberty and R. C. Church	49, 109
			Lichfield, Bishop of	61
			Liberals	69
			Leo XII, Pope	74
			Letters	82
			Lourdes	93
			Limerick, Bishop of	122

	PAGE		PAGE
M		S
Mary, Legion of	12	Sabbath	3
Moscow	25, 27	Satellite	6
Marriages, Mixed	26, 46, 57, 134	Spain, Protestants in	26, 97, 113
Marriage in Spain	26	Sydney	26
Malta	27, 50, 85	South America	37
McNeill, Dr. John	28	Scrolls, Dead Sea	50
McConnell, Rev. G. B.	33	"Sola Fide"	63
Marriage, Civil	47	Spiritual Progress	66
Maynard, Theodore	51	Schools, Roman Catholic	83
Montano, Dr. W.	64	Societies, Missionary	97
McKinney, Rev. W. J.	83	St. Peter, Church and	102
Marxism	100	Salvation and Church	111
McLoughlin, Fr.	165	Saviour's Birth	134
Machiabell	117
		T
N		Trinitarian Bible Society	1, 97
Nash, Fr.	33	"The Church Times"	70
"Ne Temere"	58	Trinity College, Dublin	73
Nepal, Gospel in	62	Tradition	92
Nyanza	84	Treyor-Roper, Professor H. R.	117
O		U
"One Church"	7	United States	25, 57
O'Riordan, Fr.	39, 54	Ulster	39, 133
"Oxford Dictionary of the Church"	45	United States, Protestants in	95
Ordination	74	Unesco and Bible	98
		Universities in Eire	107
P		Unity of Church	123
Pope and Jesuits	1
Poland	2	V
Prophecy	9	Vestments, Church	23
Praise of God	18	Vatican, The	38
Protestants in Malta	27, 50	Van der Ploeg, Dr.	118
Patrick, St.	28
Presbyterians and Rome	32
Priest, Story of a	34, 105, 128
Peanó, Rev. Giovanni	35
Protestants in Italy	37
Protestantism in Ireland	39, 54, 110
Prato, Bishop of	47
Pre-Marriage Contracts	57
Path, The Christian	78
Purgatory, St. Patrick's	86
"People's Padre"	105
Phoenix	106
Paths of Life, The	126
		W
Q		World Council of Churches	1, 27, 61
Quakers	84	White, Dr. N. J. D.	28
		Wittofski, Rev. J.	34
R		Witnesses, False	48
Religious Freedom	1, 109	Wilson, Edmund	50, 118
"Remembering"	3	Wesley, John	96
Russia, Bible in	14, 95	Wycliffe Translations	99
Rumble, Rev. Dr.	26	Williams, Professor D.	109
Rome and St. Patrick	29
Rubio, Rev. Angelo	35
Resurrection	42
Reviews	50, 51, 117
Rowley, Dr.	50, 118
"Roman"	81
Ripley, Rev. F. J.	90	Y
Roman Catholics and Bible	94	Yigael Yadin	50, 72, 118
Revival	18, 59, 110

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

DOORS OF OPPORTUNITY

are opening for the distribution of God's Word in

SPAIN

FRANCE

INDIA

N. AFRICA

WEST INDIES

and many other countries.

All who cherish the Bible as the Word of God, and desire its world-wide circulation are invited to co-operate prayerfully and practically with the

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

BELLEVUE HOSPITAL

LEVEL
ONE

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No.1—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

Passing Events	1
Latin America no longer responds to the Appellation, "The Roman Catholic Continent"	3
Comment	4
Editor's Chair	6
The Revival of 1859	8

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

U.S. Bishop bans M.R.A. and Hits its Errors.

Marquette, Mich.

Moral Rearmament is a religious movement which encourages religious indifference and attempts to reduce all creeds to a common denominator, according to Bishop Noa, of Marquette.

Bishop Noa cited these errors of M.R.A. in issuing a pastoral directive banning participation in the movement to Catholics of the Marquette diocese and all other Catholics who come within the limits of the See's jurisdiction.

The Bishop warned that it is "both dangerous and futile for Catholics to seek guidance in matters of faith and morals from those who do not have a God-given authority."

"It is our duty," he declared, "to bring to the attention of Catholics that M.R.A., whatever its good intentions, assumes the role of spiritual direction and guidance for which it does not have a divine authority."

The Bishop's statements were contained in a pastoral directive on faith which accompanied the directive banning participation in M.R.A. Issued here in pamphlet form, copies of the pastoral were sent to all U.S. bishops and all seminaries in this country.

The moral Re-armament movement, also known as the Oxford Group and as Buchmanism, was begun by Dr. Frank Buchman, a Lutheran minister, in 1909, at Princeton, N.J.

It professes not to be a new religion, but aspires to reform the world through the propagation of what are called the "four absolutes," absolute honesty, absolute purity, absolute unselfishness and absolute love.

Despite its claims that it is not a religion, Bishop Noa pointed out, the movement was banned by bishops in Germany and Ireland when it was still known as the Oxford Group.

In later years, when the movement came to be called Moral Rearmament, bishops in England, Germany and Italy forbade Catholics to participate.—R.C. "Advocate."

—Quoted in "The Vigilant," Melbourne, September, 1958.

* * *

Spain Denies Exit Visa to Protestant Bishop.

Spanish officials refused an exit visa to Protestant Bishop Santos M. Molina who heads the Spanish Reformed Church, to attend the Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops. Bishop Molina said he doubted that the refusal had anything to do with the fact that he had once been imprisoned for being a freemason. Originally sentenced to twelve years, he was released after serving only three.

Bishop Molina was consecrated a bishop in 1956 by an Anglican bishop and two Protestant Episcopal bishops at a ceremony behind closed doors, in accordance with the law governing Protestant worship in Spain.

[Bishop Molina was consecrated by a Church of Ireland bishop and two American bishops].

—"Protestant Action," Toronto, Nov. 1958.

* * *

Numbers.

It cannot be said too often that one must be very careful in accepting Roman Catholic estimates of their own numbers. Anybody could get inflated numbers who went about it as they do. If a baby, supposed dying in a hospital, is sprinkled with a little water by a nurse, then the baby is a Roman Catholic, even if born a Hottentot, and destined for a witch-doctress. "In the Roman Catholic Church, as soon as a baby is baptised it is regarded as a member of the Roman Catholic body and how many of those babies grow up and become Protestants later on? The Roman Church does not care to acknowledge this. They are still considered to be members of the Roman Catholic Church and they show them in their statistics as members of that Church." This comes from a very interesting article in "The Reformer." It was written by a former Roman Catholic priest—the Rev. R. K. Mazierski, M.A., B.D., and the title of it is "Why Rome's Numbers Grow."

—Quoted in "The Bulwark," Oct. 1958.

* * *

International Evangelical Radio Station in Europe.

Forty-five evangelical radio stations are operating throughout the world, but there are none in Europe! To meet this great need, plans for a European Protestant radio station were launched two years ago. It is a fact that some State-owned radio stations broadcast Protestant services, however, in several countries no broadcast time is available for the Evangelical Church.

The planned station will be dedicated to the broadcasting of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and will be sponsored by an international association of Christians who confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour, and acknowledge the Bible as the supreme authority in matters of faith and practice. Owing to the fact that the station will be of an international character, daily programmes will be beamed in various languages. The transmitters will cover an area of approximately 2,000 miles (between Europe, Asia and Africa) in part of the world that contains 550 million people and 90 million radio sets.

—"Protestant Action," Toronto, Nov. 1958.

* * *

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR

Inter-Church Aid will Co-operate

Inter-Church Aid and Refugee Service will be taking a major part in World Refugee Year which the United Nations Third Committee last week approved by a big majority.

The idea of an international year to speed up refugee resettlement originated in this country, and for some time a committee has been in existence, successfully urging the Government to give its backing. On the committee's initiative H.M. Government, through diplomatic channels, secured international support for the idea, and the measure of its success was reflected in the favourable vote of 56 member states last week.

The British Foreign Office and the office of the High Commissioner for Refugees both have observers on the U.K. World Refugee Year Committee on which Inter-Church Aid is represented by its Director, Miss Janet Lacey. Also on the committee are other major refugee agencies, and the United Nations Association.

No New Organisation

This committee recognised that no matter how successful World Refugee Year may prove to be, there will still be a refugee problem at the end of it and that agencies such as Inter-Church Aid will still have the task of maintaining interest in their resettlement and relief programmes. It was therefore decided that it would be harmful to the future work of permanent refugee agencies to create a new organisation for World Refugee Year and to ask everybody to support it.

The Year has been fixed for June, 1959, until June, 1960, and during that period the public will be asked to support the recognised refugee organisations, each of which has pledged itself to intensify its efforts during Refugee Year. There is to be no central organisation except for a Secretary and small clerical staff whose functions will be to co-ordinate and to receive funds from those sources, such as the Government, which do not normally make their contributions direct to one of the refugee agencies. The British Government has already promised £100,000.

The committee has stated the objectives of World Refugee Year in the U.K. as follows:

- (i) Assistance to refugees under the mandate of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees;
- (ii) Resettlement of European refugees from China;
- (iii) Aid for refugees in Hong Kong;
- (iv) Aid for Arab refugees.

The British Council of Churches meeting in Liverpool last month welcomed the conception of a World Refugee Year and in a resolution urged the Churches to "participate in the Year through their own agency, namely the Department of Inter-Church Aid and Refugee Service".

Although the next Christian Aid Week, April 27th to May 2nd, will be over before the Year begins, it will be regarded as a useful preparation and education period for Church and public, focusing attention on the desperate needs of the refugees to be helped during the ensuing twelve months.

* * *

AUSTRALIA

A Note on Church Attendance

The following report culled from a city newspaper recently is worthwhile reading again:

The latest issue of the Current Affairs bulletin produced by the Tutorial Classes Department of Sydney University is on "Church-going in Australia."

Of every 100 attendances at Church 45 are Roman Catholics, 21 Anglican, 10 Methodist, 7 Presbyterian, 4 Baptist.

Weekly attendance at public worship was claimed by 62 per cent. of professing Roman Catholics; Baptists were the only other denomination to score a comparable ratio of adherence to attendance (53 per cent.).

The report points out, interestingly, that "despite the Catholic Church" virtual prohibition of divorce for its members, the divorce rate among professing Catholics (0.75 per cent.) was higher than among adherents of churches more lenient towards divorce.

"There were proportionately fewer divorces among professing Methodists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Congregationalists or members of the Churches of Christ than among professing Catholics."

It is noteworthy that in spite of all the R.C. Church boasts that she does not allow divorces she heads the list as compared with Protestant churches. Again might it be said how can this church be the only true church.

—"Protestant World", Sydney, Aug., 1958.

* * *

Italian Protestants: A Welcome Ruling

Protestants in Italy and in other lands will rejoice that the Italian Constitutional Court has ruled that it will no longer be necessary for non-Roman Catholic groups to seek permission from the Government to open places of worship. The court declared unconstitutional two Articles of a law of 1930 which had made this permission obligatory and had allowed non-Catholic religious ceremonies and services to be performed only when conducted or authorized by a person whose appointment had been officially approved. The application of these laws, or the use of them in delaying the granting of permission, has in the past pressed heavily on certain Protestant bodies, in spite of the fact that Article 19 of the Italian Constitution grants the right for any person to practise freely his own religious faith in private and in public, so long as this does not offend against public morality.

—"The Christian", 23 Nov., 1958.

* * *

Millionth Bible for Hotel in Bond Street

The millionth copy of the Bible to be issued by the Gideons since this organization started in Britain in 1949 was presented at the Westbury Hotel, Bond Street, London, on Thursday of last week. The Bible, specially bound in blue morocco and inscribed, will be kept in a place of honour in the hotel.

(Continued on p. 11.)

LATIN AMERICA NO LONGER RESPONDS TO THE APPELLATION "THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CONTINENT"

By Walter M. Montano

For centuries the impression has been fostered that the Southern Continent belongs to the Roman fold and that the people are submissive to the Roman hierarchy. But recently, in a very frank article entitled "How Catholic is Latin America?" a Maryknoll priest, Rev. Albert Nevins, presents a picture of the country that is surprisingly dismal as far as the Roman Catholic Church is concerned. ("The Sign," September, 1956.)

Latin America is recognised as little more than a mission territory with Catholic traditions. Religion is professed rather than practised, and hopes for religious solidarity are apparently vanishing, to judge by the observations of Father Nevins:

"Out of a total population of over 157 million, more than 136 million people of Latin America claim to be Catholics, but even by the most generous estimates only about 10 per cent. can be called practising Catholics. . . .

"A Chilean priest, Father Albert Hurtado, made a survey in his own country several years ago. He discovered that 3½ per cent. of the men and 9½ per cent. of the women attended Sunday Mass. Only little more than 10 per cent. made their Easter duty.

"Another Chilean priest, Father Humbert Munoz, reports that half the people die without the last sacraments, half are married outside the Church, and only a third make their First Communion.

"... in parish in Buenos Aires . . . of the parents of 125 children making their First Communion, only one father and six mothers could be called practical Catholics. During the period of the survey 68 people died, of whom 13 received the Last Sacraments, and a number of these were already dead when the priest was summoned.

"Because of the religious indifferentism of our people," a Chilean bishop told me, 'we suffer from a lack of religious vocations. And because of the lack of priests, the indifferentism of our people increases by leaps and bounds.'

"... Latin America, which has more than four times the Catholic population of the United States, has fewer parishes than we do and almost half the number of priests. In the United States there is one priest for every 694 Catholics. . . . 'The average South American pastor is responsible for upward of 15,000 souls,' declared Father Charles Brown, a Maryknoll missionary in Bolivia, who has made a study of the situation. 'And it must be remembered that two-fifths of the priests are religious, and one-half are foreigners . . .'

"Columbia is generally recognised to be the strongest Catholic country in South America. The present government is closely linked with the Church—a fact that has given rise to much Protestant propaganda in the American press. But even in 'Catholic Colombia' no more than 15 per cent. of the people attend Mass each Sunday.

"True Catholic intellectuals and social leaders are few and far between. When you do find them, they stand out like beacons in the night. . . . For the most part the rich, the majority of whom are practising Catholics, are more interested in perpetuating the status quo of their superior positions than in advancing the Church.

"Our best church-goers are the leading oppressors of the poor," a Peruvian priest told me. "Their wealth gives them power to silence anyone who opposes them. The encyclicals should be our most potent weapon to win back the masses. But our wealthy Catholics prefer a sentimental Catholicism to a dynamic one."

"... Over half the Catholics of Latin America cannot read or write. Illiteracy percentages vary over the continent from 90 per cent. in Haiti and 80 per cent. in Bolivia to 14 per cent. in Argentina and 15 per cent. in Uruguay. Even an advanced country like Colombia has a 44 per cent. illiteracy.

"Parish life, as it exists in the United States, is hardly known in Latin America. There is no intensive life of worship. Parish organisations are few and weak, confined to women and girls. There is a gulf separating the priests and people. Catholic education is for all practical purposes confined to the sacristy. The lay apostolate is only rarely used, and seldom are men enrolled. . . .

"The picture is not a bright one, except for a few isolated spots. At the best, the Church is just about holding on. Facts do not warrant calling Latin America a Catholic continent. By tradition it is Catholic, but in actual practice the Latin American people as a whole live in neglect of their faith. The great body of people of Latin America live outside the church, separated from its sacraments, ignorant of its doctrine, and unaware of the social teachings that could lift them from their wretched poverty.

"Latin America is really a mission continent' . . ."

The recent Roman Catholic campaign to flood Latin America with priests from Spain and the United States is, in our opinion, as useless as watering a dead tree. For four hundred years Rome has had her opportunity to Christianise the continent, and if superstition, anti-clericalism, and Communism are rife, she has no one but herself to blame. For centuries she has represented herself as the maternal guardian of the country, whereas in reality she has been nothing but a ruthless stepmother. Rome has never belonged to Latin America, and Latin America still does not belong to Rome.

Significantly, vocations for the priesthood have been negligible compared to the tremendous needs of the continent. But the recent effort to draw on foreign priests can only prove fruitless; at this late date it can hardly be expected to change the growing distrust and anti-clericalism among the people.

The tenets of Rome are anti-Biblical, and her policies are anti-democratic. She supports the rich, powerful landowner and grinds down the poor. She feasts while the people fast. She demands privileges and denies rights. She seeks no interests but her own and seeks power only to serve those interests. Is it any wonder that the masses are stolidly indifferent to her brand of Christianity and are now responding to evangelical Protestantism as never before?

Not long ago it was the writer's privilege to sit next to the Bolivian ambassador to the United States at a banquet of the Rotary Club of Los Angeles and to hear him deliver a lecture, given in perfect English, that stirred the minds and moved the hearts of his listeners. He seemed to have a deep sense of spiritual value so often lacking among public figures.

Later on, during the course of a personal conversation, the ambassador related that he—like many another "nominal" Catholic—had been educated in a Protestant school in Bolivia. His spiritual insight was no mere coincidence.

What Rome has failed to provide for Latin America, the figure of One on the Cross has supplied, in all the fullness of His redemptive power. But His appeal does not end there. Down through the ages a voice has sounded and found its echo in the empty tomb: "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It is the voice of One who had compassion on the multitudes, who fed them bread for their bodies and the Bread from heaven for their souls, who loved them to the death and redeemed them through His resurrected life.

Our responsibility as lightbearers is greater today than ever before. A whole continent, fed on husks for so long, is starving and thirsting for the living bread and living water, which only Christ can give. A whole continent, deceived and exploited for hundreds of years, is longing for the truth found only in Christ. A whole continent is waiting . . .

—"Christian Heritage."

COMMENT

"UPON THIS ROCK"

The founding of Christ's Church has been a matter for controversy over many centuries. Indeed, if we are to believe the common report, a distinguished Jesuit of a former generation calculated that the ancient fathers were full of disagreement on whether Our Lord referred to Peter and designated him as the rock-foundation, or not. It is thought that on this point "the unanimous consent of the fathers" is to avoid uniformity of opinion, or any consent at all. As far as evidence goes, we have always liked the view expressed in the Roman Breviary (indicating a very old tradition) that Our Lord founded His Church on "the rock of the Apostolic Confession", i.e. that He is the Messiah. This will be found in the Breviary in the Collect for the eve of St. Peter and St. Paul's Day. Incidentally, two comments may be made here. 1. that St. Peter and St. Paul's Day has long been almost exclusively St. Peter's Day, and 2. that it has just now (1959), ceased to be 'a holiday of obligation'. Why this recent change has been made we cannot say; but the facts that the feast of Corpus Christi is generally less than a month before it, and that the hours of work are far fewer than formerly, may well justify the withdrawal of the obligation.

* * *

Some time ago the present Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, Dr. Lowe, published a small book on St. Peter. He seemed fairly satisfied that the apostle Peter was leader of the apostles in Our Lord's lifetime, and that he was at some time in his Ministry in the city of Rome. But Dr. Lowe makes it plain that there is nothing in these two points to base a claim for Peter's universal episcopate or bishopric of Rome, or infallibility. Years before, the distinguished Cambridge church historian, Dr. Foakes Jackson, published a book on Peter as "the Prince of the Apostles" (Prince, of course, meaning 'leader'—Princeps in Latin). Dr. Foakes Jackson was not likely to draw unwarrantable conclusions from Peter's leadership. Other competent scholars have allowed the probability that Peter was in the city of Rome, without attaching any momentous consequences to his residence there.

But on the other hand there are many excellent scholars who deny that there is any real evidence that the apostle visited Rome and died there. They hold that the oldest references are misinterpreted and utterly inconclusive. Some years ago our pages carried a series of articles on "St. Peter and Rome", by a valued contributor "J.B.S.". His views and arguments were against Peter's ministry in Rome; and readers can easily refresh their minds about this matter by writing to us for a copy of "J.B.S.'s" booklet as advertised in this issue.

* * *

We refer to this perennial topic because of a quotation we found recently in an article on the late Professor A. S. Peake. Dr. Peake is mainly remembered for "Peake's Commentary on the Bible" published nearly forty years ago, and still consulted though over-liberal and speculative. Peake was well known as a commentator (on Job, Hebrews, etc.), and belonged to that rather contradictory group—"Methodist-Modernist", and taught Biblical Criticism in Manchester. The quotation is—

"If," he said, "Matthew XVI. 18 is authentic; and if by the 'rock' Peter is intended; and if the passage implies the infallibility of Peter; and if Peter ever resided in Rome; and if residing there he was its Bishop; and if he passed on his prerogatives to later Bishops of Rome; and if he did not pass them on to the Bishops in other places where he resided; if indeed there was any monarchical episcopate in Rome till decades after his time; and if the explicit utterances of Jesus did not forbid such a claim; and if it were not incompatible with much in the New Testament record—then and only then could one concede the Roman claim."

Now this, we think, is an admirable summary of the problem, and each 'if' put forward by Peake had behind it a very formidable weight of learning. Peake was no Hyde Park orator scoring points against less nimble-witted opponents: he was a man of academic top-rank who knew his sources. He went in for no sweeping assertions, no conjectures, or 'insights', or hasty conclusions based on misunderstood information. Each point has been closely studied in many scholarly treatises by capable men, and the total impression left is that the claims for St. Peter have been widely accepted for long centuries because men wanted to believe them, and because they were easy and profitable to believe in ages of ignorance and credulity.

If "the glory that was Greece" had to be left with heathen poets and philosophers, "the grandeur that was Rome" had to be annexed to the Christian Church in Western Europe when the Roman Empire was falling. The name and prestige of Rome were kept alive, so that Rome ecclesiastical became heir-general, and perpetuated the traditions of Rome imperial among barbarous peoples.

* * *

We could easily enlarge upon each problem raised by Professor Peake, but we think we have done well to bring this quotation to the attention of readers. Those who have the time and access to reliable books (we commend Merrill's "Essays on Early Church History"), may very usefully study in detail the subject matter before us. Even if our conclusion is that Peter was in Rome, that conclusion will scarcely justify our acceptance of the decree of the Vatican Council of 1870 that the Bishop of Rome, successor of St. Peter, is endowed with infallibility when he, ex cathedra, defines something on faith or morals.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the Manager, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"THOU ART MY SON; THIS DAY HAVE I BEGOTTEN THEE"

The Incarnation of the Son of God is, as we said last month, the great event of history. It may be the world's fashion to ignore it, or to put other things in place of it, but the Christian knows it as the mighty act of God: His mightiest since the epoch in which He said "Let there be light." It is the world's loss that Christian facts and values are neglected; and much of the neglect is due to learned ignorance. This is of course the most serious sort of ignorance, for it is the sort we are the least prepared for. We naturally assume that learned men are not ignorant, so that if they say, or do not say, certain things, we take for granted that they are fully aware of all relevant circumstances and facts, and that their behaviour is settled by a full evaluation of everything involved.

An example of this comes to mind. Lately we glanced at a short popular work on the books which have changed the world—the titles would lead us to believe that the contents would measure up to the promise of the name. If ever a book changed the world, it is the New Testament of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, but it is not included in the volume we specify. Here is a sample of what we are deploring—the issue to the literate public of books which manifest a learned ignorance, and which are therefore far more misleading than the writings of any ignorant. The same is true of any other sort of publicity—wireless and television talks, public oratory, brains trusts, etc. We are the victims of our instructors, and our trust in them is sometimes ill-placed. Their success lies not in their wisdom but in our credulity, or our confidence in their bona fides.

* * *

Our Lord Jesus Christ through His power, and through the fact that wholehearted and transformed men followed Him, changed the tenor of man's life. His birth (as the Holy Scriptures predicted) brought something new to earth. "He brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." (2 Tim. 1. 10)—it is no part of our Christian belief to put forward the natural immortality of man as taught by the heathen philosophies. But we may allow any who wish, to claim that the dim and vague ideas men had were illuminated fully by Him Who declared "I am the Resurrection and the Life."

His words had instant effect in many souls; but also, the long reflecting upon them and the experience of trying to obey them taught His people a great deal. Here we may believe that He was keeping His promise that the Holy Spirit sent, into our hearts by Him, would lead us into all the truth. Learned ignorance may instruct us that Our Lord rarely travelled more than sixty or seventy miles from His house in Nazareth, and that He lived among peasants most of His life in one of the more primitive parts of Palestine, and never had contact, such as His disciple Paul had, with outside nations and cultures: is it not then all the more remarkable and significant that His words are still the most potent words on earth? After a familiarity of close on two thousand years' duration, they come to each generation with the fragrance and freshness of something new, as well as with the force of contemporary challenge. In the earlier years of this century, in student Christian movement circles, a well-known intent was—"To confront young men with the living Christ." This purpose was shared by many other organisations, and has been remarkably successful. It could only succeed because it fits every generation and every race and every level of life, and not simply first century Palestine.

If we are told what Our Lord was, in the days of His flesh, we are told only a fragment of the story. We need to learn what He is in 1959, and what He has been since His Ascension. From the days when "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" the very nature of man, under His influence, has been different. Saints and martyrs, as well as apostles and prophets, have followed—a glorious company, a noble army, a goodly fellowship—and the roll is not yet filled up.

We do not deny, or even minimise, the failures of professing Christians. We can sadly accept the severest indictments of the Christian world (as, for instance, in Joseph McCabe's "Testament of Christianity"), and lose neither faith nor hope in the Gospel as God's supreme word to mankind, because we know "the triumphs of His Grace". We can see the other side, and call to mind the achievements of the real in contrast with the formal or the pretended Christianity. The decisive fact is that real Christians are "born from above", not from below (Titus 3. 5). If we are merely born of the flesh we will continue, even under Christian auspices, to live in the flesh (see Romans 7 and 8), but if we are born of the spirit (John 3. 6), we shall go through life with very different motives and objectives. The sincere Christians are those who not only believe the Gospel, but "walk in love" (Ephesians 5, 2.). Probably few believed the Christian doctrines more firmly than Torquemada or the brethren of the Holy Office; yet we are not likely to point them out as models of Christian love. We do not refrain from saying that many professed Evangelicals to-day, and in the past, have harboured "a root of bitterness" towards those they ought to have loved, if not for themselves, at least "for their work's sake" (1 Thess. 5. 13). Such are the defects and infirmities and positive evils of human nature, and the obstinacy man opposes to God's grace. Realisation of all this should impress upon us the need of every man for a new heart and a cleansed conscience. We cannot look to Purgatory to put right in us all that we have deliberately refrained from correcting while on earth.

* * *

The quotation from the second Psalm which heads this article contains an answer to the theory put forward now and again that there are many Christs, i.e. that all the good men who have taught their fellow men higher truth are in a sense Christs, or revelations of God's word and will. That sort of theosophical outlook will simply not harmonise with the Gospel. We emphasise the significance of the passages of Holy Scripture read in church every Christmas Day—the first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews: there we read "God having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets, by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in His Son, Whom He appointed heir of all things, through Whom also He made the worlds; Who being the effulgence of His glory, and the very image of His substance, and upholding all things by the word of His power, when He had made purification of sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high . . . Unto which of the angels said He at any time

'Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee?'"

This is not to be reconciled with belief that there are other teachers of men who can be lined up with Our Lord, Socrates, Buddha, Mohammed etc., are very good in their several ways, but the only-begotten Son is not of the same group. He is unique. He alone is the Incarnate Word. He alone, as Peter put it, "has the words of eternal life" (John 6. 68).

* * *

Think of what the beloved disciple spoke of Our Lord by the Spirit's instruction—"God gave His only-begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3. 16). Even the boldest has not ventured to make a similar claim for any other.

"No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John 1. 18). To declare is "to make known" (Weymouth's tr.). The Greek word suggests the English meaning "to explain". This is an enterprise no mortal man dare venture upon, but "the only-begotten Son" had the knowledge and power to do so (as Ch. 1 of the Epistle to the Hebrews shows). That He came from "the bosom of the Father" is the Hebraic way of expressing the most intimate relationship of filial link as well as knowledge.

"Herein was the love of God manifested in our case, that God hath sent His only-begotten Son into the world that we might live through Him" (1 John 4. 9). The lesson of the Nativity is not the effervescence of a momentary goodwill, but the translation of the people of God 'from death unto life'. The only-begotten Son came to give His life a ransom for many. God can show no deeper or more convincing proof of His love than in the willingness to have His Son take our place; die for our sins, and rise for our justification.

"The Word became flesh and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, glory as of the only-begotten from the Father)" (John 1. 14). The glory of God is the Shekinah glory; the inner glory of Him Who is one with the Father. His light and reflection may be in all who follow Him and faithfully serve and love Him. "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. 2. 9), and that fulness is the glory.

* * *

It must not be forgotten that the Son of God came as the Minister of God's righteousness as well as of His love. He is God's last envoy to mankind, as He made plain in the parable of the wicked husbandmen (Matt. 21. 38, a parable which with the parable of the mustard seed and the parable of the sower, are about the only ones to be recounted in each of the three synoptic Gospels). So, the only-begotten Son is incarnate to warn men to repent, and is the Herald of Judgment. "He that believeth in Him is not judged: he that believeth not hath been judged already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God" (John 3. 18).

* * *

The Christian faith is faith in the revelation, in a perfect human life, of the only and eternally begotten Son of God. That human life is now in Heaven—the first-born of the dead. There He is the pledge to us "Because of life, ye shall live also."

THE REVIVAL OF 1859

by the REVD. N. D. EMERSON

The Irish religious movement of a hundred years ago is commonly called "The Ulster Revival". It had a claim to that description, for its influence was naturally most marked in the area of the chief concentration of Protestant Christians, but the influence of the Revival was felt in most parts of the country, especially in the capital and in the midland counties. We are of course putting an arbitrary and local limitation on the Revival by thinking of it as Irish, for it was indeed world-wide. Its human origins may be traced to New England, especially New York, in 1858, and its effects were still apparent at the end of the century in every continent.

Much modern missionary enterprise, notably on the undenominational and interdenominational side, is due to the Revival. We may also assign to it no small part in the interdenominational convention movement which we connect with the Keswick and similar programmes. We may recognise that popular evangelical pietism as we know it to-day is the fruit of what Dr. Edwin Orr has named "The Second Evangelical Awakening". That is a sound intelligent title for the Revival. It emphasises its likeness to the eighteenth century awakening under Whitefield and the Wesleys, Berridge, Walker, Grimshaw and others. It also places it in a continuity or series: a third or a fourth might be expected.

* * *

What do we mean by "a Revival"? That is a question beset by perplexities. To answer it a hundred years ago was probably easier than it is to-day when we are confused by the short and easy dismissals of religious experience by the psychologists, and bewildered by much pseudo-scientific talk, as well as by rational and intellectual views of the Christian religion which have come to stay with us. Still, we must believe that where there is moral and spiritual renovation of the personality of man there is a work of the Holy Spirit; that where there is an awakened conscience and a cleansed heart there has been a work of Grace; that where truths never denied, but constantly disregarded, become of paramount importance and immediate concern there is a sign of divine power. The man who discounts all this cannot do so on Christian grounds. The inner history of Christianity through the ages acquaints us with the fact of recurring spiritual revival, from Pentecost onward. If Pentecost is authentic then we must recognise the possibility of repetition, even if the incidental phenomena have psychological explanation. We must be careful not to allow the word "enthusiasm" to explain away all that we do not personally care for in Christian experience: remember the story of the blind man in the fourth gospel—"One thing I know; whereas I was blind, now I see." That word of testimony we can never disprove, and it would ill become us to try to discredit it.

Let us say, in brief, that the main feature of the Revival was that great numbers of people began to take their faith seriously. No doubt there is always something embarrassing about this; but the individual clergyman's task and privilege to guide, sympathetically and patiently, and to teach faithfully and charitably must be the way to secure the genuine principles of spiritual revival and to discard the effervescent and the evanescent.

In this connection the events and experiences of 1859 paid little heed to denominational principles. The doctrines emphasised, and confessed were impeccably orthodox, but the ecclesiastical landmarks were sometimes vaulted over. They seemed irrelevant at the time, for in the mid-nineteenth century in Ireland the church principles were 'Establishment' on one hand, and 'Dissent' on the other: not as to-day, when we have the contrast of the traditional orders of the church with the non-episcopal ministries. If the movement was "all of grace" then a grasp of "the common salvation" meant more than discussions of validity. We may therefore recall the events of 1859 as actualities without criticising them from an ecclesiastical standpoint.

* * *

How did the Revival begin? Co. Antrim was the starting-place, and within it the actual spot appears to have been in the parish of Connor. Religion in Ulster was not dead.

Crookshank in his "History of Irish Methodism", vol. 3, refers to small revivals here and there in the North at intervals during the 19th Century, and traces the roots of the revival to Methodist preaching in the town of Antrim. Gibson in his History of the Revival traces it to a deepening religious awareness among the Presbyterians of Connor neighbourhood, and to diligent prayer. The patient and persevering prayers for increased earnestness were stimulated to greater fervency by news of the great prayer-meetings and revival in New York. The result was that in the winter of 1855-1859 what was called great expectancy was felt and by the early summer the movement was spreading rapidly in town and country. Dr. Gibson, a Presbyterian divine, has nothing to say about any Methodist initiation of the revival. The one living authority on the revival, Dr. J. E. Orr, in his interesting and accurate study already referred to—"The Second Evangelical Awakening" (1949)—describes the beginnings in North America, and then records the possibility that the Co. Antrim work may be traced to the visit to Ballymena in 1856 of an English lady, a Mrs. Colville, said to be a Baptist, who did much quiet propaganda work. The fact probably is that by 1858 a return of energetic faith and religious interest was due after the long preoccupation with temporal interests. Revival was in the air. What had gone on in Ireland for the previous thirty years?

1. The agitation over Roman Catholic Emancipation.

2. The Tithe controversies against the State Church.

3. The Repeal of the Union movement.

4. The Young Ireland movement.

5. The Great Famine 1847.

6. The Presbyterian union (Synod of Ulster and Secession Synod)

7. Emigration, especially after the Famine.

8. Ulster Tenant Right struggles.

9. The Education conflicts—national v. church schools.

Was it not time that people turned from these temporal experiences to a level of thought in which men could attain to the full expression of Christian personality?

* * *

What sort of people were the ordinary people of Ulster in the days of our grandparents? Mainly agricultural and rural, for the great expansion of textiles came during the American war, 1861-65, which led to the great growth of urban areas. Mainly illiterate, too, for compulsory primary education was not in force. Yet not stupid or ignorant, but shrewd and prudent and independent.

A relative of mine, born in 1848, one of a family which preserved a cool attitude to religious fervours, often told me of her childhood memories of the revival, and of what her father often described in later years. I asked her about changes in her native place, and she said that one change she noted was the absence of imbeciles, lunatics and oddities from the streets in more modern days as contrasted with their abundance in her youth. I have always thought that that had significant bearing on the physical manifestations associated with the revival. The seizures, prostrations, paroxysms, outcries, which occurred at many revival meetings may be explained in terms of mental weaknesses, hysteria, exhibitionism, and mob psychology. They were quite unknown in the New York revival or elsewhere in America at that period. They were not general; and the better spiritual effects on the more controlled and balanced were independent of the phenomena called "striking down". The "stricken ones" screamed for God's mercy; were prayed with; grew calm and collected; gave testimony; and were made much of.

* * *

When revival spread to one place, the usually accepted practice was to invite the converts to testify. They did so, and a local revival ensued. Something similar no doubt happened in the early church and in later times. We need not say, "Yes, it happened with Montanus", for, as I have said, the orthodoxy of the revival was never in question. The Presbyterian General Assembly, which was much concerned, warned its ministers against "adopting any course of procedure whereby our people may be led to mistake bodily impressions, or even convictions of sin, for genuine conversion to God." They also said that they gladly recognised as one of the most marked evidences of the genuineness of this work, the fact that it has been originated and promoted by means of that system of saving truth set forth in the standards of the church. As the Church of Ireland had then no General Synod we are without any similar pronouncement. We must look to the evidence of individual churchmen, and now I bring that evidence before you. I have gathered it from a longish search in contemporary sources.

* * *

The Rev. Thos. Moriarty, Rector of Drapers-town, Co. Derry, wrote of "The Revival's happy and hopeful influence—the effect on the population at large as to the suppression of crime of all sorts is becoming every day more visible."

The Bishop of Down (Dr. Knox) wrote: "It has been my habit to hold one annual Confirmation in Belfast; but on this occasion, from the number pressing forward, I must hold five." He also spoke of the cessation of party riots in Belfast, and that his official duties gave him "abundant evidence of the great and holy work now leavening his diocese."

The Bishop of Meath wrote that he regarded the work "as of God, and prayed that it may be universally extended."

The Archdeacon of Derry said: "There is a great deal of good connected with the Revival. It is a great and blessed change to see drunkenness now almost unknown; to see sabbath-breaking so much given up. It is a great change to see such numbers now attending the house of worship; to meet so many anxious about religion—Herein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

The Rev. C. Seaver, St. John's, Belfast: "The Lord's work is progressing steadily and satisfactorily."

The Rev. T. Campbell, Trinity Church, Belfast, emphasised the moral reformation due to the Revival.

The Rev. James Garrett, of Kells, Co. Carlow—"The convincing proof of this great work being from Heaven is that all those convinced of sin and made happy in Christ love and honour God's word . . . this great revival which God the Holy Ghost is now accomplishing among us."

The Rev. H. Ward, Killinchy Parish, Co. Down: "That this work is the work of God I have no more doubt than of the truth of the Philippian gaoler's conversion."

The Rev. F. Bewley, Tullylish Parish, Co. Down—"The communicants in the church here have doubled."

The Rev. M. Smyth, Garvagh Parish—"Vice and immorality of every sort are lessened to an incredible extent."

The Rev. Stephen Gwynn, Coleraine: "I believe the Revival is in very truth the work of God, because men and women who lived to sin now live to God."

The great scholar, Edward Hincks, Rector of Killyleagh, in a sermon on "The devices of Satan as they respect a great work of God which is now going on in this country" said: "A great number of persons within and without the pale of the church have been reclaimed from worldliness or formalism or gross sin and led to walk in newness of life through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ." Satan's devices were the transitory physical manifestations.

The Rev. Dr. McNeece (Abp. King's Lecturer in T.C.D.) preached to his flock in the college living of Arboe, Co. Tyrone and said: "There is evidence of a great moral reformation having been effected through the Revival's agency in several localities in the North . . . a deeper and more general interest is evinced on the subject of religion and there is a greater readiness to receive religious instruction." He described and denounced hysteria and excitement, and warned his hearers against popular superstitions as to the supernatural character of bodily affections—"They are unworthy of your education and intelligence."

In the town of Newry united prayer-meetings were held under the presidency of the Dean of Dromore. In the cathedral church of Downpatrick special services were conducted by the Dean, and at one of them the well-known Dr. Drew of Seaforde is said to have preached "a most judicious, able and practical sermon upon the sanctifying and comforting operations of the Holy Ghost." Similar services were held in Derry Cathedral and in the church in Lisburn which is now called the Cathedral.

All our churches in Belfast were under the Revival's influence, and the clergy were continuously concerned with the numerous converts.

An interesting letter was written in August, 1859, to the "Belfast News-Letter" by the Rev. F. F. Trench, rector of Kells, Co. Meath. I quote from it—

"The most interesting inquiry of all connected with this matter, is the question 'What are the fruits?' I heard the Mayor of Belfast state that the results were unquestionably good. Baron Pigott, the Judge at the Downpatrick Assizes, spoke strongly in favour of its fruits and hoped it would extend to the lowest depths of society. The Archdeacon of Derry says that not even prejudice itself can deny that there has arisen a general seriousness among all classes, and a cessation of vice and profligacy, which are in themselves signal blessings for which we should be most thankful to God. With this opinion the Lord Primate has expressed his concurrence."

Some fifty years ago the Rev. D. McMeekin of Ballymena, a Presbyterian minister, published his "Memories of '59". He recalled the influence of Mrs. Colville in Ballymena, and wrote of the Revival effects then—"Drunkards ceased to drink and blaspheme; courts and petty sessions were poorly patronised; magistrates had little to do; even the police lolled idly in barracks. Fairs and markets—often scenes of drunkenness, changed their aspect. In 81 congregations in Co. Antrim there was in one year an addition of 4,353 to the Communion roll. The majority kept true to their allegiance." Knox, the rector of Shankill, Lurgan, gave a similar account of the results in his parish.

I have claimed doctrinal orthodoxy for the Revival. McMeekin makes mention of some errors among the ignorant, and traces them to teaching embodied in unscriptural hymns. He may mean little more than deviations from strict Calvinism. He also recalled some visions alleged to have occurred—a member of the Covenanting Church, he says, declared that she had had a vision of heaven, and that nearly all its occupants were Covenanters.

George Salmon is the final witness I call. He wrote: "When all deductions are made I trust that much will remain to the praise and glory of the Lord in the day of His appearing."

What good came of it at last? I believe that we are still enjoying many of its beneficent results in Ireland. The fact that Christianity is professed and honoured: the fact that public worship is a duty and privilege generally recognised: the respect for truth, for Christian morality, for Holy Scripture; the ability to distinguish the primary Christian principles from secondary and side-issues—all this, though not created by the Revival, which is obvious of course, may be considered, as in truth it is, revived Christianity—the Revival did not innovate; it renewed and revitalised what was there as our age-long tradition and inheritance.

It would take too long to dwell on the personalities of the Revival, and to make various criticisms of some of its presuppositions. I must be content to leave the topic thus inadequately presented—If it was not of God it must have come to naught—no one to-day will call 1859 what Isaac Nelson called it—"The year of Delusion." The passing of a hundred years has shown that it gave us something worthwhile.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 3.

The history of the Gideons International goes back to 1874, when a boy called John Nicholson promised his dying mother that he would read the Testament daily for the rest of his life. Nicholson became a commercial traveller, and he and two friends formed themselves into a fellowship for Christian businessmen to be an arm of the Churches in the business sphere.

A Gideon member, travelling in England in 1908, found a Bible in his hotel room, and, on returning home, suggested that the Word should be spread by the Gideons throughout hotels in the United States.

Ninety-six per cent. of all American hotel bedrooms now have Gideon Bibles, and the Gideons have distributed a total of thirty-eight million to hotels, hospitals, schools, prisons and members of the Forces. The Gideons number 20,000, and have spread to twenty-six countries.

—"Church Times", Dec. 5, 1958.

* * *

Rome in South America

A conference of about fifty Latin American Bishops has been held in Rome to plan future strategy for the Roman Catholic Church in their continent. The Bishops discussed ways of combating the effects of leakage from the Roman Catholic Church to indifferentism and to non-Catholic religious bodies. Archbishop Antonio Samore, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Extraordinary Affairs, and formerly Papal Nuncio to Colombia, stressed that "we are not against anyone or anything, but we simply strive to strengthen our own faith to increase the number of our priests, and to make their work effective". The Archbishop described steps being taken in Belgium, Spain, France, Ireland, and Germany, to send priests to Latin America, which has a nominal third of the world's Roman Catholic population, and is suffering from shortage of trained clergy. Ninety priests are now being trained at Louvain in Belgium. Suggestions by the Bishops included the use of radio in Spanish to combat poor knowledge of Catholic teaching, provision of more Bibles, Bible-reading campaigns, and more catechetical literature. The concern of these prelates is in its way a tribute to the effective work of the Protestant missions. Now is the time to press on with Gospel work.

—"The Christian", Nov., 1958.

* * *

AN AUSTRALIAN VIEW

A Roman Catholic Reformation

A Roman Catholic Reformation is stealing the thunder of Protestantism.

The attitude towards Protestantism and all its achievements, practices and spiritual possessions is being subject to a marvellous change on the part of the Roman Catholic priesthood, as manifested in their principal Church press organs. They are discovering that there are spiritual possessions possessed by Protestants which are of the highest character and that a practice of these is most praiseworthy and worthy of imitation by the Roman Church which have been absent from their own practices in the past. Although they will benefit by the imitation and adoption of such practices their attitude of hostility to Protestantism will not be really changed since they will still claim that they are the one and only church and the only true religion.

Stealing the thunder of Protestantism they have discovered:

- (1) The use that can be made of the laity.
- (2) The help committees of women can give.
- (3) And their use in connection with School development.
- (4) The rigid authoritarian attitude of priesthood is being modified by relying more on the help of the lay folk to penetrate where they have no entry or justification for intruding their presence.
- (5) The use of the Bible by lay folk.
- (6) The help Community Hymn singing is to worship.

For instance they have recently discovered that in their deification of the priesthood and subservience of the laity and their failure to make use of them in most of the activities of the Church has been a grave blunder and weakness and accordingly are now encouraging the R.C. laity to help the priesthood in many directions.

Their almost sudden encouragement amongst the laity of Bible reading and the singing of hymns is also symptomatic of this same discovery that they have hitherto failed to make use of their laity and permit them to take an active part in the work of the Church and its services. Now, of course, these phenomena are the direct result of contact with the Protestant population which they have lately discovered takes part in the work and practice of the Church and are accordingly both a help and a buttress for their ministers.

They consider their sudden discovery that they can make great use of lay women on School committees and give them and their menfolk some interest in the development of the school system, in which hitherto they have neither owned a single brick or had a say in the conduct of the schools. It will be interesting to discover how far they dare to go in this direction because the laity may want to have more to say in the future than has been permitted in the past.

—"The Vigilant", Melbourne, Oct., 1958.

* * *

Ten Million Protestants

"The Catholic Church relies principally on tradition and takes it for granted that children of Catholic parents will be good Catholics. Protestant evangelists are more aggressive; they go out and try to reach people who have lost contact with their church." The speaker was Buenos Aires' Methodist Bishop Sante Uberto Barbieri, and as he spoke last week, some 22,000 Protestants—laymen and women as well as ordained ministers—were busily evangelizing Latin America in a Protestant movement that is reaching major proportions. Protestant missionaries face the spears of Ecuador's Auca Indians; they educate—and influence—Catholic children squeezed from parochial schools by the continent-wide shortage of classrooms; they befriend the thousands of bewildered European and Asian immigrants who arrive each year only to run up against the language-barricaded snobbery of many Latins.

In a hemisphere where better than 90% of the people in almost every mainland country are baptised Catholics, the number of Protestant converts has jumped into the millions. Bishop Barbieri estimates a Protestant church membership of 5,000,000, a total Protestant community of 10 million, including all children, teen-agers and others who for one reason or another have not formally announced their Protestantism. Brazil alone, says the bishop, has a community of 4,000,000 Protestants. Even by Catholic computation, the figure last year was 4,825,000 for South America, and Catholics admit that the totals are growing by leaps and bounds.

The heavy Protestant invasion is partly due to the fact that the Far East, long a prime missionary target, has been largely closed by war or Communism for the past two decades. But it is not the only reason. While there are five times as many Catholic priests, nuns and brothers in Latin America as there are Protestant churchmen and women, the Catholics must tend their already established flocks, while Protestants can put more time and money into missionary work. Protestant missionaries supply remote outposts with their own airlines (Time, Jan. 6), run their own radio networks, gave away free nearly 5,000,000 Spanish- and Portuguese-language Protestant Bibles in 1956 alone.

So rapidly is Protestantism spreading that the Vatican has paid it the compliment of being seriously concerned. Pope Pius lists "four mortal perils" that are threatening the Catholic Church in Latin America. Among them, "Protestant invasion" ranked high.*

*The other mortal perils: "Communism, secularism and "a disquieting spiritism."

—Time, September, 1958.

VIOLIN required. Please state particulars (wanted for school). Box 1, this office.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	n. d.
William Bedell	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0 4
The Confessional	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing
"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

DOORS OF OPPORTUNITY

are opening for the distribution of God's Word in

SPAIN

FRANCE

INDIA

N. AFRICA

WEST INDIES

and many other countries.

All who cherish the Bible as the Word of God, and desire its world-wide circulation are invited to co-operate prayerfully and practically with the

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7, Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 2—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS.
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	13
"John Five": A Testimony to God the Son	15
Correspondence—The Revival of 1859	17
Editor's Chair	18
The Strange Tale of Constantine's Gift	20
The Liberal Revolution vs. the Roman Catholic Revolution	22
Review	23

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

ARAB REFUGEES

By Philip Barron

To-day, after eleven years of exile, there is little change in the condition of one million Palestine Arabs. They still draw the same low ration of 1,500 to 1,600 calories a day (2,000 is considered a minimum for health). They have received no compensation for the loss of their land and property. Their sedentary life in camps and huts not their own, with only sporadic employment, has tended to lower their sense of home and community responsibility, or else to channel those pent-up feelings into expressions of bitterness towards the Western countries, whom they hold responsible for their plight. The refugee problem is "the focus of deadly infection which poisons the whole body of the Near East".

Jerusalem, the Holy City, remains divided by high walls, barbed wire and a No Man's Land strewn with mines. On the cold hilltops to the north and south, are numerous camps where refugees from Jaffa and the Plain of Sharon wait in sight of their homes for the return from exile which they remain confident must take place one day. But a permanent over-all solution must presumably be political in nature and it is not yet in sight.

Meanwhile, the refugees need help—to stay alive and to preserve, as far as possible, their human dignity. Nearly half this vast "tribe" are children. Births are at the rate of 30,000 a year and exceed deaths, so that the problem, far from dwindling, is actually growing.

UNRWA (United Nations Relief and Works Agency), making the best of a pitifully small budget, provides the subsistence ration and also runs a number of schools, clinics, and hospitals, but it looks to the voluntary agencies to clothe the refugees and to plug the enormous gaps in the "social services". Most of this work is done by Christian agencies, who try to provide, for instance, supplementary food for the less hardy, special aid for the handicapped, medical care, and used clothing from the West.

The co-ordinating body is the Near East Christian Council's Committee for Refugee Work, whose executive secretary is provided by the World Council of Churches (Inter-Church Aid). The World Council also sends regular financial aid, Britain's contribution in the past year being £8,000.

The Palestine Arab refugees are now scattered over the Near East as follows (figures approximate): West Jordan, 390,000; East Jordan, 146,000 (the total for Jordan is slightly more than the indigenous population); Gaza Strip, 221,000 (three times the native population); Lebanon, 102,000; Syria, 92,000; Egypt, 5,000. An Arab minority estimated at 17,000 remains in Israel.

—"The Christian", 28 Nov., 1958.

* * *

Spanish Protestants: More Repression

From various sources in Spain comes news which is the very opposite of that from Italy. We learn that several Protestant places of worship have been closed by the police in Barcelona and in Madrid, and it is evident that the general situation for Spanish Protestants has once again become critical. Yet in spite of official attempts at repression, the Word of God is not bound. Where opportunities present themselves for Christian believers to meet together for worship and fellowship, attendances are being maintained, courageous witness is being borne, and conversions are recorded. There are also gleams of light, even with regard to the difficulties experienced in some parts of the country in obtaining permission from the courts for former Roman Catholics to be married outside the Roman Church. There is an impression that with the accession of a new Pope, religious conditions in Spain may change somewhat in the near future, but in which direction no one appears able to say. Maybe there is justification for thinking that they could hardly be worse than they are at present.

Spain and Nato

According to the "Daily Telegraph" Britain will not take steps to enrol Spain as a member of Nato in view of the opposition it would arouse from certain member-countries. It appears that membership of Nato necessitates an unanimous vote. It transpired during the debate in the House of Lords that feeling against Spain ran so high that if the matter was proceeded with the nation might be split. Lord Gosford said that Spain was becoming gradually more associated with Western European organisations. Viscount Alexander of Hillsborough thought the motion ill-timed and so the matter was not proceeded with. Which reminds one how for many years Roman Catholic Spain has ploughed her own lonely furrow in disregard to the needs of Europe. It seems plain that the Vatican influence is largely responsible for this. The people's interests are not usually the concern of the Vatican. That fact is so often plain in the world's news.

—"Protestant World", Sydney, Aug., 1958.

* * *

Something Has Come Between Us and The Bible, Says The Bishop of Southwell

"The Result is Spiritual Malnutrition"

In a recent survey in the United States over four out of every five adult Americans said that they believed the Bible to be the "revealed word of God" rather than merely "a piece of great literature". Yet, when they were asked to give the names of the first four books of the New Testament, 53 per cent. could not name even one! This is one of the statements made by the Bishop of Southwell (Dr. F. R. Barry) in his Diocesan News this Month. "The Bible," remarks the author who reports this, "can hardly be said to enter into the life and thought of Americans quite so much as their views on its divine inspiration and their eagerness to buy and distribute it might suggest."

"Is it so very different in this country?" the Bishop asks. "People still speak of the Bible as 'The Good Book', it is kept, carefully dusted, on a side table; parents and education authorities take care that copies are given to the children; public speakers refer to its rule for living (real or supposed) in their perorations. But what percentage of Englishmen ever read it? It is doubtful indeed whether a high percentage even of practising Christians and churchgoers read Scripture with any regularity—even the simplest biblical allusion is often lost on the modern congregation. And many who do try, read without understanding and apparently suck thereout but small advantage. Something has come between us and it.

Bible and History

"The result is spiritual malnutrition. G. M. Trevelyan wrote in one of his books that you cannot understand English history without a working acquaintance with the Bible. So deep and penetrating has been its influence on our thought, our character and our religion. Some secret strength drains out when we lose touch with it. But more than that—Christianity itself, 'as this Church and realm have received the same', has been fed, enlightened and steadied by the Scriptures, and cannot fail to degenerate without them. One can hardly exaggerate the emphasis which the Church of England lays on the Bible either in the Ordination service or in its teaching and public worship. The Prayer Book is scriptural through and through. There is, I should think, no Church in Christendom which has gone so far in building its forms of worship on the Bible and systematic reading of it. That belongs to the Anglican inheritance. But it is not only a matter of public worship. Our Church wants our personal religion to be nurtured and sustained by the Word of God speaking to heart and mind through the Bible; and if not, the whole quality of Christian life is almost bound to be lamentably impoverished."

Dr. Barry continues: "At the Lambeth Conference we felt that urgently. If there is to be a revival of church life, in Catholic width and Evangelical depth, we must learn to make the Bible our own again. In one of their resolutions (No. 12) the Bishops ask all the Anglican churches 'to engage in a special effort during the next 10 years to extend the scope and deepen the quality of personal and corporate study of the Bible.'

Deeply Relevant

"Just the kind of thing that Bishops say?" They were not merely repeating pious platitudes. And they certainly are not blind to the difficulties. 'Something has come between us and the Bible.' What? The first sentence in the report is this: 'The Bible and the modern world seem at first sight to be very far apart and, even among those who wish to see the bearing of the one upon the other, there are many who are perplexed how to do so.' You couldn't put it fairer than that. The Bible tells the story of an ancient people, with a primitive agrarian culture and a pre-scientific outlook on the universe. We live in an industrial society in which our thought and outlook are dominated by the so-called scientific attitude. How can the Bible speak to our condition? 'Every-

(Continued on p. 24.)

"JOHN FIVE":

A TESTIMONY TO GOD THE SON

We believe that people who are soundly and fully instructed in the teaching of Holy Scripture are fairly safe from the influence of false doctrines; whether Roman or so-called Protestant. The people of God have to steer a careful course to-day between the old errors and the new: they must clearly distinguish the faith of the Gospel from the ancient inveterate mistakes we rejected at the Reformation, and from the false mushroom growths of distorted faith of the present hour.

It is foolish to assume that because a sect rejects the characteristic dogmas of Roman Catholicism, it must teach a genuine evangelical and orthodox faith. It is equally foolish to conclude that because certain forms of "Protestantism" are wrong, Rome must be right.

* * *

Well-intentioned but simple people are often misled by appearances—they may be invited to attend religious meetings in which the Bible teaching appears to be good, or to read periodicals and pamphlets which have a plausible air of genuine evangelical religion, and these occasions may seem to be instructive and truthful. If the deceptive teaching were plainly deceptive no one would be taken in; but naturally the appearance is thoroughly innocent. For instance, we have listened to Christian Science lectures and agreed with almost everything said, so thoroughly innocuous and truthful it was. But, it was not the real teaching of Christian Science; it was the inviting alluring talk which was meant to secure attentive hearing and arouse interest and sympathetic attention. The well-turned out American gentleman with suave and gracious and very assured manner was not teaching the false lessons of his sect, but only the elements of truth which serve to entangle the unwary.

* * *

In the same way we might listen to Jehovah's Witnesses, and be impressed by their apparently intense belief in the Bible, in the interpretation they give, and in their confidence that they are right. But, if we heeded them we would be bound to say that the entire Christian Church has been in soul destroying error from the very start—that the ancient Fathers, the ancient Creeds, the long line of evangelical reformers, Wyclif, Huss, à Kempis, Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, Hooker, and countless others did not know the truth at all. We would be bound to say that the practically universal stream of Christian understanding of God's Word about the things of eternity—is nothing but age-long blundering and confusion. We would be bound to believe that the great scholars and saints of our faith were blind guides, and that saving truth was concealed from our race till "Pastor" Russell in the 19th century, and "Judge" Rutherford in the 20th appointed themselves as agents of light.

* * *

We could develop further illustrations from other sects which shelter under the word "Protestant", and by using the word are able to command a degree of attention which they could not have otherwise. We think we have made our point, that if people really knew God's word they could discern false assumptions and protect themselves and others from the insinuation of teachings which move far from the plain precepts of the Bible. Let no one say that apparently sensible people cannot be wrong; the most preposterous things have been believed by men of great abilities, and Church history displays many sects in every age which strayed far from truth. It tells us of many who discarded old errors only to fall into new ones.

What we need is, first, sound knowledge of God's Word and honest familiarity with it; and, secondly, we need to keep ourselves in the main stream of Scripture interpretation. The true value of Christian tradition is not that it supplies dogmas which cannot be derived from or substantiated from, God's Word, or that it is an equal source of truth; but that it is evidence of the plain and open interpretation of the faith which has been the strength and comfort of God's people in all generations. We can claim that the Divine promise that the Holy Spirit would guide into all truth has been kept. The evangelical tradition of Christianity is proof of this.

If we have the deeper knowledge of Scripture, and the orthodox understanding of it, we shall be safe indeed from the intrusion of false teaching, and a garbled explanation of a few texts will not overthrow our faith and pervert us. Knowledge of the Bible will protect us from taking a worldly view of faith: by that we mean that we shall not be impressed by numerical successes or large numbers. The Bible never considers numbers to be a sign of truth, and Our Lord doubted if He would find faith on the earth when He comes again. If majorities are bound to be right, then Christianity is wrong, for in this world it is a minority religion. If majorities are right, then Israel in the pre-Christian period was not, could not have been, God's chosen: being a tiny minority it must, on this assumption, have been mistaken.

* * *

These points, however clumsily put, are important. We must keep on the well-worn path of evangelical truth. It is the safe road to follow, the road of apostles and prophets, the road of the sincere disciples in all ages—"we believe that we shall be saved through the grace of the Lord Jesus, in like manner as they" (Acts. 15, 11). "Repentance towards God, and faith towards Our Lord Jesus Christ," and not special revelations and peculiar notions of doctrine are the necessary things for all of us. We need the Spirit of God, not abnormal ingenuity of interpretation, to keep us in the truth.

* * *

Now let us turn to John Five. We want to show how it compels us to recognise the truth that Our Lord is God the Son, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. Neither "Person" nor "Trinity" are in the Christological vocabulary of the New Testament, but they do not teach "Three Gods", or that there are "Persons" in the modern sense of separate individual personalities. The distinctions are scriptural: facts of revelation and not of psychology. We do not depend on one or two isolated texts for our doctrine of Eternal Sonship, but on the whole tenour of Holy Scripture, and thus may study this chapter of the Fourth Gospel as leading with calm and restrained inevitability to the evangelical Catholic faith in the Holy and Undivided Trinity.

* * *

1. Our Lord is the source of most words in this chapter. He refers to His work and to the Father's work in such a way as to imply that there is a continuity, and that the work (creation and redemption) is one and the same and that the Father and Son are one—"My Father worketh even until now, and I work" (v. 17). The immediate reaction of the Jews was to interpret in a hostile (but perfectly correct) manner this saying—"He called God His own Father, making Himself equal with God" (v. 18).

* * *

2. Our Lord displays the most complete understanding of all God's work and will. It is not so much work shared, as work done in perfect unity and without the faintest element of difference (see the opening verses of chapter one of this Gospel)—"The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father doing: for whatsoever things He doeth, these the Son also doeth in like manner . . . the Father sheweth Him all things that Himself doeth . . . the Father hath given all judgment unto the Son" (verses 19, 20, 22, 27). We consider it impossible that the unique prerogatives of Almighty God could be transferred to one inferior in nature to Jehovah, so that we consider the above quotations to establish the Son's oneness with the Father.

* * *

3. A further group of quotations will establish the Son's equality with the Father: "As the Father quickeneth the dead, even so the Son also quickeneth whom He will" (v. 21). "All men honour the Son even as they honour the Father" (v. 23). "As the Father hath life in Himself, even so gave He to the Son to have life in Himself" (v. 26). "The works which the Father hath given Me to accomplish (i.e. to bring to completion) . . . bear witness of Me" (v. 36).

Quickening, or raising, the dead is a work of God the Father, according to His own will. Our Lord says that He too raises the dead according to His own will, which to all reasonable men implies equality, not inferiority.

Equal honour is not to be explained away. An ambassador may be called a viceroy, but he is not accorded "equal honour". That can be given only to an equal, and that is what Christians have always recognised. We have not had to try to wriggle out of it, and we have never found any awkward statements in the New Testament to embarrass us in our Trinitarian faith. It is true that formerly some people employed verse 16 of Hebrews ch. 2 as a "proof" text. This is not usual now, but its abandonment is not a weakening of the doctrine. It is only a consequence of a better understanding of the Greek word. Similarly, the verse (the "Johannine comma") in 1 John 5 which was an ancient comment which crept into certain mss. of the Greek, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one" has been left out of the Revised Version. As it was not part of the original epistle 1 John its omission cannot weaken the New Testament teaching on the subject of the Godhead of Christ. We do not think it necessary to say as some Roman Catholic Biblical scholars say "this verse does not occur in any good Greek manuscript, but the Latin manuscripts may have preserved the true text" (Mgr. Knox "The N.T. in English"), for the much more eminent Biblical scholars of the Biblical Institute in Jerusalem say that the verse is absent from the better Latin manuscripts ("La Sainte Bible", often called "The Jerusalem Bible", a French translation of the Hebrew and Greek, 1956).

The completing of God's work is so stupendous an enterprise, and so exalted, that we cannot possibly hold that it was left to be done by an inferior. It is the crown of God's purposes, contemplated from eternity before the world was (Ephesians 1): how then can we think of the end as left to one who is less than the Father? In what sense do these works "bear witness" of Christ so as to distinguish Him from, say, John the Baptist, if not by revealing His Godhead? Only thus can the phrase He used have real significance.

* * *

4. The Witnesses to Christ are named by Him in this chapter, and we are entitled to emphasise that the Witness has to be to something totally outside normal experience.

a. John the Baptist (verse 33). John had said "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." When later he enquired "Art Thou He that should come?" Our Lord answered by pointing to the works of God He had already done.

b. The works of Christ (verse 36). Here is the invitation to study the truth implied in the works (signs, wonders, etc.). We must go beyond the opinion "no man can do the works Thou doest except God be with Him," and say not only that "God is with Him," but that in Him "dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

c. The Father (verses 37, 38). The message of the Father's witness culminates in the Son's claim that "ye may have life" if ye come to Him. Here again we see the whole prerogative of God being exercised by the Son, yet the Father "cannot deny Himself", and this He would do if the Son did not share the Godhead. To argue that the Son is "a God", not Jehovah, but something less is a sort of Arian polytheism, or polytheistic Arianism. Whichever way you put it, it is intellectually indefensible, an outrage upon reasonable faith, and a contradiction of God's word.

d. The Scriptures (verses 39, 45-47). "They testify of Me." Read chapter 24 of St. Luke, especially marking verses 25 to 27. There Our Lord states that He is the great theme of the Old Testament. His words leave the student of the Bible no alternative: either He is Jehovah, or He made a profound mistake. No discerning reader of Holy Scripture will fail to see that if the Bible is God's word, inspired by His spirit, Jesus is, as Thomas put it, "My Lord and my God."

Let us thank God for the blessedness which comes from reading His word with eager though humble faith. May it be true of every one of us that

"Thy statutes have been our songs
In the house of our pilgrimage."

(Ps. 119).

Then there is good prospect that "we shall see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." (2 Cor. 4. 6).

CORRESPONDENCE

The Revival of 1859

We have been asked if the Revival of some ten years ago in the island of Lewis bore any resemblance to the Ulster Revival of 1859. On reading Mr. Campbell's booklet on the Revival in Lewis we note time after time the occurrence of characteristics of the earlier movement.

We may set out some of these features

- The long preparation of earnest prayer;
- the spirit of expectancy;
- the suspension of daily work and normal occupations;
- the awareness on occasions in churches and elsewhere of supernatural power;
- the fervency of prayer throughout the Revival;
- the extraordinary physical effects of spiritual anxiety and conviction in certain instances (perhaps more widespread in the far greater population of Ulster a century ago than in Lewis);
- the moral reclamation of many by turning to sobriety and decency;
- the evangelical orthodoxy of the faith proclaimed.

These points seem to us typical of both revivals. We wish it could be recognised more generally that man's first concern is with God. We can truthfully say that that recognition is the hall-mark of genuine Revival.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE UNITY OF THE CHURCH.

Most of our readers know that the month of January is chosen as the season for prayer for the unity of the Church of Christ. The first part of the month has, for many years, been marked by a week of prayer sponsored by the World's Evangelical Alliance. Possibly this work, though commended by many leaders of all Churches, Anglican, Presbyterian, etc., is less observed than it used to be—for instance, we recall that in the city of Dublin much support used to be given to the meetings; and prayer-lists and commendations were circulated beforehand, but nowadays nothing is heard of the Evangelical Alliance. We are aware that there is a certain recoil from the word "Evangelical" in some circles, but we do not think that we have yet reached the stage when Protestant Christians may not pray together. The more likely reason for the decline of this Evangelical Alliance observance (here, though possibly not in other places) is that there is another week of prayer for unity regularly observed towards the end of the month. This later week of prayer is at once wider and narrower than the Alliance Week: it is wider in the sense that Roman Catholics and Orthodox, as well as Protestants, join in observing it, and narrower in the sense that while they all pray for unity they do not pray unitedly.

* * *

It is well-known that Roman Catholics are not permitted by their authorities to unite openly in prayer, no matter what the purpose may be, with other Christians. Possibly they may be physically in each other's company and so pray silently for a common object, and possibly they might say together the Lord's Prayer. Of this we are not sure, as we have heard it stated that they cannot use the Lord's Prayer with other Christians as they cannot mean the same thing by it, and so will be praying for contradictory answers. One example of this which is usually given is the petition "Thy Kingdom come". To the Protestant (evangelical) the petition expresses the desire that all things on earth, man's will as well as all else, will be brought into entire and loving subjection to the purposes and will of God; and that Christ may soon reign unchallenged and supreme over all. To the Roman Catholic, who mistakes the Kingdom for his Church, the petition asks that the Latin Church of the West may be acknowledged as the Bride of Christ, infallible and having all things subject to it.

Another instance of what we may moderately call "opposed intentions" is found in the petition "Thy will be done". The evangelical believes that this means that men should turn from sin and trespass and rebellion against God and wholeheartedly obey His Commandments. The Roman Catholic, we suppose, is likely to construe it to mean that God's will is the Church's will, and that what is sought is the obedience of all men to that Church's dogmas and laws.

If we emphasise these different views of the Lord's Prayer it is plain that there is no unity of intention. But we think we ought to say that if people sincerely pray that God's will be done, a right and dutiful prayer has been offered. If we are all agreed in wanting God's will done then we can leave the prayer at the Throne of Grace collectively, even if we differ as to the meaning. We know that "Thy will be done" can never sound ambiguously in the ear of God. His will is not conflict or opposition, nor is it at cross-purposes. His will is in eternal harmony with itself.

Thus, we do not see that it is improper for divided Christians to use the Lord's Prayer together. We have often heard it said in praise of this prayer that it is wonderfully designed by its Divine Author to be comprehensive in the highest degree, so that Jews and Christians, even Moslems and others, can pray it together.

* * *

This, however, is a side-issue as our subject is Christian Unity and the particular prayer is cited as an illustration.

We have said that the season of prayer for unity which occurs towards the end of January each year is narrower in that separated Churches do not meet together for united prayer (though there are gatherings of individual believers). The practice of praying for unity is not thereby rendered insincere. It is right to pray that God will teach us the importance of unity, and that He will teach each part of His Church to realise what it has done, and is still doing, to hinder unity. Even if a Church assumes that it is blameless, or so little blameworthy that none ought ever to have separated from it, we still may believe that God "to Whom all hearts are open" can lead that Church to a truer sense of its failings and responsibilities for division. Prayer to God should be controlled by the proviso "Thy will be done" as we see in Our Lord's prayers in Gethsemane. It should not be offered with the assumption that we know His will quite clearly.

* * *

Of course we all tend to assume that our own Churches are right in their theology and right in their practice. At least our fathers thought so, even if this generation is not so confident. Should we assume that we need no improvements? A prayer much used in Ireland has the requests that God will "correct what is amiss, and supply what is lacking". Some add to this "and reconcile what is divided". The addition would not be necessary if we truly perceived that we all have things amiss and that we all have things wanting. Chief among them are the errors of self-will, self-satisfaction, complacency, and pride. We lack the fervent loving desire to be really one in Christ. In short, the New Testament quality of "philadelphia", "brotherly love", is very scarce. If we add to this the power of old habits of mind and the middle-aged "contentment with things as they are" we can see some very tough obstacles to visible unity, and often to invisible unity as well.

* * *

We can say these things in our own household of faith, i.e., among those who are agreed in the necessary truths of Christianity. By this we mean those who hold to evangelical orthodoxy (which is truthfully the ancient Catholic faith of the Gospel). The reason is that there is no profound gulf which separates any one of our Churches from any other. We may differ over order and Forms of Worship, but these are the instrumentalities of truth, not truth itself. They are the apparatus of the Christian experiment, not the spiritual power within.

Where the living Christ and His Word are supreme and unquestioned we have the inner unity. In Him we are undeniably one. Was this not remarkably exemplified in the great Irish Revival of a century ago? In last month's issue we printed an article on that Revival which showed that the whole community shared in the spiritual blessing because they were one in the necessary truths of the Gospel. In the Revival no one rose up as leader, and no one organised and directed the movement. No new doctrines were preached (for the Irish Christians knew well then, as they do to-day, that there can be no new doctrines), and no new denomination or sect appeared. In 1859 the Church of Ireland and the Presbyterian Churches and the Methodists were wide-open and faithful, and received a vast increase, to their permanent enrichment.

We may have our minor differences, and may wish that we could persuade each other to accept our own point of view, but we do not deny the full measure of Christian graces, blessings, and privileges to each other.

* * *

Even if some of us interpret our prayers for unity as meaning that we want God to change Methodists into Anglicans or Anglicans into Presbyterians, the more intelligent and faithful who pray for a united Church want one which will be neither C. of E. nor Methodist or Presbyterian, but the outgrowth, flowering and fruition of the best in all three, and in the other communions who share the faith with us. Here again the essential principle of true prayer must overrule everything—"Thy will be done."

* * *

But some will say, "if we are at one in the fundamental truths of our faith, and believe that we shall all be saved by the grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ, why agitate over visible or organised unity? If we have the unity that matters, why worry over secondary issues?" We agree that there is much in this sort of criticism of unity plans which demands serious attention. We admit that

1. There is much to be said against a World Church.

2. Most people are probably better able to grasp and value the smaller unit than the great one.

3. Our traditional inheritances ought not to be absorbed into a great new organisation so as to be well-nigh lost.

4. The spiritual interests of Christians might be under bureaucratic control and directed by persons quite alien to us in many important ways.

We could say a great deal more on these points, but we are prepared to believe that they represent the uneasy feelings of very many earnest people. No doubt the chief workers in the cause of unity have answers to these things: but we set them down because they show that opposition to unity may not be mere obstinacy or conservatism.

* * *

It is interesting to learn from an article in the "Manchester Guardian" of 16 Jan., 1959 (by Canon Roger Lloyd) that among the pioneers of prayer for unity were two French Roman Catholic priests. A few people may say that this fact shows that the movement is a subtle technique for getting us all back to Rome! But if we keep in mind the all-controlling principle of prayer—"Thy will be done", how can we go astray? Canon Lloyd does not always command agreement. For instance he writes: "Everywhere it is realised that schism is a deadly sin." This is plain nonsense. Not long ago we had occasion to remark to a colleague that a certain word has been rarely heard in ecclesiastical circles of late. That word is "truth". We may have unity in error, as well as in truth; and we may have schism in the interests of truth as well as in error. The Reformation of the sixteenth century was schism, but that schism was demanded by the force of truth. To heal a schism without asserting truth's paramount claims would be deadly sin! Canon Lloyd's statement seems to us to overlook the primary issue of truth.

* * *

We recognise, of course, that there are schisms in which the basic truth of the Gospel is not involved. We would probably admit that where there is no vital Christian principle at stake there is little beyond ingrained habit to sustain separation. But where vital principles are involved then separation is morally justified, and unity is not.

* * *

The above considerations show how right is the union of Churches now in being in South India. The Christians there, after long study of the will of God and the realities of their own situation, united into one Church, and God is prospering them. Christians in South India had not had the prejudices of many generations to overcome. They would not identify themselves with the tedious tradition of European sectarian history: God's will for them was a liberation from the profitless things of the past so that they could concentrate on the future.

It is far otherwise in the wider question of general reunion. Rome must agree with our conviction of truth, or we must agree with hers: is there a third possibility that we both transcend our present beliefs and find a higher level of Christianity? That can only be a truly Scriptural Christianity. On our side most of us are willing to abide by Scriptural Christianity for we have never retreated from the position that the Word of God is our Rule of Faith.

* * *

Canon Lloyd suggests that we ought to look far more to the Church life of the early centuries than the Church of the middle ages or of the age of the Reformation. This is, in fact, a view held in Anglianism, for the 30th of the Church of England canons (which is also adopted in Ireland) emphasises the teaching of the ancient Church before the growth and influence of papal power upon it. The ancient church was not flawless, but it had faith and worship capable of helping us in our problems to-day. Nevertheless we can only copy the ancient Church to a limited extent, for its philosophy and science belong to antiquity, and its theology was still indeterminate. All this leads to the conviction that the only hopeful ground of unity is in common agreement that the Bible is the Rule of Faith, and that within its generous embrace many varieties of religious thought may be sheltered, and the errors of later days corrected.

* * *

Let us continue to pray for unity in the will of God. What we need is the desire to see His people and Church as God sees them. Our Lord prayed (John 17) that all might be one so that the world might believe in "His" divine mission. His standard of unity was the unity between Himself and the Father, a unity therefore of will and purpose: is this beyond the power of Christians to-day?

THE STRANGE TALE OF CONSTANTINE'S GIFT

Constantine was one of the greater emperors. Indeed history has agreed to call him Constantine the Great. The pope of the time was Sylvester, a not very great bishop of Rome, whose name has got tangled up with that of the emperor, so that it is very difficult sometimes to say what is legend and what is truth. No one nowadays has any doubt that the Donation of Constantine is purely a fiction, but the story was made much of in order to lift the popes into power, so it may be a good ending to our series to tell over again the strange story of Constantine's gift.

Constantine was the son of Constantius, one of the "Caesars" through whom Diocletian ruled his vast empire. Diocletian was the last and the worst of the persecutors of the Christian Church. When he failed to crush the Church, it was becoming plain that some other policy would have to be adopted, and it was Constantine who adopted it. His mother was that Helena, who, as we have seen, is credited with having discovered the True Cross. She seems to have been a woman of lowly birth, who held for a time the favour of the "Caesar", but who was later divorced. She did not, however, lose the affection of her only son, for later on we find Constantine, now emperor of all the Roman dominions, striking coins with her portrait on them.

When Diocletian abdicated in 305, Constantius became emperor of the West, and Constantine became Caesar in his place. A year later his father died, and Constantine became emperor in the West, and after struggling with many rival claimants, became sole emperor. He had become impressed with the power and organisation of the Church and was inclined to view it with favour and take it for an ally. When, before his last battle for supremacy, he had a vision of a shining cross with the inscription, "under this sign conquer," and he did conquer, it was easy enough to come to terms with the new religion. By the Edict of Milan, Christianity became first of all a legal religion and then a favoured religion, so it was plain to see that the Faith had conquered the Empire.

The relation of Constantine to his new ally was always a little puzzling. He favoured the Church, and lavished gifts upon it, but he could hardly be said to be himself a Christian. He presided at Church Councils, like the famous Council of Nicea, and he used all his influence to bring people within the fold. Christianity then, was not one lawful religion among many. It was the coming religion and the emperor's favourite.

The pope of this time was not one of the great popes. In fact very little is known about him; and it is one of the puzzles of history that so insignificant a person, should be so prominent a figure. He was the son of one Rufinus, and his mother's name was Justa. He became pope in 314, on the death of Miltiades (or Melchiades) and according to legend, met with and befriended the emperor. The new Roman Catholic Dictionary of Saints gives us only six lines about him and these are not very informative. "Silvester succeeded St. Miltiades as pope in 314, soon after Constantine had freed Christianity by the Edict of Milan. Silvester is supposed to have baptised Constantine and cured him of leprosy and it was probably to Silvester that Constantine gave The Lateran Palace."

That is not only interesting for what it says, but for what it leaves out. For it is a minimum statement of what Silvester is supposed to have done for Constantine and of gifts that the emperor is supposed to have given to him in return.

According to the story, which comes from a sixth century life of Silvester, the emperor was smitten by leprosy, always a dreaded disease right down to our own times. Among the remedies proposed was that of immersing Constantine in a bath of blood. To this the pope strongly objected and suggested that baptism and the adoption of the Christian Faith were all that was needed. So in the Lateran, which had come to the Emperor as part of the dowry of his wife Fausta, Constantine adopted the Christian Faith and was baptised by Silvester. The year, according to tradition, was 324. It was natural that Constantine, cleansed from his leprosy, should be grateful to the miracle-worker who had brought it about. As a consequence he lavished gifts upon him, beginning with the Lateran Palace, which became the official residence of the popes till after the return from Avignon. And that is why, we are told, that the great Church of San Giovanni in Laterano is the pope's own cathedral and the head and the mother of all Churches.

But the Emperor did not stop short at a mere palace; however so large. He added to it the city and territory of Rome, as well as a considerable part of Italy. Then, reflecting on the situation, he thought that he would be better out of the way of the pope altogether and betake himself to the east, leaving Silvester to rule over the great and ancient city which once had ruled all the world. Eastward then went Constantine and built New Rome on the Bosphorus, calling it Constantinople after himself and leaving Old Rome behind him by the yellow Tiber, to be the prey of the barbarians.

Now that would be a very interesting story, and one that explained much, if there were anything in it. But, fortunately or otherwise, there isn't. The Donation of Constantine was born in the fertile brain of some clever ecclesiastic, and who was to deny the story when so few could read and write. Certainly it was used, and strongly used, to bolster up the prestige of the papacy. Appetite grew with what it fed on, and century after century the story of the emperor's gift was used in the long struggle between Church and State.

As it is, we have almost contemporary evidence to show that the story is a pure fabrication. Constantine was baptised, not in the baptistery in the Lateran, nor even in Rome itself, but far off in Nicomedia, and on his death bed. The year, too, was 337 and not 324, and the person who administered the ceremony, was Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, and not Silvester, bishop of Rome. Besides that Silvester died in 335 and so could hardly baptise Constantine in 337.

The fable was exposed about the same time in England and in Italy, and few Roman Catholics would venture to defend it. But its work was done, and the Temporal Power had a basis on which to build. It was and is, the curse of the Roman Church.

—From "The Bulwark".

THE LIBERAL REVOLUTION VS. THE ROMAN CATHOLIC REVOLUTION

By Walter M. Montano

That true democracy is wholly incompatible with the aims and ideals of the Roman Catholic Church is amply documented in the literature of history. Where democracy shows signs of strength, the Roman Church has sufficient distrust of its constituents to deny them even the basic liberties of conscience allowed by law, but where the Roman Church has its hold on the government of a nation there is no hope for democratic action or spiritual or social betterment.

Latin America offers a sombre example of the devious machinations of the Roman hierarchy and of the crimes that have been committed under her patronage, of the tyrannical dictators she has elevated to power and even of the treason she has perpetrated against nations. She is at ease as long as she can play politics and place in government seats puppet dictators who obey her wishes. But she is quick and powerful to destroy these same puppets the minute they become a threat to her absolute control.

As the nations of Latin America have struggled toward democracy from the blight of moral darkness and feudal slavery to the Roman system, their lands have been repeatedly torn by warfare and bloody revolutions, in which the Roman Church has played a leading part. In Cuba, in Argentina, in Guatemala, to name a few, her role has been the same. She puts governments in power and then dethrones them when they no longer serve her purpose. She foments revolutions for her own ends. No matter what turn events may take, she is always on the winning side, for she is ready to compromise with anyone and to sacrifice every principle.

It was the Roman Catholic hierarchy that brought Maximilian from Austria to Mexico to seat him on a throne that never existed. It was the archbishop of Puebla who welcomed General Scott when he invaded Mexico and who offered to celebrate solemn mass in his honour. The general refused, scorning the archbishop for his treasonous action. In later years it was the Roman Church that inspired the assassination of Mexico's president, Alvaro Obregon. It was under the instigation of the Roman prelate that an assassin shot at President Ortiz Rubio. And even a president such as Avila Camacho, who professed to be a Roman Catholic, did not escape the treachery of his own church. A fanatical Roman Catholic attempted his assassination when the president gave notice that he would not be a tool in the hands of the hierarchy in his own church.

Revolution in Venezuela

The most recent revolution in Venezuela is another proof of these manoeuvrings. As long as Perez Jimenez favoured the church, his position was safe and his dictatorship was blessed, but the moment he ceased to be a tool and became an obstacle to Rome's plans and demands the hierarchy had to dispense with him. It is not that Rome abhors a dictatorship, but that she wants a dictator who will rule according to her bidding.

Jimenez' effrontery in gaoling five Roman priests suspected of agitating against the government was dealt with summarily by the hierarchy. "From steeple after steeple, bells clanged out the Roman Catholic Church's defiance of the dictator and the signal for the strike to start. Auto horns, usually muted under threat of a hundred dollar fine, hooted in derisive chorus across the city." ("Time," Feb. 3, 1958.)

The revolution was on, under the auspices of the Roman Church. The archbishop was involved. The papal nuncio, a foreigner in the country, took active part in the plot, giving sanctuary to Dr. Rafael Caldera, head of the Roman Catholic political front, the Copei party.

The revolt itself was short-lived but the blood-letting lingered on while the passions of the mobs slowly subsided in a day and night of looting and burning.

Reviewing the political situation in Latin America and the involvement of the Roman hierarchy, Edward Tomlinson in an article appearing in the Roman Catholic "Tablet" (Feb. 22, 1958) writes:

"People in Latin America are beginning to say, 'When the church bells toll, it is time for the dictator to look for the nearest exit.'"

"There is no denying that in the last few years some of the most notorious strong men south of the border have had to walk the plank into political limbo as a result of attempting to engage the [Roman] Church in mortal combat . . .

"It is of more than usual significance that most of them were able to weather ordinary political and military plots for years, but that not one has been able to survive when he tangled with the people's religious institutions."

It is significant indeed when the Roman Church itself acknowledges that any dictatorship may survive as long as it does not "tangle" with the Roman hierarchy.

Benevolent Protestantism

In contrast with this type of revolution fomented by an ambitious hierarchy there is another type of revolution that has brought a great nation out of nothing. The Roman Church may call it a liberal revolution, but a historian verifies that it was a spiritual, rather than political or economic, movement that produced the United States of America.

In the strict concept of the word, Protestantism in itself is a continuous revolution, and it is Protestantism that has brought social and economic progress along with true spiritual enlightenment to the people who have adopted it as their religion.

No historian will deny the superiority of Protestant over Roman Catholic countries. A candid admission of this fact appears in the "Catholic Mind" (January-February, 1958):

"When the historian contemplates the course of human destiny since the classical ages, following the disorders of the end of the Middle Ages and those revolutionary upheavals which were the Renaissance and the Reformation, he sees two revolutions at work—or rather two chains of related revolutions, two revolutionary constellations.

"The first begins with the bourgeois and Puritan revolution in England, and attains its climax with the French Revolution, and ends with the apparent triumph of the Anglo-Saxon type of democracy after World War I, which seemed to have swept away the last tottering monarchies. . . . This first revolutionary wave reached England, the United States (whose war for independence was revolutionary), and France in turn—and after her, all of Europe, Latin America with Bolivar and San Martin, the China of Sun Yat-Sen, and the Turkey of Mustapha Kemal.

"These revolutions were essentially liberal. They expressed themselves on the political level through parliamentary democracy and on the economic level through industrial capitalism. On the social plane we see the arrival of the middle class to a position of domination, the summit of its historical career; from a cultural perspective, we see the emphasis on freedom of thought and expression. Morally, the accent is on individualism; from an international point of view we see a curious mixture of doctrinal internationalism and nationalism; in religion, there is a development of anticlericalism, virulent or moderate depending on the individual country. [And, we might add, on the degree of subjugation to the Roman Church prior to the revolution.]

"These liberal revolutions resulted in an economic enrichment and an increase of population of which we are the heirs. In spite of doctrinal errors and practical abuses, they certainly contributed to authentic human progress, especially in the emphasis on the sense of personal freedom, the guarantee of the individual man against the illegal or the arbitrary, the desire for a democratic participation of the citizen in the elaboration of collective destinies. They survive to-day perhaps more in their ideology than their structures, in western Europe and the United States."

—"The Protestant World", Sydney.

REVIEW

Roman Catholicism in England: From the Reformation to 1950. By E. I. Watkin. (Home University Library, Oxford University Press, London, 7s. 6d.)

It is unusual to get a book on the Reformation so full of what we may call sweet reasonableness, as this is. The word "bigotry" is not very often used, and the author is sometimes ready to concede a point, though occasionally his left hand takes up what his right hand has laid down. For example, he finds something to say on the famous combat between Kingsley and Newman, which is very near to a defence of Kingsley. Chesterton calls Newman "a spear blade," and certainly he is, so to speak, more heavily armed than Kingsley. He has a most convincing style, and a calm, reasonable way of putting his points, which is very telling. But what he did with his "Apologia", was to show that the charge of dishonesty was not a true one in regard to himself. Then Mr. Watkin goes on. "In refuting the general charge of dishonesty Newman was not so successful . . . How much truth there was in Kingsley's accusations is evident when we compare them with admissions made in private correspondence by Newman himself."

Mr. Watkin finds "that the principal causes of the Reformation may be summed up in two words: 'ignorance' and 'disintegration'. And both are to be understood of Catholic Europe when the Reformation began." This is a frank admission, for such learning as there was was the concern of the Church. There were schools, though not nearly so many as were needed, and quite frankly they were used for Church purposes. The Borgias and others like them had made men wonder if the vengeance of an outraged God would not fall upon them soon. It was a time of decadence, and the world seemed like breaking up. Everybody knew that reform was necessary, and that it must begin at the house of God, but the Church held on its way, fought for its privileges, and refused to reform. There are those who inform us that if the Church had been left alone, reform would have come at length from within. But the tale is an old one, and oft repeated, and nothing really came of it but the fire and the rope.

The Scriptures were neglected, "almost buried from sight beneath the rubbish of a decadent scholasticism." It warms the heart to read a modicum of justice being done to Luther and Calvin, who "rediscovered these neglected truths, that human effort as such can do nothing to save us, that salvation is wholly and solely God's free gift in Christ to be received by a self-surrendering faith, that God's sovereignty is absolute, shared by no creature, His glory alone is the end and raison d'être of the entire creation and of man in particular; Scripture His word to man addressed to each and every Christian." This is a heartening voice to hear out of the Roman Church, but it is difficult to believe that it is anything else than a voice in the wilderness, otherwise why the worship of Mary, and the reluctance to allow the Scripture to be read except under due care and control, and the condemnation of justification by faith? Rome has many voices, but I doubt if this still small voice is likely to be heard in the din.

Naturally the chapter on Elizabeth's reign is a long one, and he makes some shrewd remarks on that powerful but enigmatic character. It is interesting to note that the Pope who excommunicated Elizabeth, namely Pope Pius V, was later made a saint, but not for his foolish and unintelligent action. "The deposition," says Mr. Watkin, "was a blunder, worse than a blunder, a disaster, probably the most serious blow inflicted on English Catholicism between the Reformation and the present day." "Homer sometimes nods," but a Pope like this can nod his head off. For the bull did not harm Elizabeth; it actually strengthened her position, for it fixed the stigma of disloyalty to all her Roman Catholic subjects. Henceforth there were no martyrs among Roman Catholics, but only political offenders.

But, while we are on the subject, let us note that persecution was not on the whole severe. Penal laws were passed, but not put into force. The prisons were full of priests who had not been executed, though they were liable to that punishment; and it was quite possible to say Mass in the prison.

The next four chapters deal with the growth of Catholicism down to our own time. To a large extent it consists of lists of converts, and, I would venture to suggest that many of the names are unknown to Protestants. These lists are interesting, but not so interesting as the rest of the book. In connection with this, it is interesting to note, that the author speaks of "an appalling leakage to at least practical irreligion." Evidently he does not include Protestants among the irreligious, for he asks Roman Catholics "to remember that Protestants are baptized Christians, and as such, if faithful to God's grace, leading holy lives."

In the chapter before the Postscript, there comes a very interesting couple of estimates, as to the number of Roman Catholics in England and Wales. They differ widely, as many Roman Catholic sets of figures do. One estimates the numbers as in the neighbourhood of two and three-quarter millions, while the other puts it very near the round figure of five millions. Mr. Watkin puts it at roughly three millions.

—In "The Bulwark".

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 14.

thing that you say may be true but what on earth has it got to do with us?" What is the bridge between these two worlds? The external apparatus is different but the great realities are permanent—the facts of birth and death, joy and sorrow, good and evil, and man's need for God. The concern of the Bible is with these realities—"the truths about the relation of God and man which are the key to the world's predicament, and . . . therefore deeply relevant to the modern world" (Resolution 1).

"But before we can hear the Word of God speaking in it, we must clear away clouds of misunderstanding and ask again what it is and why it is."

The Bishop of Southwell is to write more on the same subject in next month's Diocesan News.

—"The English Churchman", 21-11-'58.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

THE WORLD NEEDS

THE WORD OF GOD

"this gospel must first be published among all nations".

TO SUPPLY THIS NEED . . .

many missionaries, ministers and Christian workers at home and abroad look to the

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY,

7, BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Three pence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 3—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	25
Church Unity (1)	28
Editor's Chair	30
Vicissitudes of the Papacy	33
Resurrection	35

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

The Pope's Call for Unity. Protestant Viewpoint

Vatican sources said yesterday that it will probably take two years to organise the great Ecumenical Council which Pope John XXIII has announced on the theme of Christian unity.

About 4,000 prelates and scholars of the Roman Catholic Church are expected to attend the council, which will probably be held in the Vatican basilica of St. Peter.

The Vatican source said that during the long preparation for the council, unofficial Vatican approaches probably would be made to the Protestant communities of the West and to the Russian and Orthodox and other Oriental Churches.

Similar approaches were made during the five years of preparation for the last council, 89 years ago. They were unsuccessful and no other Christian Churches sent representatives.

There was very little chance that the unofficial approaches likely to be made to the Protestant Churches would produce sufficient agreement to justify their sending representatives to the next Ecumenical Council Vatican sources said. But one unofficial source pointed out that the profound and wide discussions which would precede the council were likely to create echoes in some of the non-Catholic Churches of the West, which might lead to a new wave of movement toward Rome, similar to that of the Oxford Movement in England.

Oriental Churches

Sunday's announcement indicated that the Pope's principal aim in calling the council was to launch a movement which might eventually lead to the union of the Roman Catholic Church with the various Oriental Churches, estimated in Vatican reference books to have 150,000,000 followers.

Yesterday's international reaction to the move included the following:

Dr. Visser Hooft, Secretary-General of the World Council of Churches (in Geneva): "This illustrates the importance that the problem of unity has taken in our times." Dr. Hooft added that his council, which incorporates all Protestant denominations, and embraces the Church of England and the Greek Orthodox Church, was interested in "how ecumenical" the proposed conference was going to be.

Archbishop Joost de Blank, of Cape Town: "Anything that helps towards the breakdown of disunion is very welcome."

Archbishop James Hughes, of Central Africa (in Bulawayo): "Any move toward Christian unity is an excellent thing." It would certainly be supported by Protestant Churches, he said.

England and Scotland

A Church of England spokesman said yesterday that the Church of England would welcome an invitation to send an observer to the council. The Church of England, he said, was vitally concerned in the work of reunion and believed that if there was going to be a unity of Christendom it must include Roman Catholicism. The Church of England had never stood for only pan-Protestantism. He interpreted the Pope's announcement as an attempt to bring back the Eastern schismatic Churches to Rome, rather than an overture to the Protestant Churches. It appeared to be a logical follow-up of the Pope's Christmas message addressed to the Eastern Churches.

A spokesman for the Church of Scotland (Presbyterian) said: "The Pope's call for an Ecumenical Council is such a novelty that I don't know what our attitude would be if we were invited to send observers. We are very keen on the ecumenical movement, but not under Roman Catholic sponsorship. We want a union of Christendom, but not on their terms. The General Assembly would have to meet to decide what our attitude is if we should receive an invitation. No one person in the Church could make a decision."

American View

In New York, The Rev. Edward T. Dahlberg, president of the National Council of Churches, which represents 33 major Protestant and Orthodox denominations, said that anything that would bring together all the Churches of Christ "would be blessed of God."

Metropolitan Antony Rashir, Archbishop of the Syrian Antiochian Orthodox archdiocese in New York, said that he found no reason why the apostolic Churches should be divided. There was only one Holy Apostolic Church. Its differences could be ironed out in ecumenical councils. One way of reaching understanding would be to go back to the unity that existed before the great schism of 1045. A study should be made of the dogma and doctrine that existed then, and all that has divided Christendom since then should be discarded. "But when one side wants to rule the other, then I am sure the Eastern Churches will never take it," he said.

In Paris, a spokesman of the French Protestant Federation, which represents the overwhelming majority of Protestants in France, said that the federation's council would discuss its attitude towards the Pope's proposal next week.

In Finland, the Finnish Lutheran Church commented that if the Pope was making a proposal that differed from earlier views of the Roman Catholic Church—i.e., that unity of Churches meant that other Churches returned to Rome—he had an opportunity to present such proposals to the World Council of Churches, of which the Roman Catholic Church is not a member.

—"Irish Times", 27-1-'59.

[It appears to us that many denominations are busy about what does not concern them. The Council called by the Bishop of Rome is a Council to represent his Church, and to it are to be invited bishops, etc., of the Orthodox Churches of the East. It is very unlikely that Protestants will be asked to share in the deliberations. When it is said that any step to Christian Unity is worthwhile we enter the demur that unity is worthless without Truth. The Churches of the Reformation may best serve God by patient devotion to His Word].

* * *

First Oecumenical Council Since 1870. Ending The Schisms?

Rome, January 25.

The Pope to-day announced the calling of an Oecumenical Council of Roman Catholic bishops and other Roman Catholic Church authorities. This will be the first council since 1870, when Pius IX defined the dogma of papal infallibility, and the twenty-first in the history of Christendom.

This was interpreted as meaning that Christian communities other than those of the Roman Catholic Church and possibly even including Jewish representatives, might be invited to take part in the council, at least as observers.

The announcement was taken as being mainly directed towards the Eastern Catholic communities, including the Russian and Greek Orthodox churches, which are regarded by the Roman Church as being "schismatic". Unofficial Vatican sources said, however, that the Church might consider inviting emissaries of the British Protestant and other Christian Churches—which are regarded as "heretical"—to attend the council as observers, without a vote.

Attending a ceremony to commemorate the conversion of Saint Paul the Apostle, the Pope said the council was intended "not only for the edification of the Christian peoples but also as an invitation to the separated communities to join in seeking unity, longed for by so many souls in all parts of the earth."

The Pope, addressing 21 cardinals resident in Rome who were in attendance on him during his visit to the Basilica of Saint Paul, did not announce when the council would be held, but preparations are expected to take many months.

According to latest Vatican statistics, those entitled to attend the council include ten patriarchs, 1,616 residential bishops, 1,703 titular bishops, and 81 prelates and abbots nullius. Thus the council is likely to be attended by more than 3,400 of the highest prelates of the Church. The decisions of an Oecumenical Council, when confirmed by the Pope, are binding on all Roman Catholics and are considered infallible. The last one continued for six months.

Two Other Steps

In his address the Pope also announced two other important steps:

1. The calling of a synod of the clergy of the Diocese of Rome; and
2. Modernisation of the Roman Catholic Church's code of canon law and the promulgation shortly of a code of canon law for Eastern Catholics in communion with Rome.

No date was set for the synod but the decision to promulgate as soon as possible the code for the Eastern Churches was taken to be in preparation for the Oecumenical Council.

The work of drawing up this code has been in progress for many years, latterly under the direction of Cardinal Peter Gregory XV Agagianian, Patriarch of the Armenians, one of the Eastern Catholic communities loyal to Rome, which are estimated to number about nine millions.

The Eastern Churches separated from Rome are estimated in official Church publications to have about 150 million followers, but this includes a large number of followers of the Russian Orthodox Church, partly destroyed by the Communists.

During the mass at St. Paul's, the Pope spoke about persecution in "well-known vast and distant regions of Europe and Asia." He concluded by saying a special prayer for the persecuted, especially those in Communist China—Reuter, British United Press, and Associated Press.

* * *

Anglicans Waiting to See if Invitation Comes

By our London Staff

While welcoming any move that could lead to closer co-operation between Christian Churches, some high-ranking spokesmen for the Church of England commented guardedly on yesterday's report from Vatican City that representatives of the Church of England and other Protestant denominations might be invited by the Pope to attend the twenty-first Oecumenical Council, perhaps later this year.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, who arrived at Lambeth Palace from Canterbury yesterday evening, withheld all comment on the supposedly forthcoming invitation while he waited to see whether there was actually going to be one and for what stated purpose and on what terms.

Dr. Fisher in the past has often expressed disappointment that the Roman Catholic Church has not co-operated with other Christian Churches. It may be assumed that he would consider sympathetically any proposals made by the Pope to improve relations.

Canon Christopher Douglas Waddams, secretary of the Church of England Council for Foreign Affairs, had said earlier that yesterday afternoon was the first time he had heard anything about a possible invitation to the Church of England to send delegates to an Oecumenical Council.

"Rather Unlikely"

To him the invitation sounded "rather unlikely". But if there really was an acceptable invitation offering "a constructive move toward co-operation between the Roman Catholic Church and other Christian Churches it would surely be welcomed." Any attempt to break the deadlock should be acclaimed.

The Dean of St. Paul's, the Very Rev. Dr. W. R. Matthews, also restrained his expression of enthusiasm pending confirmation and clarification of the Vatican City report. "If it is true," he said, "it could be quite a step, and of course I would welcome any movement to bring the Churches closer together."

He pointed out that the Church of England in the past had made a gesture of goodwill to certain non-Anglican Churches by inviting them to send representatives to the Lambeth Conference and some non-Anglican observers had attended it.

—"Manchester Guardian", 26-1-'59.

[The information above adds to the news in "The Irish Times". We note the remark of the Dean of St. Paul's—"I would welcome any movement to bring the Churches closer together." Probably this was a passing remark spoken to a journalist, but we think it necessary to repeat that we might not welcome "any movement", but only such movements as are founded on or warranted by Holy Scripture. We say once more that the claims of truth are paramount].

* * *

Former Moderator Commends Proposal

The immediate ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, Very Rev. Professor J. Wilson, M.A., B.D., said in Belfast that anything that brought together the various branches of the Christian Church, to discuss their differences, was "all to the good".

The initiative taken by the Pope was commendable and a very nice idea, added Professor Wilson, who, as Vice-Principal of the Presbyterian College in Belfast, quotes from the commentaries of an old friend, Monsignor Kissane, President of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth.

A member of the Society for Old Testament Study, he told how it was his privilege, while in Rome a few years ago, to shake hands with the late Holy Father. In the Society, he said, there are Christians of many denominations and Jews.

Another person on whom he "was delighted to call" was the Dean of the Sacred College of Cardinals, Cardinal Tisserant, himself a student and master of the Scriptures.

[We have not seen any expression of opinion in the Press from Church of Ireland leaders. We think that they were asked, as Professor Wilson was, but preferred to say nothing. If so, they are wise, for in fact this proposed Council has no significance for Reformed Churches. All they will be asked to do (as before) is to submit to the [Roman Catholic Church].

A Methodist Point of View. Dr. Donald Soper—

Dr. Donald Soper, former President of the Methodist Conference, told U.P.I.: "We should welcome every opportunity to work together, for unity is the primary need of Christian churches to-day."

[If we had the chance of speaking to Dr. Donald Soper we would tell him that unity is not the primary need of Christian Churches to-day. Their primary need is love—the charity which begins in—"philadelphia"—brotherly love. The next need of the Churches is Truth. If Rome maintains, as she must, that she is the One True Church, she cannot but consider Dr. Soper to be in a state of mortal error. Unity with heretics is, from Rome's standpoint, inconceivable. Either we or she must recant in order to secure unity. Our readers will not need, we hope, to be told where their true interest is. Our Rule of Faith is not to be surrendered, and our Creed expanded by new dogmas in order that an external unity among professing Christians is obtained].

Communism and the New Council

The biggest influence on Orthodox Church leaders in Russia, if not the Soviet Government itself, will be the Patriarch of Moscow, says U.P.I. A Protestant clergyman behind the Iron Curtain told a United Press International correspondent recently that Communist authorities are not favourable to a rapprochement among Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant Churches.

He indicated that the Patriarch of Moscow is opposed to a reunification of Christendom and that other Iron Curtain churches, Orthodox and Protestant, would follow the lead of Moscow on this issue.—U.P.I., Reuter.

[It is hard to see how Orthodox Christians living in lands behind the "Iron Curtain", i.e., Hungary, Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Russia, could submit themselves to Rome without severely damaging their status and witness. The Vatican has been Communism's most vocal foe, and an alliance with the Vatican would create, we think, a dire situation for all the peoples of Eastern and South Eastern Europe].

Translation of the New Testament.

Christians everywhere will be interested in the announcement that the new translation of the New Testament from the Greek texts into current English, begun just over ten years ago, has been completed. The translation will now be finally revised and prepared for publication, but it is not expected to be on sale until early in 1961. The work has been undertaken by a group of Oxford and Cambridge scholars under the general

(Continued on p. 36.)

CHURCH UNITY (1).

Quite apart from the meetings for prayer in the interest of Christian unity we have been familiar in recent years with what may be called the machinery of Church Unity. Among Protestant and Eastern Orthodox Churches there exists to-day a World Council. The activities of this Council are often recorded in the newspapers, and its influence, not only on Churches in Europe and America, but upon the younger Churches of Asia and Africa is enormous. At the present time proposals are being discussed for the merging into the World Council of "The International Missionary Council." This body was created by the Missionary conference held at Edinburgh in 1910. It has had nearly fifty years of very valuable strategic evangelistic work in the non-Christian world. The World Council of Churches on the other hand is a very recent creation, about ten years old. It may be that if the merging takes place the World council will be greatly helped by the addition of many men and agencies of mature experience and practical power. On the other hand it cannot be assumed that the combination will really benefit the pioneer missionary work. It may; but it may not. Many who are devoted to the missionary cause are not in entire sympathy with the aims and policy of the World Council in certain directions, and others represent Churches which do not belong to the World Council. Thus the ecumenical situation has its difficulties. Yet it is probably true to say that the difficulties are stimulating and challenging. There is no danger of stagnation, and non-Roman Catholic Christianity can exist without a dead level of agreement on every aspect of organisation and control. To be able to co-operate in spite of unresolved problems is a good thing as long as mere compromising is avoided.

* * *

Among Roman Catholics much interest is being created over the question of unity. The present Pope John is undertaking plans for a Church Council to consider unity between Rome and Eastern Christianity. Elsewhere in this number a certain amount of news is given about this.

Whatever the reactions of evangelical Protestants to the forthcoming Council, we cannot think it a bad thing that ecclesiastics should meet for discussion; for the outside world is reminded of supernatural concerns (as well as temporal ones), and some theological interest is aroused, and curiosity about religious questions is fostered.

Inevitably, however, we think the conclusion is foregone. It is improbable that Rome will give up any intellectual positions it holds. There is no institution less able to abandon the heritage of past ages. We expect that the Council can do no more than to urge once again that all dissidents return to the fold and while continuing some distinctive features, to acknowledge the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope.

* * *

For such acceptance on the part of Eastern Christians there is already a fair amount of precedent. There are in the Near East (as there used to be also in Europe in the Ukraine) what are called "Uniate" Churches. These are churches of the Eastern tradition which have their own liturgies and church language, but have accepted the jurisdiction of the Papacy. They are not "Western" or Latin. They have been brought into being as a result of proselytising members of the Eastern Orthodox Churches. We imagine that in some countries the forthcoming Council may intensify this policy.

* * *

Generally, the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church towards unity is to repeat its own definitions and claims, and to follow a defensive line. The purpose seems to us to be directed to reassuring the faithful rather than to opening up new lines of thought, or progressing into co-operation with others. A rigid attitude, and an inability to change or modify must build permanent barriers to fellowship.

Recently we read with interest the Pastoral letter on unity which was issued by the Cardinal Archbishop of Armagh, the Most Revd. Dr. D'Alton. It is, first, an exposition of the place of St. Peter as the Rock, and head of the Church; and secondly, it is a survey of the place of Peter in the early Church, i.e. the place of the Bishop of Rome as successor of Peter and Vicar of Christ.

"To Peter" said the Cardinal, "was given a primacy among the apostles not of honour only but of jurisdiction." To accept this is not really to the point as we see it, because our Lord said nothing about the perpetuity of these powers in the succession of bishops in one particular See. Even if it is probable that St. Peter was for a time in Rome we are far from establishing the immense claims which grew up through long centuries. We do not think that the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles shows that Peter "presided at the Council of Jerusalem, the first Council of the Church"—In Acts, ch. 15, it is generally thought that the apostle James is described as presiding (though we admit that terms like "presiding" and "council" may suggest the ideas and practice of later times).

The words of St. Irenaeus about Rome are quoted "with this Church on account of its pre-eminent authority it is necessary that every Church be in concord." The Church of England scholar Dr. B. J. Kidd (whose volumes on early church history are very thorough) would by no means agree with this, for he considers that Irenaeus meant that the faithful from every part resort to Rome (the capital) for business or pleasure, and thus bring the tradition of Christian truth from every place with them, rather than go to Rome to find it.

"The power given to Peter and his successors constituted in particular the principle of unity, stability and permanence in the Church." The problem for the Protestant is that he cannot see proof for the belief that power given to St. Peter must have been intended by Our Lord to be continued in the bishops of the city of Rome. The Protestant believes that the secular importance of the city of Rome profoundly influenced its religious significance and prestige. When the imperial power was transferred to the new Eastern capital the head of the Christian community in Rome became the natural leader and was increasingly conspicuous. Indeed it does not appear that there were what we call bishops in the city for quite a long time after the middle of the first century. Old lists of names have little authority.

The fact is that we must interpret many elements of early and mediaeval church history in a different way from that which is current in Roman Catholic circles. The Reformers and their successors took the stand they did because they believed that the popular and venerable explanations of many things were erroneous. For instance, we are told only that in the eleventh century the Patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Caerularius re-opened the breach with Rome and was determined to make it final. But surely the fact that Cardinal Humbert and another legate of the Pope delivered a bull of excommunication against Michael was what made the real final breach.

We think over the problems of Christian unity, and the divisions of Christians, and are bound to say that humanly they are insoluble. We claim God's Word as the Rule of Faith. If all did so, harmony, if not unity, might be realised among us.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

BOOKS ON THE IRISH REVIVAL, 1859.

In response to enquiries we propose to give an account this month of some of the books which record the events of the great Religious Revival in the Ireland of an hundred years ago. We do not think that we shall be expected to apologise for doing so, since our declared purpose is to treat of spiritual religion and Scripture Truth: in short, of Gospel Christianity.

* * *

A contribution (in the January number) on the history of the Revival referred to the numerous publications which appeared in the Revival years. They were generally the work of first-hand observers and active participants. Mainly in pamphlet form, they emphasised different aspects of the Revival, and in particular sought to explain the physical manifestations which broke out in many places at times of intense emotional concern. Some were sermons and addresses of an appropriate kind.

The first thing which strikes the student of the period is that those who were hostile to the movement, or at least, critical of it, published very little indeed. If the matter committed to the printers on one side or the other is any indication of the public approval or otherwise, then we can say truthfully that there is preponderating evidence of public acceptance as a revelation of spiritual power. If those who opposed or belittled the Revival were critics of any weight they were singularly reluctant to publish their views at the time. But in fairness to the clergy and ministers among them we are bound to say that if they wrote against the Revival they would have alienated many who were subject to their pastoral care. Yet when allowance is made for this we may still say that those who were hostile did not make any impressive case for their views. We do not of course refer to incidental types of criticism, but to rejection of the claim that the Revival was God's Work.

* * *

Probably the classic work on the Revival is "The Year of Grace" by Dr. Wm. Gibson. This account of the Revival is a fair-sized volume published in 1860 by a minister and theological professor who was moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1859. Dr. Gibson follows the course of the movement from Connor, Co. Antrim to larger centres as it gained momentum and compelled attention. He properly lays emphasis on the long preparation of prayer and faithful expectancy. Like most contemporary publications we find the author able to speak from personal experience. The events he describes were typical of the towns and countryside. Whether in tiny groups or in vast congregations or open-air gatherings or in single instances, the work of grace in that year of grace is plainly told. What Dr. Gibson did not note himself he diligently and methodically enquired about from his acquaintances. We may admit that Dr. Gibson's book does not give information about every part of Ulster, or about Ireland in general, and there were districts in which revival influence was much less marked than elsewhere. Writing so close to the events it was probably inevitable that the more sensational happenings overshadowed the quieter experiences. Many places which could record no "striking" or "seizures" or great crowds responded to the Spirit of God by greater personal faith and prayer, in better lives, and in more serious views of life.

Fifty years after the Revival a new edition of Gibson's book was published. The special Jubilee preface to this edition summarised effects of the Revival which Gibson could not foresee. The writer of the preface could point to the great stream of Christian workers of all sorts which flowed from the Revival—Sunday School teachers, Bible Class leaders, foreign missionaries, candidates for ordination, etc. There was sustained improvement in public and private life, great zeal for Temperance and Social Welfare, and Church expansion everywhere.

* * *

One very valuable part of Dr. Gibson's book is the evidence of the effect of the Revival on law-breaking. He shows the steep decline in criminal proceedings in all courts (and it must be remembered that a century ago law-breaking and prosecutions were far more numerous than in recent times) as well as the moral reformation of numbers of dissolute persons. We may not assume that every change of heart and life was permanently maintained, but undoubtedly a great proportion continued faithful, and the general level of public life showed the beneficent influence.

No reference to Dr. Gibson's "Year of Grace" can ignore a reply to it by a fellow-Presbyterian Minister, the Rev. Isaac Nelson, with the title "The Year of Delusion." This is a short book and seemingly very rare. It is not to be found apparently in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, nor in the National Library of Ireland. We have, however, read it, and it is indeed a poor production, and written primarily against Dr. Gibson rather than against the Revival. The Revival is challenged because Gibson wrote enthusiastically in support of it. We will not say that Nelson is wrong in everything nor that Gibson is right in everything—but a fair comparison of the tone and spirit of the two books leaves us in no doubt that Nelson was captious and hostile beyond the limits of tolerable criticism.

* * *

In 1866 the Rev. Wm. Hamilton of Edenderry, Co. Tyrone, published a long study of the movement "The Revival of 1859." Hamilton, like Nelson, was definitely opposed to the Revival, but unlike Nelson, he had no personal animus against Gibson (and makes no reference to Revival Movement from the standpoints of Gibson's book). Hamilton appears to study the formal theology, church discipline, and pastoral relationships. He believed that the fetching of revival converts from place to place to give their testimony, and so to spread the Revival, was injurious to the Church system and undermined the influence and status of the settled and ordered ministry. He discusses these points calmly enough. As an orthodox divine it seemed to him that a convert of a few days' standing was not equipped to preach, or to supplant the regular ministry. But he should have recognised that it was an exceptional time, and that a convert's testimony was not the word of one who had just come to Christianity from heathenism, but was more likely to be the personal acknowledgment of truths of the Gospel familiar for many years though little heeded. Also, he should have noted that the convert's testimony was an endorsement of the ministry of Gospel preaching carried on Lord's Day after Lord's Day through the years by the regular ministry.

Hamilton was conservative and conventional in tone. He seems to have been a seriously-minded man, and needless to say, entitled to express his opinions freely.

These three books—Gibson's, Nelson's and Hamilton's, are by ministers of the Presbyterian Church, but one must not think that the 1859 Revival was a Presbyterian revival exclusively. All the evangelical churches in Ireland were concerned and many of the shorter publications on the Revival Year were written by Church of Ireland clergymen. The contribution in the January number, already referred to, shows how deep was the Established Church interest in the Movement, and how greatly the Church benefited by it. Some fifty years ago an article in "The Irish Church Quarterly" made the remark that the Revival movement tended to weaken the loyalty of converts to their church. A sufficient answer to that charge may be found in Gibson's book. He quotes the Bishop of Down as saying that in consequence of the Revival he had to increase the number of Confirmation Services greatly in his diocese. The Church of Ireland experiences in Belfast and elsewhere, the vast increases in worshippers and the need for Church enlargement in many places are sufficient disproof of the charge that the Revival weakened Church loyalty.

* * *

In the efforts to explain the physical phenomena of the Revival many theories of hysteria etc. were advanced. A prominent physician in North Antrim, Dr. J. C. L. Carson, wrote and published a series of "Letters on the Revival in Ireland." He repudiated the suggestion of hysteria, and believed that God directed the physical as well as the spiritual agencies of revival. He was evidently fond of controversial discussions, and was more than once involved in argument with the leaders of the Brethren Movement, C. H. Macintosh and J. N. Darby. His Revival letters he reissued along with other letters in a volume he thought fit to call "The Plymouth Heresies." It is necessary to specify this title so that any who want to read his views on the Revival may know where to look. Dr. Carson was, we believe, a Baptist.

* * *

Leaving the more or less contemporary accounts of the Revival we direct attention to what is unquestionably the most comprehensive and important book on the subject in existence—Dr. J. E. Orr's "The Second Evangelical Awakening." This work, published ten years ago, is the only work on the Revival we know of which is a work of scholarship. It is a university doctorate thesis covering the subject from the North American Revival of 1858 till the end of the century. It sets the Irish Revival on the wider canvas of English-speaking Christianity, and does so in great detail. We read how Revival spread throughout these islands, and produced great organisations for world-wide evangelisation. Rightly does Dr. Orr call the movement "The Second Evangelical Awakening," for the first was obviously the Eighteenth century revival led by the Wesleys, Whitefield, etc. The two need never be separated.

Dr. Orr most patiently followed the course of the movement county by county through the British Isles. He is very thorough on Ulster, having carefully studied contemporary papers and pamphlets and books (he does not include in his bibliography the Rev. Wm. Hamilton's book). He also made great use of the files of the weekly "The Christian" which began publication a century ago as a repository of Revival news. Dr. Orr is an Ulsterman who studied and ministered in the United States, and was a chaplain in the U.S.A. Far Eastern forces. He wrote his book for an Oxford University research degree, and it is an important contribution to Church History. If only one book on the subject is to be read then it ought to be Dr. Orr's. The wisdom of this lies in the fact that Dr. Orr does not treat the Ulster Revival in isolation, as though it stood by itself: too often Irish affairs have tended to be isolated so that their true significance is not clearly perceived.

While Dr. Orr's book has an academic background, it is extremely readable, and he faithfully declares his own loyalty to the spiritual truths which marked the Revival. He is of course actively engaged in the Christian Ministry.

* * *

In the last few months two popular histories of the Ulster Revival appeared—(1.) "The Fifty-Nine Revival" by the Rev. J. R. K. Paisley (obtainable from the author, 423 Beersbridge Road, Belfast, 5s. 6d.): (2.) "God's River in Spate" by the Rev. J. T. Carson (obtainable from Publications Board, Church House, Belfast, 9s. 6d.).

Both of these have many interesting illustrations, and tell the story well. We think it a pity that Mr. Carson did not call his book simply "A History of the Ulster Revival" (or some such title), as we like a book's title to declare its contents plainly—this however, is but a passing complaint.

Mr. Paisley gives an interesting preliminary sketch of the early history of Ulster Protestantism (as regards the Scottish plantation or colony). He describes the history of Presbyterianism in the early part of the last century, and considers it spiritually dead for the time being. He writes "this was also true of other evangelical denominations." If he had consulted volume 3 of Crookshank's "History of Methodism in Ireland" he would have found evidence of local revivals all through the period, and therefore he exaggerates on this point. Apart from this, the story is on the good familiar lines of Gibson and other contemporaries. These sources have been looked into, and the result is a very useful one. The various Ulster Counties are surveyed in turn, and long extracts are given from the reports and comments of Ministers and others who witnessed many stirring scenes. In some 200 pages the author has gathered a great deal of material, and his book is in a sense a convenient Digest of the literature of a century ago.

* * *

The Rev. J. T. Carson's book (138 pages) is rich in facts gathered from the newspapers as well as from more familiar sources. He has a good index which enables one to see at a glance the extent of the Revival in the North (place-names) and the leading individuals concerned. We have already referred to the illustrations which add to the book's worth. Several are of churches prominently connected with the Work. Among them is Trinity Church, Belfast, whose Rector, the Rev. Theophilus Campbell was among the foremost in promoting the Revival. It is good to have the photograph of Trinity since, alas, the church was destroyed by enemy action in the late war. We are glad to see also a photograph of the fine Gothic window which was placed in West Presbyterian Church, Ballymena to commemorate the Revival. As Mr. Carson remarks "this window must surely be the only stained-glass window erected to commemorate a religious revival."

"God's River in Spate" will have a very wide circulation among the Presbyterians as its author is the respected minister of Bangor, Co. Down, under the General Assembly. We hope it will be read by many in other churches, and not merely arouse interest, but stimulate people to prayer that in God's providence Ireland may experience a fresh religious awakening. We believe that revival is God's Work, and that we cannot tell Him when to revive His Work; but we believe that God's people can try to remove obstacles to revival by penitence and by prayer.

We hope we have now provided a reasonably practical guide to the more important publications on the Ulster Revival. Our great desire is that the interest in the Revival should not be ephemeral. If we are serious Christians everything that concerns Christian life and faith ought to hold our attention permanently. As Irish Christians we have a special relationship to the Revival, for evangelical churches in this land show the lasting impress of that experience of a century ago. Spiritual people will never despise or deride the Revival though they may condemn certain excesses, and admit imposture here and there. Mr. Carson in his chapter "Charges against the Movement" bluntly states that in face of the real results, the charge that the Revival was an unmixed evil and an abomination "just makes no sense." He is right.

* * *

May we suggest that one happy outcome of the commemoration this year of 1859 would be, the cessation of strike among professing Christians and a fresh understanding of "the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace"? It is easier to be contentious than peaceable, but how unrewarding except to our self-conceit contention is!

VICISSITUDES OF THE PAPACY

An address by

Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D.

The subject of Papal claims has been brought before the public once more by the earnest appeal of Dr. Davis urging all Roman Catholics to pray that all men would come to acknowledge Peter and his successors as the divinely appointed rock of Christian unity. Protestants gladly recognise the earnestness behind this appeal, but find themselves unable to yield to the entreaty. The subject is so very complicated that it would take a treatise to unravel all its complexities. But there is one circumstance, or better still, there is a set of circumstances connected with the claim of the present Pope to be the successor of Peter that received very great consideration in times past, but has recently been allowed to sink into oblivion. It may interest my hearers to recall some of it.

R.C. Unity?

The general impression among Roman Catholics is that from the time of Peter right down to the present age, there has been an unbroken succession of distinguished men all renowned for their virtue and steadfastness in the faith, and this has no rival in all the complicating experiences of our struggling humanity! Everywhere else we find a measure of discord and disunity. Here we find the solidity of an imposing agreement which time has never disturbed! Macaulay's panegyric on Rome in his review of Von Ranke's "Lives of the Popes," in which he pictured her as still standing in august greatness "when some traveller from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's" is transferred without reflection to the occupants of the proud Roman See, and men begin to believe that we have evidence of continuity that excels any example of long lines of kings. It is popular sentiments like these that keep alive pictures and becloud the mind.

Papal Schism

It is well at times to study the question critically and discover if history really records an unbroken, unhindered succession stretching from A.D. 68 (the date assigned in a recent Douay Testament for Peter's death) down to A.D. 1958. Such a phenomenon might well occasion wonder. But the facts are very different, and are admitted to be different by impartial investigators. The Papacy was subjected to the same internal disorders as every other human institution. The question as to whether the early names in the list of Popes were bishops or presbyters has been discussed at length by Bishop Lightfoot and others. It is certainly remarkable that Ignatius, who lays so much stress upon obedience to bishops, abstains from any reference to the bishop in his letter to the Romans. It is suggested that the See was then vacant, but it seems strange in such circumstances that the earnest martyr did not impress upon his readers the importance of choosing wisely when they essayed to elect a successor to Peter. But all such considerations are dismissed in many quarters with an impatient shrug.

* * *

We need not enter into prolonged discussions of this nature to disprove the idea that a supreme authority at Rome was so dominant that the whole Christian world acknowledged it until the rise of Martin Luther and Henry VIII. One of the great problems that faced the Church in the middle of the third century was the question as to the treatment of those who had denied the faith under pressure of persecution and subsequently repented of their action. The controversy was long and acute. Cyprian took a leading part in it on the side of moderation. Cornelius, the recognised Bishop of Rome, was also on the side of moderation, but he was opposed by the confessors, as those were called who had suffered hardship for their faith. The opposition was so strong for a time that actually Novatian assumed the title of Bishop of Rome, and has the distinction of being called by the Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, the first Anti-Pope. Cyprian strove gallantly to have the claims of Cornelius recognised in Africa, and ultimately the Novatian schism was healed. But at the time the Church needed guidance in a most delicate matter. The authority of the recognised Bishop of Rome was set aside by a considerable section of Christians in Rome itself. The schism was ultimately healed, but not before a rival bishop had been set up in Rome itself, who drew many to his standard. There was no protection against this evil but the united voice of many bishops who stood by Cornelius and rejected the overtures of Novatian. It may be said that Cornelius triumphed in the end. That must be conceded. But how could the established claims of the divinely appointed Vicar of Christ be challenged by men who had been forward in professing the faith of the Gospel? That raises a very serious question indeed. Further, though it is true the opinions of Cornelius and Cyprian ultimately held the field, we have to recognise that the schism in the Roman bishopric, in the words of Dr. Benson, "planted bishops in all the leading Sees from Spain to Pontus," and "lasted on until the end of the sixth century." At least this is a serious vicissitude in the Papacy. Cornelius failed, through no fault of his, to carry some of the clergy with him. They at once elected another bishop.

Breaks in Doctrine and Order

But this is not the end of the problems that confront the historian. When Liberius failed to sustain the Christian faith, another bishop exercised sway at Rome. He is entered in Labbe and Cossart's list as "S. Felix II, by some so called," and is excluded from the lists of true popes. However perhaps out of deference to his saintship, he is not labelled like the others as an anti-pope. So we have the strange anomaly that Liberius, who was a heretic, is in the accredited list, and Felix, who was a saint, but who was rejected as a true Pope by some, is left out. This gives such a puzzle to Labbe and Cossart that they read later Felix II, otherwise III, and Felix III, otherwise IV, plainly indicating a certain hesitancy as to the correct list. If there was an unalterable succession fully accredited, it seems passing strange that we have a man about whom it cannot be said whether he is Felix II or Felix III.

* * *

Our confusion is still more confounded when we discover that Steven III ascended the Papal throne in 752, and yet another Stephen III succeeded Paul I in 768. At that time there were two schisms disturbing the serenity of the Papal seat. A still graver situation arose in the late ninth century. Pope Formosus was elected in the year 890. He was succeeded by Stephen IV in 896. Before Stephen IV was made Pope, Labbe and Cossart tell us that Boniface invaded the Apostolical See and held it for 15 days. They add, regarding Stephen, that, like Boniface, he obtained the See by force, fraud and tyranny. But, for the sake of arresting the schism, one who was equally an intruder and thrust out an intruder, is reckoned among the Popes by common consent. The account goes on to say he was a most infamous man, yet the entire Catholic Church acknowledged him as Vicar. We read that he not only mutilated the dead body of his predecessor and flung it into the Tiber, but that he also deposed from their offices or ordered to be re-ordained and re-consecrated, all those who had been ordained or consecrated by Formosus. Labbe and Cossart feel the force of this objection, and while they admit that the whole of the clergy received him as Pope, yet declare he was a madman, and at least suggest that he was an intrusive false Pope. The sacrilegious lunatic held the See of Rome for six years and was then strangled in prison.

* * *

This matter of re-ordination has a curious history. Pope John IX, in 904, repealed all the acts of Stephen, and yet Pope Sergius III, in 906, again ordered that those who had been ordained by Formosus should have their orders repealed. But the Council of Trent declared that the Sacrament of Orders cannot be repealed without sacrilege. Who was right? If indeed the Pope is the appointed guardian of orders in the visible Church of God, we have a problem of the first magnitude affecting, as Auxilius states "a great multitude of bishops, priests and deacons." Auxilius was himself ordained by Formosus, and therefore we would expect him to know the facts, Morinus, who printed the two books of Auxilius defended the ordination of Formosus, and who was once himself a Protestant, can only supply in defence of the vacillations of Popes Stephen VI or VII (for he is given both numbers, another evidence of the difficulty of fixing the list of Popes), John IX and Sergius III is that, "It had not yet passed into a thing settled, and an axiom of the Catholic faith, that whenever ordination performed according to the rites of the Church and by a bishop ordained according to those rites, was valid and in no case to be repealed." (Concerning Sacred Ordination, pt. 11, p. 282, Antwerp 1695). So this particular Papal vicissitude reveals a gap in the doctrine of the Church not filled until the Council of Trent in its session held in 1547.

But the awkward fact in relation to the theory of Papal claims is that Popes were not only ignorant of Christian doctrine, but acted contrary to that which was subsequently defined. Protestants cannot help seeing a grave weakness here. There is great confusion as to the so-called Anti-Popes. As an illustration, we may point out that Labbe and Cossart makes Sylvester III, in 1043, to be an Anti-Pope, while Platina records his name in the list as a true Pope. They also class Benedict X in 1059, as an Anti-Pope, and Platina again reckons him in the list of the true Popes. Again, Pope Leo IX is classed as a saint. Why did he attach the number nine to his name if Leo VIII, the only Leo VIII, mentioned by Labbe and Cossart, was as they state, "an Anti-Pope put in by force." And why does Platina insert a Leo VIII as a true Pope after Benedict V some two years after Labbe and Cossart's date for the Leo VIII they regard as a false pope. Dr. Milner drops out Clement IV altogether, and Labbe and Cossart register him as a true Pope. The more we study the list of Popes the greater seems the vicissitudes of the Papacy.

RESURRECTION.

The Resurrection of those who die "in Christ" is the supreme affirmation of the faith of the Gospel. We must proclaim it as the essential message of the Church of God—"As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive."

The Resurrection of the body is one of the facts declared in the Christian Creed. Some might say that the doctrine of a future life is pre-Christian—that it has been accepted by pagan philosophers and by many non-Christian religions. No one denies this; but the point is that the theory of a future life is not identical with the Christian doctrine of the Resurrection of the body. The testimony of non-Christian religions to survival after death is valuable as showing the well-nigh universal hope of humanity, and the sober speculations of wise men show that there is nothing absurd in believing in life beyond the grave, but the claim of the Christian faith is that hope and longing have been given ocular demonstration and proof in the fact of the Risen Saviour.

* * *

While we may scarcely call it "pre-Christian" in the same sense as "non-Christian," we must recognise the priority of the Pharisee expectation of a future life, and even of Resurrection. The Pharisees apparently carried on the old Testament hope to an advanced stage, and the words of Martha when her brother Lazarus died show us how firm was this confidence among those sections of the Jewish people who were under the influence of Pharisee teaching—Martha said, in answer to Our Lord's assurance "Thy brother shall rise again," "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (John 11. 24). This was founded largely upon the teaching of the book of Daniel—"Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Daniel 12. 2).

We find the Pharisee faith well set out by St. Paul. When he was converted to the Christian faith he realised that Christ Whom he had thought of as a malefactor rightly put to death, was alive and in glory. He did not need to be persuaded of a future life, for his Pharisee faith was firm on the point. Nevertheless, when we read his great exposition of the Resurrection doctrine (in I Cor. 15) we may conclude that he had abandoned the grounds of the Pharisee hope for better ones. He had come to realise that the Resurrection of the dead is so intimately bound up with Our Lord's triumph over death that no other consideration need enter the Christian's mind—"Christ the first-fruits, then they that are Christ's, at His Coming" (I Cor. 15, 23).

* * *

In a perilous situation (see Acts, 23) St. Paul had used his Pharisee sectarianism in self-defence. When attacked in the Jewish Council as a wrong-doer he had taken advantage of the antagonism of priests and Pharisees (largely over the faith in a future life which the Jewish priests denied) and brought the Pharisees over to his side by crying out "Brethren, I am a Pharisee, a son of Pharisees: touching the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." The Pharisees were ready then to say that they found no evil in Paul. We may consider then that Phariseism had in some measure prepared St. Paul for the central message of the Gospel, though of course the Christian view of human destiny was infinitely richer than anything contemplated in Judaism.

We may recall another statement of St. Paul (Acts, 24) in which he repeated the claim to be still in harmony with Pharisee theology. Before the governor Felix at Caesarea St. Paul explained his difficulties, and acknowledged that he shared with his opponents faith in a future life—"having hope towards God which these also themselves look for, that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust."

* * *

Naturally this faith was taught by St. Paul's fellow apostles. From the start the Resurrection was the essential principle of their teaching. St. Peter (Acts, 2) in his first address to the Jews of Jerusalem (on the day of Pentecost) emphasised the rising of Our Lord from the dead and quoted Psalm 16 to show that it had been foretold that the Messiah would not be held by death—"My flesh shall dwell in hope because Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades, neither wilt thou give thy Holy One to see corruption." David, said St. Peter, "spake of the resurrection of the Christ."

In his first epistle St. Peter declares that God the Father "begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Christ from the dead, unto an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you."

* * *

St. John the Divine in Revelation 20 wrote of "the first resurrection," and of the blessedness and holiness of those who share in it. We may be sure that every other apostle had the same message, and that "the living hope" was the great joy of all believers from Pentecost onward.

* * *

The Christian faith is, as we have always believed, "the resurrection of the body." We are not living in hope of persistence after death as disembodied spirits; and we do not hold that after death we are absorbed into the Over-Soul. "The Resurrection body" is, of course, outside our present experience—necessarily so. Yet the New Testament gives us suggestive thoughts which enlarge our ideas, and afford our faith material on which to reflect. St. Paul borrows from Our Lord the idea of the seed which falls into the ground and dies (John 12, 24), and bears new life, and he elaborates it (I Cor. 15, 42) saying that God gives the seed "a body even as it pleased him, and to every seed a body of its own." This implies the survival in new form of individual personality. Identity is not destroyed, but transformed. The transformed personality which is "clothed upon," is likened to a star. This is a suitable image for the glorious life hereafter, and the apostle teaches that there is no common level, but each differs from other (v. 41). This, too, points to individual survival.

We may note that in this same chapter St. Paul uses certain adjectives to describe the glory of the resurrection body—it will be incorruptible, and heavenly, powerful, and spiritual. All this helps us to realise that the future holds the promise of perfection in contrast with the infirmities and failings of our condition now.

* * *

The Easter message, the message of the empty tomb, of the road to Emmaus, and of the Upper Room must be increasingly precious as we look forward. The loosening of attachments here should go along with stronger convictions of eternal life and spiritual maturity in the presence of God. The promise is "It is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that if He shall be manifested, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him even as He is" (I John 3, 2).

We shall be conformed to the body of His glory (Phil. 3, 21).

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 28.

direction of Rev. Dr. C. H. Dodd, Professor Emeritus of Divinity at Cambridge. No samples of the new translation are yet available, but it has been explained that the translators have aimed to render the oldest and best Greek manuscripts into contemporary English, avoiding both archaic phrases and transient modernisms. The Church of Scotland led the way in the launching of the project, which has the support of all the Churches except the Roman Catholic, and also of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the National Bible Society of Scotland. The revision extends to the Old Testament and the Apocrypha, but it will be several more years before the whole Bible is translated. There is every reason to believe that the scholars concerned in the work are discharging their responsibility conscientiously as in the sight of God. Writing many years ago "On a Fresh Revision of the English New Testament," Bishop J. B. Lightfoot said: "It must be our single aim to place the Bible in its integrity before the people of Christ, and, so long as we sincerely follow the truth, we can afford to leave the consequences in God's hands: and I cannot too strongly urge the truism (for truism it is) that the higher value we set on the Bible as being or as containing the Word of God, the greater (if we are faithful to our trust) will be our care to ascertain the exact expressions of the original by the aid of all the critical resources at our command." That aim, we feel sure, is guiding the present translators.

—Comment in "The Christian," 16-1-1959.

"UNSEARCHABLE RICHES"

The Ideal Magazine for the serious Bible Student

7/- per Annum.

ALSO

'THE CONCORDANT VERSION'

An accurate translation of the N.T.

Write:

H. W. JONES, 10 Abbey Road, Mansfield,
NOTTS.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

*Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-*

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the
TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY
7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop
James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

—2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 4—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	37
The Story of a Priest	39
Christ's Deity	40
Editor's Chair	42
News from Israel	45
Survival of the Jewish People	47

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

WEST GERMANY

Mixed Marriages

The denominational setup of the German population has changed greatly since the war. Roman Catholics and Protestants are living closer together than ever before and the result is a larger number of mixed marriages. Early this year the Roman Catholic Church took action against this trend. In a circular read from all pulpits, its bishops warned their flocks that a mixed marriage was a "dreadful misfortune" even when the Protestant partner agreed to a Roman Catholic wedding and a Roman Catholic education for the children. This widely publicised tightening of the church's policy has tended to increase interdenominational tension. The conference of Lutheran Bishops has now published a statement of the Lutheran position on marriage, making the following points:

1. A mixed marriage is a valid marriage and mixed couples are welcome to the Evangelical wedding ceremony.
2. A mixed marriage may make it difficult for the partners to arrive at full inner communion and still remain faithful to their respective denominations.
3. A Protestant is not subject to Roman Catholic canon law. "The pressure of conscience brought to bear on partners by the Roman Catholic Church is, we believe, incompatible with the gospel. This Roman Catholic policy is, particularly under the present conditions, not apt to advance the common Christian tasks." Referring to the Roman bishops' new regulation that an Evangelical wedding does not constitute valid matrimony, the Lutheran bishops declare: "Against this we state: a marriage once concluded, no matter whether it is a mixed marriage, is not invalidated by ecclesiastical law." All Evangelical Christians marrying Roman Catholics are urged to remain faithful to their church and give their children an Evangelical education.

The Roman Catholic and subsequent Evangelical statements were given wide publicity by our press. In consequence everybody is mixed up about mixed marriages. The practical result of all this may well be that many couples who would ordinarily have decided on a Roman Catholic wedding will now turn to the easier and more charitable Evangelical yoke.

* * *

Suitable Site For £25,000 Statue.

Experts have carried out boring tests on the site for the proposed bronze statue of Our Lady, at the mouth of Dublin Harbour, and have reported that they are satisfied it is suitable.

The site, which is between the Old Pigeon House and the Half Moon Swimming Club, was donated by Dublin Port and Docks Board, and has been blessed by the Very Rev. F. Canon Gaynor, P.P., Ringsend.

The statue will be three times life-size, and will stand on a 60-foot granite plinth. The project will cost about £25,000, and the Rev. Vincent Kehoe, C.C., of St. Patrick's, Ringsend, chairman of the statue committee, said yesterday that £10,000 had been raised already.

[The above, from the "Irish Times" of 17th March, 1959, brings to our mind the attempt made some years ago to erect at Kingstown Harbour, Dun Laoghaire, Co. Dublin, a great statue of Christ the King. We believe that the site was chosen and the statue purchased and delivered at Dun Laoghaire. It was never erected, and was, we understand, most unobtrusively conveyed away to another destination. Visitors to Eire who arrive on the mail-boat at Kingstown Harbour do not therefore see the statue of Our Lord which was intended as an affirmation that Eire is a Christian state.

But visitors to Eire who travel to the port of Dublin, and merchant vessels from all quarters, are likely to see the statue of the Blessed Virgin already referred to above. The site is on the long wall bounding the South side of the Liffey and stretching out into the bay near Poolbeg Lighthouse. If statues of religious significance are thought appropriate it seems a pity that the statue of Christ the King already available, cannot be erected at the port of Dublin.

The devotion to Christ the King was inaugurated a generation ago, but has not had an appeal comparable to that fostered by the Marian Year].

* * *

How To Reply To Jehovah's Witnesses.

Our recent series of articles on "Strange Sects," which was written by Miss Helena Charles, has brought many suggestions from readers for dealing with unwelcome callers who peddle unwelcome literature.

The Canadian Church has published an official card—the text is the work of the Rev. Fr. R. F. Palmer, SSJE; and householders who keep a copy by the door find that when it is read, Jehovah's Witnesses invariably depart without argument.

"You Preach A Cruel God."

The card reads:—"I admire your zeal in trying to forward your beliefs. I am sure you are a sincere person. But I cannot accept your literature. You preach a cruel and unreasonable god who is going to sweep most of his children away in a horrible battle of Armageddon while you Witnesses stand aside and look on.

"I don't believe that you will really like to look at such a wicked thing. You are too kind for that. Yet you make out that God is not good and kind. He destroys his own children, not because they are morally bad, but rather because they do not join Jehovah's Witnesses. You would not treat your children like that. So you are better than the god you preach.

"For ages he has known, according to you, that he was going to have this horrible battle of Armageddon, and yet he has gone on making more children to be destroyed. I want nothing to do with such a god. If you go on preaching him, you will get to be like him, cruel and unreasonable. You Witnesses consider this world hopeless and so you leave it to perish. You make an effort to help the suffering by supporting hospitals, orphanages or other works of mercy. You take no part in seeing that we have good, honest government.

Cod Of Love.

"I believe in the true God, the God of love, not in your old god of hate. I believe in the gospel—that means the good news that God loves us and cares for us. I do not believe your message of bad news. I know what the true God is like. Your unreasonable god is not one bit like Jesus who went about doing good, healing the sick, feeding the hungry, and himself died for us on the Cross instead of destroying us. You are too good a person to be a Jehovah's Witness. Be a witness for Jesus and the God of love. Spread his good news of the gift of eternal life here and hereafter.

"Thank you for calling and for listening to me. I shall be pleased if you will read this. Good day, and God bless and convert you."

—"Church Times," 6/3/59.

* * *

"Success Beyond Its Hopes In Catholic Inquiry Centre."

From our own correspondent.

Fleet Street.

A big advertising campaign in British newspapers and magazines, designed to attract more converts to the Roman Catholic Church, is shortly to be launched. This is revealed in the annual report of the Catholic Inquiry Centre, which has its headquarters in London. The centre was prevented from increasing the volume of its advertising last year because it had to spend its money on erecting a large new building alongside the present headquarters to cater for its increasing work.

In the report, the Rev. Michael O'Connor, the young Irish priest who is director of the centre, says that "the fruits of our work in past five years have surpassed all our hopes." He states that inside those five years 116,645 people had asked for the centre's brochure; 64,687 had taken the postal course of instruction and 4,144 had later notified the centre that they had become Roman Catholics as a result.

"Our advertisement campaign has been extremely successful and we are convinced that as we enlarge and improve it further we will have even more satisfactory results," Father O'Connor says.

The centre also plans to increase the number of its voluntary helpers in the British Isles from 60,000 to 250,000.

What sort of people reply to the centre's advertisements?

"People of all creeds and of none, from all over the country, including Northern Ireland," a spokesman at the centre told me to-night.

[The above is from "The Northern Whig" of Belfast, (27/2/59). We do not question the statistics, and it may easily be seen that a recruitment of some 4,000 out of an initial body of enquirers of some 116,000 is only 1/28 of the total, or very little over 3%. No sign is given of the permanence of those conversions. Nevertheless, evangelical Protestants might very well learn a lesson here, and try to propagate the gospel faith on a sound level of historical and biblical scholarship, and with Christian courtesy as well].

* * *

World Refugee Year. Inter-Church Aid.

Inter-Church Aid and Refugee Service will be taking a major part in World Refugee Year which the United Nations Third Committee recently approved by a big majority.

The idea of an international Year to speed up refugee resettlement originated in this country and for some time a committee has been in existence, successfully urging the Government to give its backing. On the committee's initiative H.M. Government, through diplomatic channels, secured international

(Continued on p. 47.)

THE STORY OF A PRIEST.

The Rev. Jose M. Rico.

Most readers know that a great deal of evangelical work is carried on in South or Latin America. It is largely supported and staffed by our co-religionists in the United States and Canada. We have read of the persecution of evangelicals in Colombia, and realise that it is an example, perhaps an extreme one, of the opposition to the spread of Gospel knowledge. Recently, in the "Irish Times," we have had a correspondence in this matter. Roman Catholic writers have either sought to disprove that there has been any persecution of evangelicals in Colombia, or to suggest that some outrages did take place, but in a time of Communist-Conservative conflict, or asked us to remember that Colombia is a very different sort of place compared with Ireland or Great Britain. Protestant correspondents have patiently shown the dubious character of some of the evidence brought forward against the claim that there has been religious persecution. We would be more gratified to read in the same paper a full discussion of the situation of Protestants in Spain. In that Western European state, far nearer to us than Colombia, evangelicals are beset by hindrances and persecutions of a very vexatious sort. These are not denied. It is however suggested that they may be ignored because evangelicals are very very few in number. There is a legal precept "de minimis non curat lex" but that has never been God's point of view, and no Christian man should dismiss moral and spiritual injustice on the ground that the victims are few and insignificant.

* * *

The reaction of Roman Catholic bishops in South America to evangelical enterprise and success has been a plea to Europe for a supply of priests to provide for the vast areas of their continent. As Spanish is the usual language of Latin America (excepting Brazil in which Portuguese is the basic language), the clergy from Europe have mostly been Spanish.

Fr. Rico went to South America partly because of this plea, and partly because he wished to see the continent which had once been the great overseas possession of Spain. When he reached South America and saw in various cities Protestant churches claiming and receiving social recognition he felt a sense of outrage. In his native land Protestantism was repressed, persecuted, and denied many elementary rights, and he thought that was how it ought to be everywhere. When he reached his destination in Antofagasta, Chile, he was determined to oppose Protestantism vigorously.

What sort of "Protestantism" exists in South America? We are not very well informed about this, but believe we are correct in saying that orthodox Presbyterianism and Episcopal Methodism are well represented, especially in Brazil. The Baptists and the Brethren are active in certain lands, and the so-called "Pentecostal" churches are strong. Anglicanism (mainly of the American Protestant Episcopal Church) is represented also. No doubt many smaller denominations exist in defined areas. The important fact is that all these groups or communions hold and preach a common faith. Their faith is deep-seated and orthodox; their divisions are superficial. Holy Scripture is the supreme Rule of Faith. It, therefore, is the great bond of union among orthodox non-Roman Catholic peoples.

As Fr. Rico read evangelical literature in order to be able to refute Protestantism this fact began to dawn on him, and he soon perceived that what he had been taught about Protestantism in his Seminary and in his text-books was very different from the faith expressed in the evangelical books he now read. He noted the rich Scriptural content of the books and soon came to respect and value it.

Having been transferred to Bolivia, the republic north of Chile, to do special work among students, he became absorbed into the "Catholic Action" movement. At the same time he became acquainted with some who held the evangelical faith. Becoming alert to the spiritual implication of certain lines of thought occupying his mind, he asked himself if this sort of growing sympathy with evangelical thought was a device of Satan. Fearing that it was he set about preparing a book on "The Priest and the Host." In it he tried to use the Epistle to the Hebrews as a Biblical foundation, but soon saw that this epistle was exclusively concerned with our own High Priest who is in heaven, and Who put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself.

He marked further how the Epistle to the Hebrews teaches that there can be no further or other offering for sin.

Here then was the challenge to his faith and dogmatic profession. How can there be a bloodless renewal day by day of that which was offered on Calvary once for all? [not, be it noted, once "for all men," but once, fully, perfectly, sufficiently, and not to be repeated].

* * *

The study of this epistle and the plain implications of its teaching brought light and conviction—Fr. Rico saw that the ground for Purgatory fell away—sins purged (Heb. 1, 3) need no Purgatory to purify them. So with other unevangelical doctrines: in the light of the Cross truth and error were at last clearly distinguishable.

The next step was to find a faithful Bible scholar with whom to talk in search of fuller knowledge. Fr. Rico met the director of the Bible Institute in La Paz, Bolivia, and as a result of diligent enquiry he became an evangelical Christian.

We cannot think that this is in any way extraordinary. To us the thing seems simple enough—if a man diligently studies the New Testament (not as a text-book, but as a revelation of the Christian way of life and thought) we believe that he will discover a new conception of the Christian faith. He will see that what is there described is not a historical situation in the distant past, nor a formless mass of raw material which needs to be shaped, or moulded, or modelled into a system. He will discover something which does not need tradition to make sense of it, or to augment it. He will find a living faith founded upon a living and enduring experience of a living Saviour. He will realise Christ's presence, His grace, His Spirit. That is the transforming experience which reduces rites, traditions, and ceremonies to their proper proportions and significance.

Fr. Rico, being justified by faith, had peace with God. After nineteen years in official priesthood of his Church he was now an evangelical. The year was 1956.

Are there others like Fr. Rico? In answer we can quote a paragraph from "Evangelical Press Service" of 1958 that "In Bolivia five priests have become Protestants during the last eighteen months and are devoting themselves to work in their new churches. One of them had been sent into a rural district to oppose the work of the Protestant groups there. To prepare himself for the task he undertook a systematic study of the Bible, and subsequently became a Protestant."

If a similar method had been chosen to oppose the work of Protestant groups in Colombia, instead of violence, what happy results might have followed! We pray that the study of God's Word may always produce beneficent results in this world and in eternity.

CHRIST'S DEITY.

In these days of religious error when the Enemy's agents are remarkably active in spreading denials of the truth we are bound to turn our thoughts to the clear understanding of the Person of Our Redeemer. One great aim of the Enemy is to lower the status of the Saviour in the thoughts of His professed followers. If he can persuade us to stop praying to God the Son he has indeed won a signal victory. If he can talk the simple and ignorant out of believing in the Holy and Undivided Trinity he has struck a blow at Christ's Kingdom and prerogatives. If the Enemy can blind our eyes to the fact that Jesus is Jehovah he has prepared the way for fresh onslaught on the citadel of truth: while professing the greatest zeal for the Word of God he has discredited some of its plainest indications of the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son.

Let us remember that the Enemy of the souls of men is the foe of all men. He is the deceiver, and deceives those who in ignorance serve his purposes as much as he deceives through them the impressionable and the uneducated. Have we not heard of Satan being transformed into an angel of light in order to mislead? Who, confronted with an angel of light would dream that he was the Prince of Darkness? Did not Christ Himself say that Satan would, if it were possible, deceive even God's elect? (Matt. 24, 24.).

* * *

What then did Our Lord say of Himself? When we answer that we shall face at straight issue—do we believe Him or not? If He is God's Anointed Son we must believe Him. If we accept the New Testament as God's inspired Word we are bound to acknowledge that it is not only the Book about Redemption, but is the Book about the Redeemer.

* * *

How do we explain Christ's words to the Jews as given by St. John (8, 56).—"Before Abraham was I am"? Here is a declaration of pre-existence; of priority in time as well as in honour. But it is far more. Look at Exodus 3, 15—there we read that Jehovah revealed His name to Moses and directed him to command Pharaoh to release the Israelites. His name? "I AM THAT I AM." Moses was to say to Pharaoh "I AM hath sent me unto you." "I AM" is the nearest we can go in English to translating the Hebrew name which stands in our Bibles as "Jehovah." Now we can see what Our Lord meant when He said "Before Abraham was I AM."

* * *

Think of the phrase "ye call me Master and Lord; and ye say well, for so I am" (John 13, 13). We may grant to the title "Master" an ordinary Hebrew or Jewish sense, the equivalent of Rabbi, but we must recognise in the title Lord something more than the merely honorific. We recall St. Paul's "One Lord, one faith, one baptism," and St. Thomas's "My Lord and my God." Other phrases of the same meaning will occur to us, and carry us to a true understanding of the sublime declaration of Jesus—"I and the Father are One" (John 10, 30.).

* * *

Next, we look at what Our Lord tells of His mission. The language as well as the atmosphere of His Work take us far beyond the concept of agency, embassy, or message. Our Lord is more than a deputy. He does not say that God is "the Light of the World" though we know that "God is Light": He says "I am the Light of the World." This can only be the truth or self-deception—there is no middle course.

"I am the way, the truth, and the life"—here we have a stupendous claim. If we reinterpret it to say "I am the true and living Way of God" we may appear to have abated the claim. But it only appears to be reduced. Who can claim to be the true and living way to God the One Who is immortal and invisible, dwelling in the light no man can approach, except One Who participates in the Divine Nature and Substance of Deity? All else must fall short of the reality Our Lord spoke of.

One memorable and comforting promise of Our Lord—"Come unto Me . . . and I will give you rest"—carries the same implication. He does not say "Go to the Father, and He will give you rest", but "come unto Me". What warrant had

He for issuing such an invitation, or for advancing such a claim? The foes of His prerogative and heavenly status may resist the plain meaning and fight their case text by text, but if we take the over-all impression, without minimising or exaggerating anything, it is hard to avoid the conclusion which the doctrine of the Holy Trinity seeks to safeguard. Our Lord can give rest, because it is His to give. It is His because it is the property of the Godhead: it is Jehovah's rest, as we see in Hebrews 3; 11 and 18.

The doctrine of the Creeds is not contradictory of Holy Scripture nor does it stand apart from Holy Scripture as built upon other foundations—the Creeds affirm what the Bible declares—no more: no less.

We mark too the claim "the Son of Man hath power to forgive sins" (Matt. 9; 6). Our Lord repeatedly did what God only may do. Again we see the evidence that "Jesus is Jehovah." Forgiveness is the divine quality. We may forgive each other, but man's forgiveness only affects a social relationship. God is the One against Whom sin is an offence. It offends His holiness, and He only can forgive it. Our Lord's claim, if He is not "of one substance with the Father", goes beyond presumptuousness and becomes blasphemy.

* * *

The sense of power is never absent from Our Lord's incarnate life. It is no febrile energy but a calm mastery of every situation and of every opposition. He says "My words shall not pass away." They are still with us. He says "I have power to lay down My life, and to take up My life." Such words make no sense if they are not spoken by Jehovah-Jesus, on the lips of a created being, they are vanity itself.

He says "I am the Resurrection and the Life"—the authority here claimed is God's, and all men knew it. Do we not recall the old outburst of Jehoram "Am I God, to kill and to make alive?" He knew that only God could "make alive." The One who claims to be "the Resurrection," and Who said "Lazarus, come forth" can be no other than God the Son.

In His risen glory the Redeemer said "All authority hath been given unto Me in heaven." Has God a rival there, or a mere glorified man or angel at His right hand? No. At His right hand there can be no one but Him Who shares the same nature of Deity, the Triune Jehovah.

* * *

The glory of the Son is the same glory as the Father's. See John 17; 5, John 17; 24 and Matt. 24; 30. We have no lack of revealed truth to convince us that "the Word was with God, and the Word was God." John 1; 1,

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the Manager, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

Some Scenes of The Year of Grace: The Ulster Revival, 1859.

We are anxious that the realities of the religious revival of a century ago should be recalled, as possibly some may tend to dismiss the matter as gross emotionalism. In the "Sunday Independent" (Dublin) of 15th March there is an instalment of a serialised biography of Joseph Devlin, M.P., the once famous Belfast Nationalist leader: referring to the anti-home rule campaign under Edward Carson the writer speaks of a wave of hysteria spreading over Ulster, and says such waves of hysteria were not unknown in the province. If the Ulster Revival of 1859 is treated as "a wave of hysteria" it is an easy way to get rid of all divine significance in it. This is what many people would like, for even professing Christians readily incline to believe that "all things continue as they were since creation," and either that God does not, will not, or cannot, intervene to awaken souls, quicken spiritual life, and reinvigorate His Church.

The temptation to get rid of an unusual experience is common to all of us. The mighty acts of God evoke a good deal of scepticism, because there have been many deceptions and delusions, and many bogus religious movements. We ought, however, to be careful and discriminating. Frauds and blunders have always been with us, and they are far commoner in secular life than in religious life. Yet we know that sound and genuine things occur. We need to sift the wheat from the chaff, and when we have done that a great deal will remain which is plainly the fruit of a real change of heart, of sincere conviction, and of an influx of spiritual power and light into the soul. Can anyone deny that much of the revival was honest acceptance of the truths and obligations imposed by God's Word which we all acknowledge?

* * *

Let us turn to Dr. Gibson's book "The Year of Grace" to which we have referred already in our pages. In it we find substantial evidence of realities. Dr. Gibson gathered his information carefully. He does not dwell much on the extravagances and hysterias of the time, nor upon the peculiar psychological or physical condition of many who attracted attention in one place or another. The excitements are distinguishable from the sober and enduring effects. One point will illustrate this—in many places existing church buildings had to be enlarged: in others new buildings had to be erected—these could not be mushroom growths, springing up overnight. Plans had to be drawn, contracts given, money found, and bills paid. If it was only a wave of hysteria it left very substantial and visible results.

Another point is that the character of the people as a whole showed marked improvement. Sobriety, industry, faith, regularity in public worship, concern about saving truth, zeal for religious education, interest in spreading the gospel: all these we have written of earlier, and they are a standing answer to the claim that the whole movement was ephemeral and illusory.

Dr. Gibson does not give the impression of failing in candour. He did not set out to describe every single thing, but to describe literally "the Year of Grace." Some objected to this, as we know. They were free to tell the story in their way: was not Dr. Gibson free to tell it in his, as long as he did not falsify facts or put down fabrications in place of truth? As a Christian minister he wrote of Christian things—the outside world has little willingness to appreciate this, and little ability to do so, for "spiritual things are spiritually discerned."

* * *

Dr. Gibson first indicates that the revival did not come upon people utterly unprepared for it. He quotes a minister in Ballymena, Co. Antrim, as writing that for some years "there had been a gradual but perceptible improvement in the state of religion throughout this district... Sabbath schools were greatly multiplied, Prayer-meetings were growing up in many districts." It was marked that people attended public worship in larger numbers. All this preceded the great movement of revival.

Similarly, we read a report from North Antrim in which it is emphasised that earnest people were counting on an awakening in religious concerns. Very probably the same situation existed in many parts of the North (as indeed elsewhere) for there was no scarcity of serious and spiritually minded ministers in all churches; and no scarcity of serious and believing people.

Gibson gives good details of the growing spirit of prayer which showed itself in many places. Is there any possible criticism to be levelled at prayer for revival? Can professing, or even nominal Christians and Church members raise any objection to prayer for "power from on high," for effective realisation of the Spirit's presence, and submission to Him? Of course not. The unbeliever may be superior and cynical, but the people of God have the sense of the Father's love, and faith in the Father's Word. They can reach the point of confessing "one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see."

* * *

As the revival spread it was noted that (in Gibson's words) "a pervading seriousness," prevailed. This is the very opposite of light-headed emotionalism or hysteria. Serious religious concerns need not be narrowly "puritanical" or fanatical. What they entail is a responsible and consistent attitude to our faith. Young people, and some not so young, may be filled with enthusiasm, but religious enthusiasm is not a single uniform thing. Some enthusiasms may be objectionable (such as wrongheaded and heretical sectarianisms, or the exaggeration of particular doctrines, or the loyalties evoked by certain plausible individuals), but others are not. We can never discredit the enthusiasm of the apostles or of the Christian heroes of the past. We will not belittle the enthusiasm of our martyrs, or the enthusiasm of such men as William Carey, Henry Martyn, Pilkington, Moffatt, Livingstone, Pattison—they are among the great cloud of witnesses now in glory. If we want to read of enthusiasm in the highest sense, we can turn to the Revelation of St. John, and there study for ourselves the enthusiasm of the redeemed in heaven.

Pervading seriousness is not opposed to enthusiasm, for enthusiasm may be the incentive to conviction and to a determined and persevering Christian life. It is noted by Gibson that in the spring of 1859 some hundreds in the Connor Section of Co. Antrim had been "seemingly brought under the benign influence of the work of Grace." He adds "as yet no physical excitement had appeared; the process was a purely spiritual one, carried on in the sanctuary of the mind—the Spirit of God acting through the medium of His then truth upon the spirit of man." We could wish that the revival had continued in this form without the extravagant aspects—but it is clear from Gibson's words that revival then and since, is independent of abnormalities.

* * *

It may safely be said that the explanation of the emotional upsurges is to be found in the varieties of human temperament. Psychic and other elements of our make-up contribute to and condition our reactions. This can be illustrated by the wonderful art of music and our response to it. Music can be treated as almost a mathematical science, yet the effects of harmonious and rhythmical sounds upon different people are amazing. Some are utterly indifferent and unmoved: others are profoundly affected and entranced. Between these extremes are many degrees of response. We think that on certain personalities the earnest and challenging preaching of the gospel will call forth an emotional response—in others the response may have no outward sign, but a transformed attitude to life will be the result.

* * *

Here is a description of a weaver in Co. Antrim given by Gibson—"He was immersed in the horror of a deeper darkness (than night), his whole frame trembling as in the immediate presence of the Invisible. In the midst of a soul-conflict, in which he experienced the pangs of unutterable agony he found a measure of relief in prostrating himself before the throne of mercy . . . day after day he groaned under the weight of his soul-sorrow, and sought deliverance with awful cries and supplications."

"At length his burden was graciously removed, and, rising from his loom, he fell on his knees, and gave full vent to his rejoicing in rapturous thanksgivings. Thenceforward a new life was infused into him, and he burned with an unquenchable desire to glorify the name of his Almighty Saviour."

Many who would be impressed by this man's experience were it recorded of someone in a mediaeval monastery, or of a Rhine-land mystic, will dismiss it as mere excitement when it is told of a nineteenth century weaver in Protestant Co. Antrim. But what is true in the light of a friar's lantern is no less true in the light of the modern world—indeed it is admitted by the best spiritual writers that the mystic's direct and immediate apprehension of God is valid though it means that church and sacraments are transcended. If there are real experiences of the Holy Spirit, marked, it may often be by some ecstasy, then they may be authentic in any age of Christianity, and in any environment—Presbyterian, Anglican, Lutheran or Roman.

Gibson mentions certain people who were filled with a great fear of hell—"with wringing of hands, streams of tears, and a look of unutterable anguish, they confess their sins in tones of unmistakable sincerity, and appeal to the Lord for mercy with a cry of piercing earnestness. I have seen the strong frame convulsed; I have witnessed every joint trembling; I have heard the cry as I have never heard it before, "Lord Jesus, have mercy upon my sinful soul; Lord Jesus, come to my burning heart; Lord, pardon my sins; oh, come and lift me from these flames of hell."

"These convictions vary in different individuals, both in strength and duration. While some obtain peace in believing soon after their conviction, others do not attain it for several days. It is after many a conflict, with conviction oft returning, with much prayer and reading of the Word, through which spiritual light makes great progress in the mind, that a settled peace and holy joy take possession of the soul."

Here also we have spiritual states which can be paralleled in all generations, from the Psalmist and Prophet to the saints, heroes, and all other people of God, and to the present time. Not for a moment do we say that this pattern of spiritual experience is the sole pattern, or that it must be copied or reproduced in every believer: we believe that "God fulfils Himself in many ways" (or, if Holy Scripture is more to the point here than Alfred Tennyson)—"The wind bloweth where it listeth: thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth, so is everyone that is born of the Spirit." These are Our Lord's words, and they remind us that there can be no conventional or standardised Christian experience.

* * *

The Irish Countryman and his neighbour of the town (who is at heart a countryman) are well-known for their addiction to sport. Bloody pastimes are still popular; coursing of hares, fox-hunting, and cock-fighting (this last illegal) have numerous adherents. In 1859, with a bigger population and a less humane view of things, the addicts of cock-fighting could assemble in vast concourses. Even to-day this barbarous and illegal pastime is at least occasionally practised in Northern counties, with big crowds and much betting. Constabulary and Civic guards try to break it up, and fines are imposed. We cannot say if this sport was illegal in 1859, so we transcribe a passage quoted by Gibson—

"I may quote a statement respecting a meeting at Creaghrock, midway between Ahoghill and Randalstown (Co. Antrim), a place where, ever since, at the request of the people, a monthly religious meeting has been held in the open-air, attended by hundreds. 'This place has become famous, or rather infamous, as a cockpit, especially on Ahoghill old fair-day, when thousands would assemble for the degrading sport of cockfighting, thereby making it a scene of lying, blasphemy, drunkenness, and all manner of profligacy. In these "revival" times a number of the awakened, some of whom were perhaps "cockers" themselves, resolved on this occasion to make it a far different scene, and therefore invited several ministers to attend, and address the meeting against all manner of vice, and for the promotion of all manner of holiness. The meeting was at ten o'clock a.m., and even at that hour crowds in all directions, and of all characters—in many cases from a distance of five or six miles [in those days of no cars or bicycles a walk of an hour and a half]—were seen wending their way gladly to the Rock, and at one time there could not have been much less than two thousand present. The meeting was addressed by four ministers, and pious prayers were offered up by fervent laymen. A most solemn impression was produced on all."

A year later Gibson obtained the information that in that district the grace of God was producing "light and knowledge, prayer and praise, attendance in ordinances, holiness of life, and reformation of manners. Hundreds are rejoicing in the Lord. Great gladness has been introduced into families. Men that were coarse and savage, and a source of untold misery to their wives, are now so altered, so mild, so pleasant, so God-like, that the change in their domestic happiness is like heaven on the earth." Along with this went revitalised public worship in all churches, and an absence of hitherto prevailing sins. What was true in Co. Antrim was true in every place where the Revival showed itself. Only the wilfully blind and determinedly prejudiced could ignore such blessed results.

* * *

In some quarters fun was made of the "testimonies" of the converts. This was un-Christian, ill-mannered, and discreditable to people who ought to have known better. Many of the converts who testified were unlettered and rough—they received in their conversion the grace of the Holy Spirit but not the accomplishments of a polite education—why deride them when they spoke clumsily and ungrammatically, if there was a ring of genuineness in their words, and a chance to test their claims by observation? Let it be recollected that most of them gave their testimonies among people who knew them well for years. For instance, at Broughshane a ragged old nail-maker who bore the marks of a confirmed drunkard testified "many of you know me; you have but to look at me and recognise the profligate of Broughshane. You know I was an old man hardened in sin; you know I was a servant of the devil. I brought my wife and family to beggary fifty years ago. But I have seen Jesus... my heavy and enormous sin is gone; the Lord Jesus took it away; and I stand before you not only a pattern of profligacy, but a monument of the perfect grace of God."

* * *

In industrial centres, such as Belfast, where large numbers of young people worked long hours in factories, and girls were toiling from dawn to dusk at looms, at hemstitching, veining, and other branches of the linen manufacture, there were many instances of strange trance-like conditions. Perhaps these conditions would not have happened among better-nourished young women who had more leisure (though they did happen in rural areas), but the fact to remember is that even if we eliminate half the Revival effect as mere hysteria (or other psychosomatic disturbance) we are left with the great persisting effects upon the individual in countless instances. We must take account of the spiritual zeal and devotion to the faith which continues to this day. We must also take note of the world-wide impact of the Revival and the impetus it gave to foreign missions as well as to social reform. Dr. Barnado, a Dublin man, was a convert of the Revival. Only a fool will deny the depth of Christian conviction which lay behind Barnado's work.

* * *

Another criticism of the Revival was that it affected mainly the lower strata of society (we apologise for putting it this way). First, the ordinary people were much more numerous than the farmers, shopkeepers, professional men and land-owners, so naturally they appeared in greater numbers on all occasions. Secondly, the share of all sections of the community in the Revival is shown by the increased numbers of churches, by their enlargement, by the much greater numbers of candidates for ordination and for overseas missionary service. We have heard that in Co. Dublin the passengers in the first-class railway carriages between Bray and Dublin were greatly occupied with religious conversation and testimony. The eminent laymen from all parts of Ireland who came together some ten years after 1859 to reorganise the worship and constitution of the Church of Ireland after its Disestablishment in 1869, thus for the first time co-operating with their bishops and clergy in such action, were to a very real extent influenced by the Revival which released a new fund of spiritual energy and interest among men of prominent place in public affairs.

Chief Baron Pigott presided at Assizes in Co. Down, and spoke of the Revival in most approving terms—he described it as having ended party animosities and produced the most wholesome moral results in the community at large. The Chief Baron was himself a Roman Catholic. He hoped the Revival "would extend over the whole country and influence society to the lowest depths."

* * *

Gibson, towards the end of his book speaks of "The Revival and Roman Catholicism." There were converts from Rome, but he says that in some the first transient impressions were speedily effaced... "however, notwithstanding the operation of varied and adverse influences, many were intelligently enabled to relinquish their ecclesiastical relationships, and to embrace the simple truth as it is in Jesus.

* * *

In conclusion, Gibson emphasises the marked co-incidence between the leading features of the Revival and those which characterised the working of the Spirit in Apostolic times—

Holding fast the Christian profession.

Steadfastness in doctrine.

Steadfastness in fellowship.

Delight in "the Breaking of Bread."

Continuance in prayer.

Oneness of interest among the subjects of the Awakening. See Acts 2, 42. ff.

He ends with the words "This great awakening casts a new light upon the duties and responsibilities of individual Christians." Indeed grace begins and continues with the individual believer.

* * *

We hope that these illustrations of the Year of Grace may help readers to picture to themselves some of "the mighty acts of God" in our own land, and lead them to pray for spiritual revival among us in 1959.

NEWS FROM ISRAEL

By

CANON HUGH JONES

The year 1958 has witnessed the tenth anniversary of the State of Israel. During this first decade of life we have seen a steady build up and consolidation in the face of heavy economic strain and continual rise of prices, a strain which is likely to increase considerably during the coming year, as Israel expects a further wave of immigrants from eastern European countries, and no immediate prospect of peace with her Arab neighbours, though one might detect a faint ray of hope in Mr. Hammerskold's forthcoming visit to the Middle East at the end of this year, to discuss amongst other things the implementation of Article 8 of the Israel-Jordan Armistice agreement, which stipulates amongst other things free access from Israel to the Holy Places in the Old City of Jerusalem, including the Wailing Wall. If the physical barrier between the two peoples which has existed for ten years could be breached, it could lead to the breaking down of the barrier of mistrust and hatred, and pave the way for a better understanding between Jew and Arab.

There is only space here to mention one of the many significant ceremonies held during this tenth anniversary year, and that is the laying of the foundation stone of Israel's new Knesset or Parliament building in a fine vantage point in the new administrative centre in the hills on the western outskirts of Jerusalem. The scroll describing this important event was signed by Israel's leaders in many walks of life, and inserted in a metal case in the top of the foundation stone.

Space again permits mention of only one aspect of Israel's life, which is inevitably going through a process of reassessment and change during this formative period of her rebirth. It concerns a no less fundamental question than "Who is a Jew?"

The religious orthodox group, which has had the monopoly over matters of personal status such as marriages, burials, etc., has been arousing increasing discontent amongst the non-orthodox, which is by far the larger section of the population, over some of its narrow and restrictive rulings.

For instance, some months ago the child of a mixed marriage, the father a Jew and the mother a Gentile, died and was buried in a Jewish cemetery. Later the Orthodox Jewish burial society disinterred the body and reburied it outside the cemetery, explaining that according to Jewish orthodox law the children take the religion of the mother. As the mother of this particular child was non-Jewish, the child was non-Jewish and therefore could not be buried in a Jewish cemetery. This action caused widespread disapproval in Israel. The orthodox group, who held the post of Minister of the Interior, shortly afterwards ruled that Jews wishing to immigrate to Israel must prove their Jewish identity.

As this ruling was going to create difficulties for many Jewish families of mixed marriages wishing to come to Israel, the non-orthodox members of the cabinet overruled the decision of the orthodox Minister of Interior, and stated that the narrow orthodox interpretation of who is a Jew could not be accepted. This brought about the resignation of the orthodox party from the coalition, and has revealed a deep rift between the orthodox and non-orthodox elements in Israel.

The problem basically is that the orthodox wish to stick to the traditional talmudic ruling as to who is a Jew, whilst the Prime Minister and the majority of liberal minded Jews do not wish to be held to the narrow orthodox rulings in this and many other matters, as for example, the many strict rules which govern Sabbath observance.

It is not that the liberal minded Jews are non-religious necessarily, on the contrary, there is in many quarters a growing interest in the Old Testament and a desire to get back to closer understanding of the word of God, with the feeling that the narrow talmudic interpretation tends rather to obscure than to elucidate the word of God.

However, this decision of the Government to define "Who is a Jew?" by the simple formula of anyone who considers himself in good faith to be a Jew and who does not profess any other religion" has created a serious breach with orthodox elements and has recently been withdrawn. The whole question is to be submitted to a panel of Jewish scholars for their consideration and advice.

The fact that the Jewish people, after 4,000 years of history, cannot decide on the definition as to who is a Jew, is surely the best evidence that Israel has not yet realised or fulfilled her mission in the world, to which she was called and chosen by God.

With a growing interest amongst so many Jews in the New Testament, perhaps the best definition of where many of them stand to-day is found in the answer of a famous Prime Minister of Great Britain in the nineteenth century, the Jew Disraeli, who when asked what his beliefs were, replied after some reflection, "Well, I think I am the blank page between the Old and New Testaments."

At least, if his faith was not very concrete, he could hardly be standing in a better place. For the blank page between the Old and New Testaments is a very good position from which to search the Old and New Testaments, and to find the vital inter-relationship and complementary nature of the one to the other, which when understood and appropriated must lead the seeker into the realisation of God's plan and purpose for the redemption of mankind.

—"Jewish Missionary News," Mar. '59.

SURVIVAL OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE.

Jewish leaders are increasingly perturbed about the Jewish future and the survival of Judaism, but can find no means of arresting tendencies and present day events in the Jewish world. The problem is confused and has become a question—"What is a Jew?" to which, so far there is no answer, since there is no authority that can give a satisfactory definition. This problem brought about in Israel a cabinet crisis and two Ministers of State resigned office. The Prime Minister appointed a commission to study the subject. The commission's findings were rejected. An appeal was sent all over the world to Jewish scholars and eminent Rabbis to find an answer to the question. The result is awaited.

Intermarriage, assimilation, indifferentism; the problem, children of mixed marriages—are they to be considered Jews? How to protect Jewish children from Christian influence in schools, young people in universities. These and many others are the aspects that aggravate the problem, can Jews survive?

Professor H. Levy, lately discussed the subject—"Can Jews survive in the Modern World?" His conclusion is in the negative. He recalled that orthodox Judaism in Western countries, was dependent, prior to the last war, upon East European countries for its survival. There can be no doubt that Jewish Orthodoxy and Hebrew culture flourished in East European countries. But these centres were destroyed by Nazi brutality and Communism did the rest. These centres produced the most eminent Rabbis and men of learning and saintliness. Incidentally, some of those centres were the most fruitful fields for the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. From these centres came Jewish converts, men mighty in the Scriptures, and were a great asset to the Christian Church. It is true to experience, where Jewish orthodoxy fails to flourish, there the field is barren for the Gospel of Christ. A sincere and honest orthodox Jew cannot withstand the claims of the Gospel of Christ for very long. With a materialistic Jew it is most difficult to make headway in spiritual things.

Professor Levy is of the opinion that in the countries of the West, where Jews are deprived of the life-blood of Jewish emigration from East European countries, the process of assimilation will continue to progress with no counterbalancing factors making for Jewish survival in sight. Russian persecution evoked resistance and kept the Jewish community together. With given freedom, Russian Jewry will disappear as a distinct people, through assimilation and intermarriage. The professor thinks that the existence of Israel and the development of a Jewish culture in Israel cannot be regarded as a sufficient stimulus to the preservation of Jewish life in foreign countries, equal to that which the former Jewish centres in Eastern Europe used to provide. For, while Eastern Europe used to send the thousands of orthodox Jews to settle in Jewish communities in Western countries and stimulated Judaism, Israel is actually drawing away to herself the more national elements of Jewry. He considered it doubtful whether Israel herself can survive in the Middle East, unless a dramatic change in the world situation takes place. In the event of a conflict between the great powers, the Middle East will be obliterated. Everywhere, he said, the Jews were now on the brink of the precipice.

This sort of thinking is merely on human level, leaving God out of consideration; it cannot, therefore, be otherwise than pessimistic. The Professor would do better if he turned to the Word of God, where he would find God's plan for Israel, where no room is left for pessimism. "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divided the sea when the waves thereof roar; the Lord of hosts is His Name; if those ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever" Jer. 31, 35-36. Rabbinic Judaism must die, but Israel will be born again and fulfill Messiah's mission to the nations of the world.

—In "Immanuel's Witness," March, 1959.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 39.

support for the idea, and the measure of its success was reflected in the favourable vote of 56 member states.

The British Foreign Office and the office of the High Commissioner for Refugees both have observers on the U.K. World Refugee Year Committee on which Inter-Church Aid is represented by its Director, Miss Janet Lacey. Also on the committee are other major refugee agencies, and the United Nations Association.

Government Promise.

This committee recognised that no matter how successful World Refugee Year may prove to be there will still be a refugee problem at the end of it and that agencies such as Inter-Church Aid will still have the task of maintaining interest in their resettlement and relief programmes. It was therefore decided that it would be harmful to the future work of permanent refugee agencies to create a new organisation for World Refugee Year and to ask everybody to support it. The Year has been fixed for June 1959 until June 1960, and during that period the public will be asked to support the recognised refugee organisations, each of which has pledged itself to intensify its efforts during Refugee Year. There is to be no central organisation except for a Secretary and small clerical staff whose functions will be to co-ordinate and to receive funds from those sources, such as the Government, which do not normally make their contributions direct to one of the refugee agencies. The British Government has already promised £100,000.

The committee has stated the objectives of World Refugee Year in the U.K. as follows:

1. Assistance to refugees under the mandate of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees;
2. Resettlement of European refugees from China;
3. Aid for refugees in Hong Kong;
4. Aid for Arab refugees.

It is further agreed that so far as possible the aid given should be towards permanent solutions.

The British Council of Churches meeting in Liverpool last month welcomed the conception of a World Refugee Year and in a resolution urged the Churches to "participate in the Year through their own agency, namely the Department of Inter-Church Aid and Refugee Service."

Christian Aid Week.

Although the next Christian Aid Week, April 27-May 2, will be over before the Year begins, it will be regarded as a useful preparation and education period for Church and public, focusing attention on the desperate needs of the refugees to be helped during the ensuing 12 months. The following Christian Aid Week, to be held during May, will provide a climax to World Refugee Year. Additional activities earlier in the year are being considered by Inter-Church Aid.

Commenting on the decision not to set up a central organisation to make a general appeal in World Refugee Year, Miss Janet Lacey said:

"Since the last war millions of people have become refugees. There is unfortunately every prospect that within the next decade many thousands more will also escape or be driven from their homelands, and it will still be the Christian Churches which play the biggest role in their resettlement and relief, as they have done in the last 10 years. It would therefore be quite wrong for Inter-Church Aid or any other refugee agency to lose its identity during World Refugee Year. The public must be asked to help the organisations which have for so long been at work on this problem—and which will still be at work long after Refugee Year is forgotten.

Shorten The Queue.

"World Refugee Year will, it is hoped, bring from Governments increased aid towards resettlement costs. But we must not expect too much from this 12-month campaign: it won't change the state of the world, and it won't change man's inhumanity. If by the end of 1960 we have substantially shortened the queue of refugees now awaiting new countries and have brought some measure of permanent relief to those who cannot be emigrated then World Refugee Year will have been a success.

"It is our hope that Church people throughout the land will demonstrate by a greatly increased support of Inter-Church Aid, their own refugee agency, that this is the work of the Churches and always will be so long as there are refugees."

—"The English Churchman", 21/11/'58.

THE NATIONAL UNION OF PROTESTANTS

"Set for the Defence of the Gospel"

Phil. 1, 17.

We "Contend earnestly for the Faith" but always in love to win souls to Christ.

Free literature and Membership Forms on request to—M. A. PERKINS, General Director.

New Headquarters Address:

65, SIRDAR ROAD, IPSWICH, SUFFOLK, ENGLAND.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing
"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

C all us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

M ay we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from—

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 5—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rugli—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	49
Cuba's Greatest Need	51
Church Unity (2)	52
Editor's Chair	54
Some Events noted in "The Revival Record", 1859, and Elsewhere	56

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Partition "The Only Workable Plan Now." Advice To Ulster Roman Catholics.

The Northern Ireland Roman Catholic must end his self-imposed segregation and must accept the fact of the partition of Ireland as something which under present conditions is the only practical, realistic and workable solution of the Irish problem, Dr. James Scott, of Queen's University, said in Armagh.

Dr. Scott, who was speaking on "The Advantages of Ireland" at the inauguration of a Newman Circle, said partition must remain until the Northern Roman Catholic can persuade his Protestant neighbours that a United Ireland is a more desirable alternative.

He must convince the rulers of the Republic that the unity of Ireland involves much hard and honest thinking on such matters as social services, standards of living, religious freedom, in terms of practice as well as belief, and a more realistic attitude towards economic and political co-operation with Great Britain.

Dr Scott said that in a very real sense the Northern Catholic holds the key position in the ultimate solution of the Irish problem, but "as yet he has shown very little awareness of his responsibilities."

"The only alternative to co-operation is a continuation of our past history of frustration punctuated by outbreaks of bigotry and acts of violence, and surely it is time we closed this unhappy and sterile chapter in our history," he declared.

The way of co-operation would not be easy, especially in its initial stages.

"Among the Unionists there will be, as there already is, an understandable reaction of fear and violent opposition on the part of those who see in co-operation the spectre of the Trojan horse; and among some of our own people there will be the equally understandable suspicion that co-operation means a betrayal of ideals for mere material comfort and gain," said Dr. Scott.

Co-operation involved in the first place giving credit where credit is due and not using every opportunity to abuse the Government for the mere sake of scoring debating points.

"As Catholics we would perhaps like more help for our schools, but we should be grateful for the help we get and for the fine modern buildings which are replacing the inadequate, over-crowded, and depressing classrooms of our own schooldays," he declared.

More Praise.

"As well as criticising those cases of discrimination in the allocation of houses by certain urban and rural councils, we should give more public praise and credit to bodies like the Housing Trust which, in spite of occasional pressure to play the party game, has a fine record of fair play."

The problem of unemployment is one which should be the responsibility of each person and not used as a stick with which to beat the Government on every opportunity.

Dr Scott said if the Nationalist party wanted to be taken seriously by the younger generation, even among its own people, it would have to give much more time to devising a constructive attitude to the problems facing the people, and show some evidence of having a realistic and workable alternative to the policies of the present Government.

The policy of co-operation involved a critical analysis of past mistakes and "a more intelligent appraisal of the true situation in which we live."

"The great weakness of the Nationalist opposition," he continued, "stems from the fact that partition took its members completely unawares, and for many years after the Government of Ireland Act they continued to deceive themselves and their people with the faith and hope that it could not and would not last.

"I hope that by now it is beginning to dawn on them or at least on their potential successors, that partition has come to stay for at least a very considerable time and that they must start to take more serious thought regarding their responsibilities towards the generations to come.

Individuals.

"It seems strange to me that there is apparently no Nationalist political organisation, nothing even approaching Glengall Street in efficiency, nothing corresponding to the Young Unionist organisations, no adequate policy devising and directing bodies; nothing in fact but a group of individuals whose actions at times seem quite incomprehensible!"

Dr. Scott said unless all this could be reformed and reformed quickly there was no future in the party and the young people of Nationalist Ulster would look elsewhere for their inspiration, if they did not become entirely cynical about the whole unhappy business.

"Although I am a convert to Catholicism I have never been converted to the nationalist viewpoint, and one very adequate reason is the failure of its representatives to attract me in any way," he said.

The history of alternating absence and attendance at Stormont and Westminster, the futility of the anti-partition league, the clumsy handling of the education and health service debates indicated a pathetic lack of leadership and policy.

The whole history of the party since the partition of Ireland would not make a proud chapter in the history of Ireland in the 20th century.

Work Together.

Dr. Scott said two communities must live together, work together, think and act together for one another and for their children.

"There is no gain for either side in recrimination, in abuse, in remembering past wrongs, in mis-interpretation of motives, and sterile segregation.

"First of all we must clear away the myths; the myth of a crafty, intolerant, unscrupulous Roman Church secretly training inquisitors in Maynooth until the Northern Protestants are a helpless minority in a United Ireland; the myth of the North held in slavery by British bayonets, and the myth of England licking her wounds and planning another conquest of Ireland.

"We must also discard some of our more fantastic and narrow-minded dreams; the dream of an Irish-speaking Irish republic imposed by government decree upon the people of Ireland for their own ultimate salvation; the dream of an entirely Catholic, or an entirely Protestant or entirely secular Ireland; the vision of national self-sufficiency and economic independence.

"These visions are not ignoble, they are merely impracticable, and we should in this world learn to want what we can get and seek to get it by co-operation with people who have other ideals and other dreams."

—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph" 27th Feb., '59.

[These views of a recruit to the Roman Catholic faith are worth study. We think them timely as offering fair criticism of much of the "anti-partitionist" propaganda which distorts public and social life in Northern Ireland.]

Italians "Free to Worship."

ROME—Non-Roman Catholic religious groups in Italy may open temples and oratories from now on without government permission, under a decision by the Constitutional Court made public in Rome recently.

The court held that prior permission, demanded by a decree issued under Fascism in 1930, violated Article 19 of the Republican Constitution.

The Article says that all people have the right freely to profess their religious faiths in any form, as individuals or groups.

* * *

Court Rules Italy Must Allow Protestant Churches To Open.

Italy's constitutional court, a newsmatch from Rome states, has ruled that Protestant religious groups may open places of worship without prior government permission. The ruling benefits about 150,000 persons, mostly Protestants, living in the predominantly Roman Catholic country, particularly two U.S. sects which have had considerable trouble with the Italian police since the war.

The high court decided that prior permission, demanded in a 28-year-old decree issued when Italy was Fascist (in the Lateran Treaty signed by Pope Pius XI and Mussolini) violated an article in the Italian constitution of 1946.

Under this Constitution, all people have the right to profess their faith freely in any form as individuals and groups. It says they can spread their beliefs and follow them in private or public, provided their rites do not run counter to public morals.

The court's ruling upheld the principle that the government must approve the nominations of non-Roman Catholic ministers. The ground was that these clergymen perform marriages and other ceremonies that have the force of official acts.

Protestant difficulties with the police have been frequent since the various sects began to gather after World War II. The Pentecostal Assemblies and the Church of Christ, two U.S. groups, have experienced most trouble.

These two sects and other Protestant sects are expected to intensify their activities as a result of the new ruling.

Several Protestant groups, active in central and southern Italy, have had their churches closed down and at least one U.S. pastor was sent home.

—"The Sentinel," Toronto, Feb., 1959.

* * *

Canon Law And The Proposed Ecumenical Council.

For the guidance of those who feel drawn to the brilliant spectacle that Pope John XXIII is now preparing at Rome, we give herewith the strict regulations of the code of Canon Law to which they must submit when they get to Rome:

CHAPTER II

Concerning Ecumenical Councils

Canon 222—(1.) It is not possible to hold an Ecumenical Council unless it is summoned by the Roman Pontiff.

(2.) It belongs to the Roman Pontiff to preside over an Ecumenical Council either himself or by deputies; to choose and decide the subjects of discussion and their order; and to transfer, suspend, dissolve the Council itself, and to confirm its decrees.

Canon 226—To the questions proposed by the Roman Pontiff, the Fathers may add others which the president of the council has previously approved.

Canon 227—The decrees of the council have not the definitive force of obligation unless they were confirmed by the Roman Pontiff and promulgated by his command.

Canon 228—(1.) The Ecumenical Council has supreme power in the universal Church.

(2.) There is no appeal allowed from the decision of the Roman Pontiff to an Ecumenical Council. —(Continued on p. 60.)

CUBA'S GREATEST NEED: FUSION OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANITY SEEN ONLY HOPE FOR TURBULENT ISLAND.

"It comes as a surprise to people of the United States when they discover that a majority of the Cuba's churches and chapels are not Roman Catholic but Protestant, that more Cubans are Protestant ministers than are Roman priests and that on an average Sunday church attendance is about the same at Protestant as at Roman Catholic services."

This statement was made by David White in an illuminating article on Cuba in "The Christian Century," January 21st issue. He further said that equally startling and a good deal more sobering was the fact that only 15 to 20 per cent of the island's population are active, church-attending Christians, whether Roman or Protestant. And it seems clear that the spiritual and moral poverty of the other 80 per cent is a legacy from the ill-treatment of the people by the Roman Catholic authorities that resulted in the development of a strong anti-clerical feeling. It (also) goes far to explain the recurrent strife in the island.

R.C. Faith From Spain.

Columbus found the island on his first voyage of discovery in 1492 and it became one of the most prized possessions of Spain's New World empire. The Spaniards brought with them their Roman Catholic faith, including some of its most fanatical manifestations.

The conquistadors dealt ruthlessly with the Indians who rebelled, even to the point of practical extermination and in their place they imported large numbers of African slaves. In Cuba, Roman Catholicism never accomplished more than applying the thinnest veneer of saint worship over an unchanged primitiveness.

"Today," says Mr. White, "only two blocks away from the Evangelical Seminary... the drums of darkest Africa can be heard beating out their immemorial rhythms. Animal and plant sacrifices are still being offered and the names of the old African deities are still in common use."

The first real revolt against the Spanish was the unsuccessful "Ten Years' War" in the 1870's. But a more determined one occurred in 1895 when it was completed by American intervention and independence was gained in 1902.

The struggle for freedom left an abiding mark on the religious life of Cuba. One major result was a pronounced anti-clericalism which often issued in secularism. As Mr. White puts it:

"The Roman Catholic Church supported the Spanish crown in its attempt to maintain control of the island. Priests used the confessional to obtain military secrets, which were passed on to the Spanish troops. When Antonio Maceo, the gigantic mulatto who was one of Cuba's greatest generals, was killed, cathedral bells up and down the island were rung in celebration."

Incidents like these created an intense hatred of the church and its clergy and many Spanish priests had to flee the island when independence came. From the beginning Cuba's government has kept the church separate from the State, and a militant secularism has characterized most Cuban administrations.

Coming Of Protestantism.

The second religious influence following independence was of a more positive kind. Protestantism came to the island not by foreigners but by Cubans themselves. It happened in this way. Many Cubans in the 1870-1895 had taken refuge in the U.S. and large colonies of them grew up in Key West and Tampa in Florida and in New York City. In this way they came into contact with Protestantism for the first time, and many were impressed.

José Martí, the most honored of the island's patriots, worked for several years in New York and often attended Protestant services and heard several of the great preachers of the day. His feeling about Protestantism can be judged from his statements that "the portrait of Martin Luther should be hung on the walls of every home as that of one of the greatest liberators of mankind," and "the Protestant Church is the guardian of the seed of liberty in the world today."

Martí never became a church member but many of his fellow exiles were converted to one or other form of Protestantism. Thus the Protestant Church had active and capable native leadership in Cuba from the start. When the American mission boards began to work there after the Spanish-American War they were supporting and responding to a Cuban initiative.

Outstanding of the early Protestants were Enrique B. Someillan, secretary of the Cuban revolutionary party in the U.S. who became one of the island's first Presbyterian ministers, and Tomas Estrada Palma, the first president of the republic.

In the years since, Protestantism has grown amazingly in Cuba. Where only 55 years ago there were a few hundred church members, today there are more than 300,000.

In 1956, Carteles, one of Cuba's popular magazines, cited Roman Catholic Action's estimates of religious affiliation, that 6 per cent of Cuba's population was Protestant (in Matanzas Province, 14 per cent) and that the active Roman Catholic population was less than 8 per cent. Thus 4 out of every 5 Cubans have no real allegiance to any church. The figures speak eloquently. Despite the advance of Protestantism, Cuba remains an urgent mission field.

As Mr. White sums up, . . . "Protestantism, with its evangelical renewal of the individual's life and its ecclesiastical structure of responsible self-government, can fully answer the need of this beautiful but violent land."

— "The Sentinel."

CHURCH UNITY (2)

In the March number we gave the first part of a paper on Church Unity as it is advocated at present. We touched on the ecumenical activities of the World Council of Churches and on the projected Council to be held by the Roman Catholic Church for the purpose of persuading "separated" Churches to join with it under the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. This project is being vigorously pursued, and the necessary organising is in hand.

In the March number we gave excerpts from the papers which indicated some of the opinions of leading religious personalities on this topic of a new "ecumenical" council. The only Irish Church leader we saw quoted was an ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian Church, and we gave the paragraph in which he thought the plan "a very nice idea". Since then we have not seen any mention of the Council coming from a Church of Ireland source, and we restate our belief that Church of Ireland spokesmen refused to give their opinions to the Press. This shows a sensible recognition that a fresh Vatican Council is not really our concern. Rome will never treat with Protestants, whether Anglican, Presbyterian, Lutheran, or other, on the same level as her discussions with the Eastern Churches; for Protestants are heretics who must recant, while Easterns are schismatics only. Eastern Holy Orders and Sacraments are valid, but Protestant clergy-men (no matter what the denomination) are only laymen and their Sacraments (including Holy Baptism) are nullities.

* * *

Further, in the first part we made some observations on the Pastoral Letter of His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Armagh on the subject of Church Unity. The main theme of that and other statements is the unique supremacy of St. Peter, and the infallibility of the Church which holds that he was the first Pope.

* * *

Now we can still stand by the old challenge which demands "how can you demonstrate that Peter's prerogatives were transferred by the Divine Will to the bishops of Rome?" If it were proved that Peter lived and died in the City of Rome, and that his bones are unquestionably beneath St. Peter's, we would accept the facts, but, such facts do not bring us, at one step, to the conclusion that the Bishop of Rome is by God's appointment His Vicar here on earth, and infallible in official statements on faith and morals.

We have seen it put forward as an argument that the Roman Catholic Church is the only Church which claims to be The Church; and the only one which claims to be infallible; and the only one which claims to be a perfect society, etc., and therefore its claims must be true. This does not convince us. If our discussion is on this line, we can look at Eastern Christianity and note that it claims to be the true Church, and that it is older than the Church in Western Europe, and that it has never committed itself to an official system of thought (the scholastic philosophy) or to an official exposition of doctrine (the Scholastic Theology). It can say that it has never added a single dogma to the ancient Creed of undivided Christendom, whereas Rome has added many.

* * *

Next, we may say, as Protestants, that what we note as the distinguishing features of Roman Catholicism are the products of the long credulous centuries known as "the mediaeval period". Of course those many centuries were not stagnant or quite unprogressive. But in many directions religious thought deteriorated (an instance may be given—the theory of Indulgences sank to the level, which tolerated, if not actually encouraging, the practice which Luther rebelled against in the sixteenth century). We have often heard of the famous defence of current dogma in comparison with the teaching of the New Testament—the Doctrine of Development. But what one man may justify as a development another may fairly condemn as a falling away from the sound Rule of Faith which is God's Word written. "Evolution of dogma" is a better phrase than "Development of dogma"; for Evolution need not imply moral and spiritual advance, but simply "change"—not necessarily improvement.

This brings us to the real problem of Church Unity—the sacred principle of Truth. We have the impression that nowadays Truth is not as highly esteemed as formerly. In politics and in the numerous ideologies of the twentieth century, what will answer for the moment is enough for most people. Expediency has supplanted Truth, and if in some problem of practical moment we ask for an explanation, we are apt to be given, not the true answer, but the sort of answer it is hoped we will swallow. In this unprincipled age the paramount claims of Truth are not so much rejected, as thought to be irrelevant. If this is a fair description of the mental environment of our thoughts on life generally, how can we expect the claims of religious Truth to be scrupulously upheld? What a man believes to be the truth he ought to maintain. He, and we, may be honestly in error; but what we hold to be true has sovereign rights over us and we must uphold it, and be loyal to it. It is utterly wrong to let the spirit of expediency and convenience overwhelm the rights of Truth. It is wrong particularly in the case of Churches and clergymen, for these and their Churches are pledged to Truth, and Truth should be their first concern.

What bearing has this on the issue of Church Unity? It ought to be a primary consideration. Unless we agree on the basic truths of the Gospel and agree in a testimony against error we cannot have genuine unity. If the Roman Catholic Church recognised the validity of Anglican Orders (we merely use this as an example), would that mean that Anglicans might safely ignore the full and official Roman Catholic teaching on the Mass, or indeed come to accept it? If Presbyterians were invited to go and co-operate in an ecumenical council under Roman auspices, might they then consider the Roman official doctrine of Purgatory a matter of indifference? Are Lutherans, under similar circumstances to hush-hush any whisper of justification by Faith? In short, are we to abandon quietly the testimony to Truth kept up for four hundred years in reformed Churches, and say that unity covers a multitude of unresolved problems and conflicting dogmas?

Are we contentiously holding out against a movement of the spirit of God if we remind ourselves that external unity is not "the be-all and the end-all" of our Christian existence? Are we merely being awkward and unco-operative if we say that there can be a Unity in error as well as a Unity in truth?

If we are told that "the spiritual needs of humanity demand Unity, and a united Christian front is essential if the world is not to be overwhelmed by Communistic materialism", we may say to those who tell us this—"think again". We may add "what world are you talking about?" The Christian, in fact, need not distress himself too much about this world, for, be it remembered, "Our citizenship is in Heaven" (Phil. 3. 20). He has, of course, social and moral responsibilities, and the duty "to love his neighbour as himself", but he ought not to fall for every shallow shibboleth. The world's needs are not met by slogans, however loudly repeated, but by Christ.

* * *

We don't wish to discourage good will, or to hinder any way of reconciliation. We will never impute to any man an ill motive for holding as truth what we know to be error. We question no man's sincerity or bona fides. What we want to do is to bring Truth out of the background, so that ecumenical men may be reminded of its existence, and may therefore not seek to heal lightly the wounds in the Mystical Body of Christ.

Can we not give more substantial meaning to St. Paul's phrase "the unity of the spirit"? Does it not imply something greater and more effective than the unity of organisation? Is unity of organisation likely to be productive of peace, and spiritual good? When we had outward ostensible unity (in the late middle ages) the fruits were not impressive. Decay rather than growth in Christian graces seemed more typical.

All in all, this is a great and complex question. We do not seek conclusions but only to ventilate the subject and to challenge some positions. It seems to us that the path of co-operation rather than the path of fusion or submission will give the world and the Christian what they need, even if it is not what they want.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"YESTERDAY, TO-DAY, TO-MORROW."

These words in their general sense signify "past", "present", "future": what has been, what is, and what is yet to come. There is a saying in the New Testament which tells us that Our Lord is "the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever,"—this is the profound truth of His unchanging and unchangeable nature, and is one of those numerous instances in the New Testament in which a conspicuous attribute of Jehovah, emphasised in the Old Testament is appropriated to Our Lord. We are not likely to say that in inspiring this the Holy Spirit fell into error—yet, that is what the so-called "Jehovah's Witnesses" (or one splinter group of them) imply when they denounce the Scripture truth that Our Lord is God the Son.

It is not, however, in this sense that we employ the words yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow. We are thinking now of the Ministry of Our Lord, the Ministry of reconciliation and redemption, which is to be considered in the light, first of all, of its historic past (the Incarnation and the Atonement), then in the light of the present concern of the Risen and Ascended Christ (the Continual Intercession and Mediatorship), and thirdly, the future work (the Glorious Appearing, and Eternal Judgment).

Yesterday

"Yesterday", in Our Lord's saving work, reminds us that ours is a historic faith. We believe that the Word of God became flesh and dwelt among us. This was a taking of manhood into God. The Incarnation is utterly different from any theory of the Divine ideas being implanted in one or many human minds. It is faith in a Person, unique and "once for all". There never can be a repetition of what happened in Nazareth and Bethlehem. There was never anything like it, and there never could be. There can be no recurrence of the Act of God which was the sending of His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin.

"He appeared", but not as some sudden display of divinity which might have dazzled the sight and alarmed the consciences of men. He came in humility, and was found in the form of a servant, and even condescended to the death of the Cross. That noble rendering of St. Paul's words which we have in Philippians ch. 2—"He made Himself of no reputation" says precisely what the Incarnation or appearance of Our Lord in His first Advent meant. His experience on earth was of the totality of human life—infancy, childhood, youth, and maturity. He did not, however, experience old age. In this connection we may note the emphasis of the Epistle to the Hebrews on Our Lord's earthly life not passing beyond the point of the highest physical attainment of mankind—the Psalm is quoted (Heb. 1. 10.)—

"Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of Thy hands. They shall perish, but Thou continuest. And they all shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a mantle shall Thou roll them up, as a garment, and they shall be changed: But Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail."

* * *

We must also take account of the Birth being in the historical process—"In the fulness of the time." Gal. 4. 4. Here it is plain that the events of history had a culminating point; a state of readiness had been reached, and a necessity had developed which called for the decisive intervention of God. The fulness of the time indicates that the secular conditions and spiritual requirements of man were appropriate—the unity of government over the vast Mediterranean world; the widespread use of Greek as the popular language; the dispersion of the Jews into all the main cities of the Empire; the spirit of religious enquiry, and willingness to give a hearing to new faiths; the weary soul of man aware of its burdens and in search of deliverance—all this forms part of what we understand by “the fulness of the time”.

* * *

It should be noted also that the place of the work of Christ in redemption was “upon the earth” (Heb. 2. 16): “He taketh hold of the seed of Abraham” to help man’s helplessness. Hence, redemption is not effected by a comet—like blazing of a trail of glory through the heavens, or by some hidden transaction beyond our knowledge, but by a visible self sacrifice under Pontius Pilate, and on a particular spot, Calvary.

More definitely, the mode of the sacrifice of Christ for our salvation was by the death of the Cross. There was significance even in the method and manner of His death—“I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto Me.” (John 12, 32). The Jewish mode of execution by stoning would not answer the symbolic purpose—as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness as a way of deliverance from physical ill, so Our Lord was raised upon the Cross to set His people free from spiritual ill, i.e., sin and its effect.

The power of the Cross is described as “the putting away of sin” (Heb. 9. 26). That suggests the separating of the sinner from sin, and the making of a gulf between them. We don’t come to terms with sin, nor compound for one sin by condemning another (as the author of Hudibras put it); we should seek to widen the gulf Our Lord has made. He got us free from sin and removed us out of its way, and the disciple’s responsibility and interest must be to see that the distance is not lessened.

We need to keep in mind two further facts of Our Lord’s work in the historic past—His sacrifice was final, and its result was complete forgiveness. No act of man can add to, or repeat, the sacrifice of the Cross. What Our Lord offered to the Father on Calvary could be offered by Him alone. We cannot permit ourselves even to think that Calvary may be re-enacted, or that Christ can be offered afresh in bloody or unbloody manner. If what He did on Calvary was effective, then nothing remains to be done but to remember, to receive Him after a heavenly and spiritual manner, to obey, and to rejoice and thank God for His inestimable gift.

If complete forgiveness is assured to us in Christ, and by virtue of His death, then repentance and faith make it ours. For many people, Churches and theologians, this is far too simple, and some would say “far too easy”. But we go on the facts of revelation and not on human imaginations and dubieties. Did not the Apostle at the very dawn of Christianity preach “Repentance towards God, and faith towards Our Lord Jesus Christ?” (Acts 20, 21). Complete forgiveness is not something we can buy, or earn, or deserve or even qualify for. The forgiveness of God is far too valuable to have a price now—it can only be given away free for it was paid for long ago—“Ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, with silver or gold; but with precious blood of Christ.” So says St. Peter. Who in his senses will want to say that he accepts no gifts from God when life itself is a gift of God? Why not then thankfully accept the gift of new life from the same Giver?

* * *

To-day

Let us be brief about this; for the facts are such as to need no elaboration. Our Lord now, as we learn from His Word, is making intercession for His people. Not only is He “able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through Him”, but He is actively doing it. The power of His Precious Blood is to be exhausted until the last of the flock is gathered in.

Intercession is closely connected with that which precedes it, mediatorship. We all know the Word of God which tells us that there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. One mediator, all-sufficient, and gloriously triumphant—the proofs of His success are that He is now at God’s right hand on high. No one else may be there—that place is His, and His alone. His mediatorship is exclusive, utterly exclusive, because He and no one else, endured the death of the Cross for our sakes. He, and He alone, was sent forth to be the propitiation of our sins. He only is “the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.” This truth is God’s truth, and any efforts to encroach upon it from any concern whatever must be repudiated. Once the unchangeable priesthood (Heb. 7, 24) and the exclusive mediatorship (1 Tim. 2, 5) are recognised as decisive and absolutely personal and incommunicable attributes of Our Redeemer we have a clear spiritual understanding of what it means to be “In Christ redeemed, in Christ restored.” Christian faith expresses its deepest needs in comprehensive language—“O Saviour of the world Who by Thy Cross and Passion hast redeemed us; save us and help us, we humbly beseech Thee, O Lord.” He can save and help us because He died for us.

To-morrow

To-morrow may be used to signify the fulfilment of the Divine promises and the day of triumph of the righteous-purposes of God, and of condemnation of all who have refused His rule and despised His love.

Probably no part of Christian truth is as readily rejected by men as that part which concerns "things to come". We make all allowance for the many who have been turned away by the follies and pretensions of self-constituted interpreters of the mind of God. The Christian faith has suffered much in this respect by the conceits of those whom we may call "religious fortune-tellers". We have heard more than once, and deplored, their cocksure expositions. When we recommend a restrained, judicious, and modest approach to prediction we are likely in some places to be thought deficient in faith in God's Word, or wilfully blind. Our readers no doubt have their own experiences of sects and individuals who know everything. But there is a plain assurance given to us that Our Lord will come again. "Christ shall appear a second time to them that wait for Him" (Heb. 9. 28). The New Testament makes no secret of the fact of the Glorious Appearing. Men may differ in some degree in interpretation; But there should be no disagreement on the great Event itself. Our only need is "to be ready"—that is infinitely more to the point than to argue about whether the Church of Christ endures the great tribulation or escapes it.

"Our citizenship is in Heaven, from whence we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3. 20).

"Now are we the children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that if He shall be manifested, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him even as He is" (1 John 3, 2).

* * *

Final progress is for to-morrow. There is a judgment of the nations, and a judgment of the wicked. Justice, an essential attribute of the Godhead, demands that it be so. The secrets of all hearts will be revealed, and then all men will be judged according to their works (Rev. 20, 13). The Lambs' "Book of Life" (however we may understand this metaphor) is the decisive factor. In it must be the names of all who are chosen in Christ—in this see the opening paragraphs of Ephesians ch. 1.

Let us not overlook the great parable of Matthew 25, 31-46. In it Our Lord sets out Christian responsibility—and Christian failure, and we are in one or the other condition—Judgment begins at the House of God—"if the righteous is scarcely saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?" (1 Peter 4, 17).

* * *

These reflections on the mission of the Son of God to men may foster in the reader a closer study of the implications of many familiar statements of God's Word, and may help to keep clearly before us that evangelical truth which is the plain teaching of Holy Scripture.

SOME EVENTS NOTED IN "THE REVIVAL RECORD", 1859, AND ELSEWHERE

"The Revival Record" was an ephemeral sheet of Revival news issued by George Gallie at 99 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. It was sold at a half-penny a copy each week. By the summer of 1859 it was possible to show that Revival work was progressing in various parts of the United Kingdom, and not only in Ulster.

In Ulster it was carefully noted that "the evidences of the change which first heralds its approach become less demonstrative as it spreads and is better understood. Cases of instantaneous conviction, openly exhibited, and under circumstances of thrilling interest, have by no means ceased. The feeling and the utterance of the people, however, are generally calmer."

We have already made the comment that the physical manifestations ought not to be given much significance; and that the quieter sober response to the Revival was far more congruous with the work of the Holy Spirit than the emotional effervescence which was occasionally overvalued. We cannot consider the following example as spiritually significant, however interesting from a psychological standpoint (we quote from the Revival Record)—"The subjects of the affection are under the influence of a periodic somnolency, accompanied by what some might regard as a sort of clairvoyance."

The instances thus described are remarkable enough, but to-day are merely interesting side issues, showing no real light upon the central purpose of the Revival, which was to kindle the life of God in the souls of men.

* * *

Observers reported that the Revival Movement, in Belfast in particular, brought about a real moral reclamation among the most degraded groups of women in the city. The appeal was not only to the respectable poor, but to the disreputable as well, thus showing its inherently Christian character. We emphasise then that all grades of society shared in the spiritual renewal. The unfortunate people we refer to are described as forsaking the haunts of vice and receiving not only the will to reformation, but the practical means of honest employment and seemly homes. Christian people invaded the degraded areas of the city and persuaded those who were "out of the way" to repent.

* * *

In the North-West, the city of Londonderry was deeply affected by the Revival. We read of young men who thought they would find amusement in attending religious meetings, but were brought to a conviction of sin and to heartfelt repentance, and a rational acceptance of the Gospel as the way of peace.

We read of one who was travelling from Strabane to Glasgow, and while waiting for passage in Londonderry went to hear a Mr. Guinness (H. Grattan Guinness?) preaching. He left the meeting and went to a public house. There he left very unhappy, but remained sober. Thinking over all he had heard, he did not go on to Glasgow, but stayed a week in Londonderry attending some other meetings, and still in an uneasy state of mind. At last, in his lodgings, he asked his landlord to pray for him as he was in a despondent mood. The prayer was good, but the man felt no better. He spoke to a Mr. Sewell, a clergyman whose words at last brought light to his mind, and he felt a burden lifted off his soul.

In this instance we see no hasty resolution, no instantaneous conversion, no excitement. Here we see what we might expect of any man—a long enough time of serious reflection and of growing need—then prayer and pardon and peace.

* * *

The information collected from week to week in 1859 shows us the pervasiveness of the movement, for individuals as well as communities. Scottish visitors who were here during the summer brought home with them fresh encouragement to prayer for revival and we find that in the Glasgow district prayer-meetings were the occasions of many conversions. It was possible to gather two thousand or more at religious meetings. The prayer-meetings were regularly listed, and were numerous in the principal Scottish towns. Judging by the places named one may say that (at least in the earlier months) the gatherings were under the auspices of the Scottish dissenting bodies rather than the Church of Scotland.

* * *

"The Revival" was another weekly paper published in London, and, like "The Revival Record" designed to spread the news of the spiritual developments of the day. It is represented now by the weekly "The Christian" which may therefore be regarded as a continuing witness to the great Revival. "The Christian" plainly shows how interest in the reality of spiritual conviction and the power of the Holy Spirit stays with us as the basic element in enduring faith. Its value was recognised from the start, and in one number we read a letter from the Vicar of a parish in Holloway, London, saying that he had bought 150 copies of the first issue for distribution in his parish among those who stayed after Evening Prayer on Sundays to offer "special prayer for the outpouring of the spirit." We may be sure that numerous churches of evangelical principles in these islands reacted in the same way—St. Luke's, West Holloway, could not have been unique.

* * *

One number of "The Revival" quotes from another paper "Things New and Old" a passage from a writer who had lately visited most revival centres in Ulster—"Many have felt disposed to call in question the spirituality of the entire movement because of the attendant circumstances in certain individual cases. This would be a serious mistake. The Almighty Workman may in some cases carry on His new creation so softly, gently, silently, that those who are standing by may be wholly unconscious of the mighty work. The other cases may see fit to conduct the soul through such deep exercises as to evoke the most heart-rending cries and groans. Neither the excitement nor the quietness had aught to do with the conversion of the soul. A person may be led to instant joy and peace in believing, like the Eunuch (Acts viii), or he may remain stunned and prostrate for three days like Saul of Tarsus; the circumstances in no wise affect the genuineness of the conversion." We must to-day recognise, what in 1859 was not always understood, that the peculiarities, mental and psychological, of the individual personality brought about the particular conditions which were linked with the experience of conversion. The writer quoted from "Things New and Old" had an inkling of this, for he went on to write. "There may be many things connected with the work of the Spirit which must be traced to the infirmity of the person who is the subject of that work; but this does not in the least interfere with the fact that God is Working."

* * *

Interest in the different aspects of the Revival was sufficiently widespread to lead to a day-to-day record of outstanding events being kept and published in a paper called "The Banner of Ulster" (a Presbyterian journal) from which items were transferred to "The Revival". We may be justly critical of this policy, because it tended to concentrate attention on many external features—for instance, under the date July 29 the entry is "We have not, to-day, to record any considerable number of cases of public spiritual impression, accompanied with marked symptoms of mental emotion. Such, however, still frequently occur, and under circumstances where few or no extraneous provocations to sudden and intense excitement exist . . ." Is it not probable that when there was a decline in external excitements the conclusion would be drawn that there was a failure of spiritual work? No doubt, that was one of the dangers of Revival. What is nowadays called "Revivalism" is distrusted by many Churches and by multitudes of sincere Christians because they see an operation on the emotions of the most emotional, and are not impressed either by the technique of the revivalist, or by the stability and permanence of the persons affected and the impressions made upon them.

We find a letter from someone in Dublin quoted—it is about a country town in Co. Down—"We are much privileged by constant intelligence of more and more of this blessed visitation from God's spirit . . . In Banbridge the other day fifty were stricken at the first large meeting, and numbers every day since." This letter appears to measure spiritual work by sensational effects. To us the fact of fifty or five-hundred being "stricken" would be no evidence of Pentecostal power, but simply of emotional stress—holiness of life, which cannot be assessed in a moment, is the evidence of Pentecostal power. That there was holiness of life in abundance, as a result of the Revival, is shown by adequate proofs; and there was a sober and consistent Christian way of life faithfully followed by thousands who during the Revival learnt to distinguish real Christianity from nominal.

* * *

A clergyman from Co. Carlow, whom we have quoted earlier in this series of papers, the Revd. James Garrett, Rector of Kellstown, visited Belfast in the early summer of 1859 and attended a dinner-hour meeting of factory-girls. He was invited to address them, and tells us that he used this expression: "I assured all true subjects of conviction, that when the Heavenly Physician commences His work, He will perfect it, and carry on His stricken one to the rest in glory." This, he says, had remarkable effect. He noted the improvement in public life: the closing of licensed houses, the reformation of blasphemous drunkards, and the repentance of other sinners. He marked how many who had been neglecting public worship and Bible reading had become earnest and spiritual. He recorded also that by June, 1859, "severe convulsive affections and extreme bodily weakness are in a degree ceasing; and now by far the larger number visited seem operated upon by the more ordinary motions of God the Holy Spirit, and results are produced which should convince any unprejudiced mind that the Almighty is working with great mercy and power in the midst of us, and to Him be all the praise. All false trusts on human aid, and all false teachers, are rejected. God's Spirit has enlightened the soul. I believe neither men nor devils shall ever regain a final ascendancy over those stricken but now rescued ones, for nothing but Bible truth and Bible teachings will satisfy them. All sectarian and unkind feelings pass away, and their love for Christ and for each other is very great."

This clergyman also described a public meeting he attended in Belfast. Nearly two thousand people were present, and the chairman was the Bishop of Down, the Rt. Revd. Dr. Knox. About a hundred clergymen and Ministers were present—"it was a glorious sight, and one to cheer and gladden every Christian heart."

The Revd. Henry Ward, Rector of a parish in Co. Down described the Revival in his part of Ulster—"The impressions made upon all are uniform, and characteristic of true conviction, if not conversion: sin their only misery, mercy their only plea, Christ their only comfort. The pain and distress felt has indeed been great, but not unreasonably or unscripturally so, and not much more than what our Liturgy supposes may be realised when calling upon us as 'miserable sinners' to acknowledge that the 'remembrance' of our sins 'is grievous unto us, the burden of them is intolerable.' I may add, that the spirits of these newly awakened persons is all gentleness, teachableness, and humility, while the fruits of the spirit—love, joy, peace—rule in their hearts most manifestly."

"The spirit of our meetings is all harmony and love—the Presbyterian not annoying the Episcopalian, and the Episcopalian not vexing the Presbyterian. The labour being divided between the ministers of the two denominations, no distinction is made, and the hearts of all are knit together in one holy bond of Christian fellowship. There is no exaltation of man or means—no novelty, no unnatural excitement, no confusion; all order, solemnity, and devotion.”

So wrote the rector of Killinchy. If in other places a rather different sort of situation existed we believe that the varieties of human temperament were responsible. Mr. Ward was a well-known man, and his influence in Co. Down must have helped to restrain excesses of enthusiasm, and to show that spiritual revival does not necessitate undue excitement. We are glad to record his words because we have read in a recent issue of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church Magazine (April, 1959) an article on the Revival in which it is stated that the Revival fostered religious bigotry. As far as our studies of contemporary descriptions of the Revival have gone our impression is that the reverse is the truth; and that genuine goodwill was fostered.

* * *

We have said already that the Revival was not confined to Ulster. It is on record that “the Kerry Revival”, of about 1860-61, was of similar inspiration, though the remote South-West of Ireland had a very small non-Roman Catholic population. If in the North the “converts” were mainly agricultural and industrial workers (these being of course the largest part of the population), in Kerry a good proportion of landowners experienced the Revival influence.

In Co. Dublin also many of the more affluent sections of the non-Roman Catholic community were awakened to a new sense of their spiritual needs and of the grace to meet them. In 1860 a regular series of special services was being held in various parish churches in the City of Dublin. A start had been made in the parish of St. Thomas, and then it spread to St. Mark's, St. Audeon's, and St. Mary's. It was proposed to hold these week-evening Services throughout the winter in two or three churches in each section of the city. The promoter was the Archdeacon of Kildare, the Ven. John Gregg, afterwards Bishop of Cork. The Services began with a Hymn or Psalm, and the Litany from the Book of Common Prayer. Services of a similar kind have continued in many of the parishes of the Diocese of Dublin, especially during the seasons of Advent and Lent, and we may consider them a witness borne through one hundred years to the fact of the Revival.

* * *

The main purpose of these papers has been to show, from notes made of numerous contemporary writings, the interest of the Church of Ireland in the Revival; the active part taken by many of its clergy; their ready co-operation with others in the work of God; and the consciousness of having shared in all the spiritual blessings then vouchsafed. If Shankill parish, Lurgan, Co. Armagh, added five hundred sittings in an already huge church, and if the Bishop of Down found it necessary to increase greatly the number of Confirmation services he held annually in Belfast and elsewhere on account of the great growth in the numbers coming forward for that solemn observance; and if these are but two references to show the Church of Ireland intimately sharing in the Revival—then it is simply impossible for a sectarian claim to monopolise the Revival to stand scrutiny. Nevertheless the sectarian claim was made, and by no less a person than the Rev. Wm. Gibson, D.D., Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and author of “The Year of Grace” which we have referred to more than once with real appreciation.

Let it be remembered that Dr. Gibson had been present at Revival prayer-meetings presided over by the Bishop of Down, and that he had written to the Bishop for information about the Revival work in Church of Ireland parishes in the North, and had received a most gracious and warm-hearted answer.

Here is a public statement made in the following year by Dr. Gibson—

“The present Revival was a conversion of sinners, and, if they wanted a proof of the truth of the doctrines and policy of the Presbyterian Church they had it in this Revival. Upon whom had God showered down His blessings? Upon the Presbyterian Church. It was her pastures He had watered and made green and flourishing. Some wished to represent that this Revival was breaking down distinctions of Creed inasmuch, they said, as God was pouring out His Spirit on all Churches alike. Such was wholly incorrect. God had blessed the Presbyterian Church, thus giving a proof that in her Jehovah took delight . . . God had given them, and the world, in the Revival, a proof of the truth of Presbyterianism.”

We have deliberately omitted a sentence which we considered unworthy of the author of “The Year of Grace”, as well as untrue. Dr. Gibson's claim that the Revival was specially for Presbyterians may suggest the explanation that they needed it most. We prefer not to say that, but to dismiss this unhappy utterance in the confidence that our enquiries have made it plain that the blessings of 1859, like God's sunshine and rain, came upon all His people in varying degrees. Every Christian in our country may thank God for everything that brings His people closer to Him.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 51.

Canon 229—If the death of the Roman Pontiff should take place during the celebration of the Council, then the Council is automatically suspended until a new Pontiff shall have commanded it to resume and continue.

The bare letter of Rome's Law speaks more eloquently of its harsh absolutism than any comment of ours could. Add to the restrictions of Canon Law the dictum that there is no salvation outside "The Church"—that is the Roman Church, the papal, hierarchical organisation that is found in visible and tangible form at Rome. Heap on top of all that the Dogma of papal infallibility of 1870 which reduces any council to the function of a rubber stamp. Delve into the strange history of the Council of Trent when a handful of Italian bishops negatived and anathematized the Biblical teaching of the Reformers and added a grievous burden to the heavy yoke of medieval accretions.

Lord Acton, the celebrated Roman Catholic historian, remarks in his essay on "The Vatican Council" that not only many of the French bishops but also some non-Romanists held "that the auspicious issue of the Council was an object of vital care to all denominations of Christian men." Lord Acton, like other Roman Catholics of liberal tendencies lived to see the council issue a reactionary decree that set the clock of Roman Catholic medievalism farther back than ever. No doubt there will be incurable optimists of that sort who will persuade themselves against all contrary evidence that this forthcoming council will bring about some happy results.

Wooing The Eastern Church

It seems patent that the projected council is beamed toward the East. The present incumbent of the papal throne has spent part of his diplomatic career among the Orthodox Churches and understands the throes and travail through which they are now passing under the shadow of the hostile Communistic regime, so different from the paternalism of the Czars. It is not to be imagined that the shrewd diplomat who chose the title of John XXIII, the second pope of that name, is so sanguine as to think that the Eastern Church can be charmed by a kind gesture to forget the wounds and rancours engendered by a thousand years of strife.

The pope's latest move will be a reminder to Anglican and American ecumenicalists that he too can play at their game of wooing the Eastern Church. Doctrinally, the pope is no doubt much closer to that body than are the Protestant churches. His long-sighted strategy will put a crimp in the ecumenical crusade of the American-dominated World Council.

—"Protestant Action," Toronto, March, 1959.

THE CHRISTIAN ENQUIRY AGENCY

A Society in which all evangelical Christians should take a vital interest.

Just founded, to proclaim the Gospel of the Grace of God, through the Press.

Scriptural in doctrine and Interdenominational in character.

Seeks your prayerful and financial support. All subscriptions, large or small, acknowledged by the Committee.

Address to: THE SECRETARY, CHRISTIAN ENQUIRY AGENCY,
87 STATION ROAD,
SYDENHAM, BELFAST.

The Committee at present consists of the following:

Mr. Norman Porter, Belfast.

Mr. Herbert Mateer "

Rev. D. L. Evans, Paisley.

Mr. J. Hogan, Dublin.

"WHAT IS THE CHURCH CATHOLIC?"

A course of twelve pocket size booklets presenting the Evangelical and Biblical answer to this important question.

5s. 0d. post free

from

EMMAUS PUBLICATIONS

11 Marlboro' Street - CORK

"PETER AND THE CHURCH"

A correspondence course of twelve simple lessons now available FREE to genuine enquirers, who promise to study it. (Normal price 3s. 0d. post free).

Please tell your friends about it.

Leaflets (with coupon) describing the course are available for distribution.

EMMAUS PUBLICATIONS

11 Marlboro' Street - CORK

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

		s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing
"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegal Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 7—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	73
Characteristics of the Spirit of God	75
Editor's Chair	78
Guidance of Conscience	82

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Bishop Bans "Station" Masses.

The Bishop of Kerry, the Most Rev. Dr. Moynihan, prohibited the celebration of Mass in the "Stations" district of Ballycarthy and Lisardboola, near Tralee. The announcement was read in all churches in the district. His decision followed the boycott of a "Station" Mass celebrated in the home of Mrs. Margaret O'Connor, at Ballycarthy, ten days ago.

"Station" Masses are held once or twice a year in various parts of the country. The Mass is celebrated in a private home—a "Station house"—in areas usually some distance from the local church. The custom dates from penal times.

Dr. Moynihan's announcement said: "Because of the great disrespect shown recently for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, I hereby forbid any priest to celebrate Mass privately or as a "Station" Mass in the area until I give permission."

Mrs. O'Connor, a 70-year-old widow, and her family have been ostracised by their neighbours since the division of the nearby Ballyseedy estate three years ago. Since then attempts have been made to burn and bomb her home; her son, Timothy, has been beaten up and shot at. In an explosion in the district some time ago, he lost one of his eyes.

Ban Explained

The Rt. Rev. Mgr. D. A. Reidy, Dean of Kerry, explained in St. John's Church, Tralee, why the bishop had taken this action. He said that the usual "Station" Mass had been announced for the O'Connor household, which for some years past had been subject to a mean, unjust and un-Christian persecution, which at times had approached closely to murder. On this occasion, notes, written in a woman's handwriting and signed "Captain Boycott", had threatened anyone who would attend that Mass.

Nothing like it had happened since penal days, he said. The authority of the Church to arrange for public worship had been challenged, and to protect the sacredness of the Mass the bishop had banned the celebration of Mass in that district.

The shame of that ban must rest on those who were guilty of the outrage and upon their children and their children's children.

He added that Jesus Christ had reduced Christian law to two commandments: "To love God above all things and to love our neighbours as ourselves." The second of these commandments had been persistently violated for five years. The first had now openly been broken.

The police have taken possession of some of the notes and are making investigations.

—"Irish Times", 20th April, 1959.

[Two years ago we printed information about the boycotting of Protestants in the Irish village of Fethard, Co. Wexford. The trouble arose over a mixed-marriage. We print the extract above to show that the weapon of the boycott is not reserved for use against Protestants, but can be, and is, employed where the issue is agrarian or economic, without any conflict over religion. It is only fair and right to make this plain].

* * *

Disputation on Church Unity.

Church unity, on which Pope John has placed repeated emphasis, was the subject of a medieval disputation organised in honour of St. Thomas Aquinas by the combined Dominican Past Pupils' Unions, in the Gresham Hotel, Dublin.

Rev. P. O'Reilly, O.P., S.T.D., Professor of Dogma, Glenstal Abbey, as Defender, submitting proof of his thesis that the Church was one, said it was intended by Christ that there should be a threefold unity—the unity of Government and the unity of Communion.

The Objector, Rev. A. Flannery, O.P., S.T.D., editor of "Doctrine and Life", said that there was very considerable divergence of opinion tolerated in the Church, theologian differed from theologian.

Father O'Reilly said there were differences relating to theological explanation but no difference concerning matters of Faith defined. All differences were allowed so long as they did not run contrary to truth defined.

Lay Speakers

Replying to points made by lay speakers, Father O'Reilly said that the Catholic Church looked with favour towards the movement of separated Churches for unity, but laid down certain laws which governed the approaches to be made.

The points of similarity must not be overstressed and the separated Churches must not be given the impression that they were bringing anything into the Catholic Church. The whole and entire Catholic doctrine must be explained to them.

The lay speakers included Miss Eleanor Butler, Messrs. P. C. Kilroy, L. O'Broin and D. Kinlen.

Rev. G. Bowe, O.P., S.T.L., M.A., Lecturer in Politics and Economics, U.C.D., acted as Moderator.

Mrs. I. O'Flynn, president of the combined Unions, expressed thanks on their behalf.

[This report ("Irish Press", 23rd March, 1959) should show us that the Roman Catholic Church is firm in its belief that it is the entire Church of Christ. The non-Romans who think they can enter into fruitful discussion with Rome so as to effect a compromise are obviously sadly mistaken].

* * *

Churches' £13m. Refugee Plan—First Part of W.C.C. World Programme

The World Council of Churches proposes to undertake special relief work for refugees in nearly twenty countries on four continents, at a cost of about $3,644,360 (£1,308,700); and this figure is expected to be almost doubled when the second half of the council's proposals for the World Refugee Year—mainly schemes submitted by the national councils of churches in Asia—is announced shortly.

Details of the programme are being sent out from the W.C.C. headquarters in Geneva to the 170-odd member churches in 50 countries, representing about 170 million Christians. The projects submitted by the council's Service to Refugees division include the following allocations:

Austria, $534,600; Belgium, $140,000; France, $418,760; Germany, $316,000; Greece, $810,000; European refugees, in America, $225,000; Near and Middle East, $200,000; Special help for aged and chronic sick refugees, $60,000; Algerian refugees, $200,000; Transport loans, $100,000; The setting up of a new refugee emergency fund, $100,000.

Greece Gets Most

The largest single share of this expenditure goes to Greece, which has about 30,000 refugees. Out of the total allocation of $810,000 about $240,000 will be spent on a farming establishment in Epirus. Other schemes will be housing and health projects and help for workers and traders.

Austria, which has submitted the second largest programme for aid (about $534,600), has a comprehensive programme extending from industrial enterprises to help for drink addicts. The largest single item is a housing project to cost $300,000.

Special help for aged refugees is emphasised in the plan for France ($418,760); a permanent fund is to set up for this purpose. Other work proposed includes a pension plan for refugees, a twenty-bed immigration transit centre, the setting up of an integration service of Serbian and Spanish refugees, and a rural resettlement project.

Projects costing $316,000 are proposed for Western Germany. A recent survey showed that, of the 226,000 homeless foreigners there about 75,000 are of Protestant and Orthodox faith. The biggest item is the proposed establishment of a contributory fund of $250,000 for housing and furnishing to help families not eligible for inter-Government grants.

Life Insurance Project

The programme for Italy (costing about $260,000) includes the enlargement of Waldensian and Methodist homes, and $100,000 to provide life insurance for 50 people—"a happy solution for a large number of old refugees who prefer to live in their present conditions."

In the Near and Middle East the programme includes $100,000 for aid to Assyrian refugees in Lebanon—who have not yet received aid from any quarter. They are described as a "very needy refugee group," for whom the proposed housing project would seem to offer a real solution.

* * *

The Tubercular Displaced Person

The following excerpt is from the "Daily Telegraph" of 3rd June, 1959. When we read it we immediately thought "here is an opportunity for Ireland as well!" In Ireland we have up-to-date T.B. hospitals and experienced physicians, surgeons and nurses. We have been spared the sufferings of many nations in the last twenty years—we should have no difficulty in doing what the "Daily Telegraph" asks the British Government to do—

Open the Door

This "small country," according to Mr. Macmillan, has already absorbed so many refugees that it cannot be expected to absorb many more; "we must therefore make our contribution in other ways." This is what everybody says, and it simply is not good enough.

What is required is not £100,000 from the Government to keep the refugees out, but £100,000 and more, far more, to ship them over here and look after them when they arrive.

Of the refugees still rotting in European camps most are there because one or more members of the family have tuberculosis. No country except Sweden—to her honour—will admit these, and the rest of the family cannot go without them.

Many of these poor people contracted T.B. in the camps; more contract it every day. Doomed parents see their children doomed in turn.

If we were willing to accept tuberculous refugees, this vicious circle could be broken. It is no use accepting—as we do accept—those who are already cured; in the camps few or none can be cured. We must try to cure them here. No-one can say we lack the facilities to do so; T.B. sanatoria are closing for lack of patients.

Mr. Macmillan more often refers to us as a great Power or leader of world opinion than as "a small country." Very well; let us be great, and set an example to the world.

* * *

Church Warning On Mixed Marriages. Direction for Presbyterians

A warning against Presbyterians contracting marriages with Roman Catholics was given at the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Belfast last week.

The Assembly, in private session, adopted a resolution authorising the following statement and directing it to be displayed in a prominent place:—

"That the General Assembly earnestly warns members of our communion against contracting marriages with Roman Catholics under the conditions imposed by modern Roman Canon Law, especially as these conditions involve, among other things, a promise to have their children brought up in a religious system which they cannot themselves accept."

The resolution pointed out that a mixed marriage must take place in the presence of a Roman Catholic priest if it was to be recognised as ecclesiastically valid by that Church.

This was normally permitted only after consent had been given in writing by both parties to certain conditions.

These conditions were that both signed a document in which they "solemnly promise and engage that all the children of both sexes, who may be born of the marriage, shall be baptised in the (Roman) Catholic Church, and shall be carefully brought up in the knowledge and practice of the (Roman) Catholic religion."

Consent to these conditions meant that Presbyterians married to Roman Catholics were deprived of any right to influence the spiritual any religious upbringing of their children.

Disloyalty

It meant disloyalty to the Church of their baptism and of their fathers, was contrary to the teachings of Holy Scripture and brought discredit on the name of Jesus Christ.

—(Continued on p. 84.)

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SPIRIT OF GOD

It is always important to seek clear and true views of the Holy Spirit, for the failures of many professed Christians are due to neglect of the provision God has made for their support. The religious life is not asserted and maintained by a voluntary confession "I believe in God": we need far more than this to support a Christian witness and to cultivate a Christian personality. Belief must not be the mere intellectual declaration that there is a God: it must be the expression of the whole being and the summing up of the entire motivation of life. If Christianity were only a mental exercise it would mean little more than being a Hegelian or a Kantian. A man who professes to be a disciple of the philosopher Hegel has casually chosen to call himself that. He may be a Hegelian just for argument's sake because his associate or friend or fellow-student has chosen to call himself a Kantian. If he surrenders his Hegelianism and is converted to Kantianism the outside world will scarcely discern the difference. He will sleep just as soundly and his way of life will be what it was. But if Christianity is what its Founder taught; if it is what God's Word says it is, then to profess it sincerely makes all the difference. The world-view is radically changed, and the motives of conduct are reconstructed—"all things are become new". Our Lord (and one of His Apostles as well) used a significant and impressive phrase which describes the new situation—"He has passed from death into life." In that sense he is "a new creation". We can find no better way to express what the New Testament as a whole teaches about the meaning of Christianity—redeemed, restored, cleansed, renewed, transformed—all these descriptive words speak to us of the fundamental purpose of the Gospel. So understood, Christianity is not an intellectual culture, or a social order, or a spiritual empire. However venerable as an institution, and however deeply interwoven into the fabric of Western civilisation, and however rich in its power to inspire great art, Christianity is completely misunderstood and indeed abused, when these aspects are thought to mark its real value. They are merely incidental. There was a time when Christianity was not venerable, but newborn; there was a time when it was an obscure Eastern sect "everywhere spoken against"; and there was a time when it inspired no art—and that was the time of its supreme effectiveness; the dawn of a fresh cleansing uplifting power amidst the shadows and sins of an old and morally decaying empire.

* * *

Before the world learnt the advisability of adapting and manipulating Christianity to its own ends the Gospel was a challenge and a reproach to men's self-satisfaction, cynicism, and savagery. When the world could not overthrow it, the world compromised with it. Let it be stated plainly that every time there is a serious and sincere demand for the real thing, a hunger for God and His forgiveness, the soul goes back, beyond the structure of eighteen hundred years, to the original—to the Cross, the empty Tomb, and Pentecost.

Why not be content with contemporary ways of handling Christianity? Why not be nourished by the modern sophisticated sermon with its tags of psycho-analysis from Freud or Jung, or its A-bomb awareness, or its decorative border of twentieth century verse quotation? Why not seek the Gospel in the Gothic arch, or maybe, in the popular setting of the revivalistic platform with its tom-tom music, its saxaphones and performers? The answer is that these are unlikely channels of the spirit of God. Those who are called by God to salvation in His Son are quickened by His Spirit. The Holy Spirit will not embalm the Gospel as Nicodemus and Joseph and others sought to embalm the Body of Christ; but neither will He debase the Gospel by making it an occasion for religious entertainment.

The reality of the Gospel (it is God's final word to mankind), its cost to the Father (the life of His Son), the sacredness of the power which gives it effect (the Spirit of God), all combine to rule out mere trivial approaches and skilled techniques. The emotions evoked by "the dim religious light", may be acutely realised, but they are not necessarily Christian. Christian conviction is a moral and spiritual decision. It is concerned with the soul and God—two beings, the Creator and His creature, and that creature renewed in His image through the eternal Son who is "the effulgence of His glory".

* * *

How does it come about that there are transient and superficial Christian impressions, and others that are permanent? We may rightly answer that the mysterious providence acting through discriminating grace will account for the difference. But we must still be mindful that man is not an automaton. We have wills of our own, talents and faculties to exercise, and therefore grace is not bestowed on persons who are simply galvanised into following a pre-ordained course. It is bestowed on persons capable of, and eager for, co-operation, (we are here thinking of the adult believer). It claims a conscious response, a recognition of Christian duty, and a heartfelt appreciation of the benefits God has freely bestowed upon us.

Our Lord told us that "many are called but few are chosen", and St. Paul told us that "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God." (Rom. 8. 14).

* * *

These words of St. Paul point to the effective cause of genuine spiritual life—the Spirit of God has been sent by the Father for the express purpose of sustaining in us a truly Christian life. Gospel faith is not to be on the periphery of our life, but at its centre.

Can we explain the Spirit of God as an influence, or, the influence, of God acting upon us either continually, or intermittently? Can we take an impersonal view, and say that the Hebrew word sometimes translated "spirit" should always be translated "breath" or "wind"? Is the New Testament "pneuma" no more than this? If the Spirit of God is deprived of personality and made to be an influence only, we have done away with the Christian doctrine of God, i.e. the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. Is there an honest answer, or is it a matter of typography—printing Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost in the capital letters when ordinary letters would be correct?

We draw attention to this sentence in the first epistle of St. John—"If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." These are familiar words, and no one is going to say that the title of Our Lord "Our Advocate" is an impersonal and abstract one. "Our Advocate" must be the title of a Divine Person. In the Gospel of St. John the Greek word which means "advocate" is translated "comforter" and is of course Our Lord's own word for the Holy Spirit. In its very nature the Greek word must signify personality. It seems impossible that it could be used of an influence.

* * *

In Hebrews ch. 10 we read of "the Spirit of Grace"—suppose you read instead "the influence of Grace": the sense of the passage is destroyed by removing the personality of the Spirit. It does not seem possible to say that you "have done despite" to the influence of grace.

In John ch. 14 Our Lord spoke of "the Spirit of truth"—even in the "Jehovah's Witnesses'" attempted translation of the New Testament (which they don't venture to call "the New Testament") the reading is "I will request the Father and He will give you another helper to be with you for ever, the spirit of the truth." The natural force of these words of Jesus is not abated by the Witnesses' use of the pronouns "which" and "it"; a use intended to deny personality to the Holy Ghost. Our Lord's promise, were it one of a mere influence, would be delusive and deceptive, for what He undertook to pray for and obtain was "another helper" (or comforter), i.e. a replacement of His own living presence among His people, by one who is substituted as an equal; and no influence can be that.

In Romans ch. 8 St. Paul refers to "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus". This "law" is contrasted with the law of sin and death. This chapter goes on to unfold more and more truth about the Holy Ghost. Take, e.g. verse 16: "The Spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God"—is it conceivable (in the general light of Bible teaching) that St. Paul is associating in united witness and by a common term two quite different things, belonging to different categories? Can we read it thus—"The influence beareth witness with our spirit"? Why not read "the influence beareth witness with our influence"? Put that way it makes no sense, and put any other way than it is in the English Bible it loses its whole point.

This is borne out by other parts of the same chapter. How could we imagine that "an influence" "maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered"? (Verse 26). The spirit of life must be personal, partaking of the eternal substance and Godhead. We see this, too, in 2 Cor. 3, 18 R.V.—"We . . . are transformed. . . even as from the Lord the Spirit." The R.V. margin provides an alternative translation—"even as from the Spirit which is the Lord".

Now here we might well read "the Spirit which is Jehovah". Note that the text does not warrant the translation "as from the Spirit of the Lord". It is unavoidably "the Lord the Spirit", and so the Witnesses' translation has to be ". . . by Jehovah the Spirit."

* * *

As we all know, in many places in the New Testament there is joint reference to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. We believe of course in the person of the Father, and in the person of the Son: is it not the natural and indeed inevitable step to believe, in these references, in the person of the Holy Spirit? If the Holy Spirit is no more than an influence emanating from the Father or Son it must be unnecessary and inappropriate to refer to it as if it were a person. But distinct reference is made to the attribute of the Spirit when attributes of Father and of Son are spoken of—e.g. "the grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with you" (2 Cor. 13, 14). We simply cannot make sense of the claim that the Holy Spirit is only an impersonal influence if we accept this sentence we quote.

Similarly, in the Baptismal formula of Matthew 28, we have the same problem—if the Holy Spirit is not the Third Person of the Godhead the command of Jesus becomes inexplicable. If we accept the true doctrine of the Godhead, the Christian doctrine of God, the difficulties we indicate cease to be.

* * *

In the light of this truth we can see the power which enables us to believe, and live according to, the genuine standard of authentic Christianity. In yielding to and being led by the Spirit we are one with God and His appointed purpose for us—repentance, faith, obedience, and eternal life. Christianity is the inner life concerned with the things that are unseen and eternal. When that life is ours it will inspire us to bring all things into subjection to God. The Gospel of Redemption is the key to the social Gospel and the reconstruction of mankind.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

This may strike the reader as an unusual subject for our paper. Our general rule is to keep to religious matters, and to emphasise the scriptural and apostolic credentials of evangelical and Protestant faith. From this we rarely depart, but it is to be remembered that in Ireland everything can be given a religious character, and all sorts of human activity can be taken out of the public hand by labelling them issues of faith or morals. So described, they are under ecclesiastical jurisdiction and the layman submits and is silent.

In no sphere of activity is this clearer than in education. It is right at this point to say that non-Roman Catholic religious leaders have held very strong views on the duty of Church control of education, especially primary education. All the primary schools of Ireland, which were the outcome of a great movement at the beginning of the last century, were for combined religious and secular instruction, and were directed by different agencies mainly under religious impulse. This is true of the Kildare Place Schools, the A.P.C.K. Schools, the London Hibernian Society Schools, the Christian Brothers' Schools, etc. When in the 1830s the Government created this system of National Schools, and ceased to make grants to the Kildare Place Schools, there seemed to be a tendency to reduce the amount of religious instruction and Bible reading. This led to great outcry on the part of the Church of Ireland bishops and clergy, and they launched a counter-scheme, "the Church Education Society", which for thirty years or so was highly successful and at one period nearly destroyed the National system. The Government plan was modified in certain directions and became frankly denominational. Thus throughout Ireland (till 1922) every public primary school was managed in the interests of a Church. The manager was the Parish priest, or the rector, or the Presbyterian or Methodist Minister, according to the relationship of the school. While after 1922 the arrangements in the six Ulster counties which form the political entity of Northern Ireland have followed a somewhat different course of development, the arrangements in the twenty-six counties of the Republic of Ireland (Éire) continue as they have stood during the past hundred years. The Church Education Society's protest ceased to be needed as Church control was recognised and fostered, and religious instruction made integral to the system. To-day the Church Education Society still survives and with very small resources tries to help the few little Protestant schools which are not state-aided, and tries also, by grants for transport, to enable isolated Protestant children to attend Protestant schools.

* * *

From this it is plain that the only education which is compulsory (i.e. primary) is carried on in denominational schools controlled by the Churches. We find it satisfactory in many respects, for it recognises the spiritual interests of the young, and enables them to be taught their faith as an integral part of daily instruction. But it has the inevitable defect of separating the children and making a lifelong division among them. All Churches feel deeply that their children should be taught in a spiritually congenial atmosphere, and if a Roman Catholic boy or girl is in a Protestant school, or a Protestant boy or girl is in a Roman Catholic school in the country the feeling of being "odd man out" is not a comfortable one.

There was an experiment in the last century which provided excellent schools in certain places—a series of schools was created directly under the Commissioners of National Education here, and with no clerical management. Clergymen of all creeds were at liberty to attend at stated hours to teach their own children, while the teachers taught all who attended the secular subjects. As the appointment and control of the teachers was not in the hands of clerical managers, and religious instruction was not obligatory, the schools were in great disfavour especially among the Roman Catholic leaders. As far as we know they have almost entirely ceased though it may be said that some of their good features are perpetuated in many schools in Northern Ireland.

* * *

Secondary education in Ireland (in the older sense of the word, i.e. Grammar Schools teaching boys and girls up to the age of eighteen, with curricula and examinations under the Commissioners of Intermediate Education) naturally attracted far fewer pupils than primary. Not merely poverty, but the nature of juvenile employment in trades, business, and industry, made secondary education requisite only for the small numbers preparing for professions, Government services, teaching, etc.

Here again, the tendency was to carry on secondary schools under religious auspices. The Roman Catholic teaching orders and sisterhoods have monopolised Roman Catholic secondary education so that there are very few Roman Catholic schools of this sort in lay hands. In Éire most Protestant secondary schools are managed by boards of a denominational character. In Northern Ireland this grade of education seems to be more immediately dependent on Government departments and statutory bodies.

* * *

It can be seen then that at these levels Irish education has taken great care not to be described as "Godless". What about University or Professional education?

The story of University education in this country is essentially a nineteenth century one. It is true that Trinity College, Dublin, Dublin University, dates from 1592. It was founded as a Protestant college, and was closely associated with the then established Church of Ireland. Indeed, it was described, early in the seventeenth century as "a poor college of divines", so that its primary purpose was to educate men for ordination in the Church of Ireland. But it also taught general arts, i.e. classics and mathematics and philosophy, and soon taught law and medicine.

Till near the end of the eighteenth century the college was apparently exclusively Protestant; but the laws operating to restrain

Roman Catholics in Ireland were then relaxed and Roman Catholic students became a respectable element in the college—one distinguished graduate of that day, became Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel. But, as long as the Church of Ireland was the established Church of this land there were certain positions in the college which involved an acknowledgment of that Church, i.e. foundation scholarships and fellowships. These hindrances were abolished in 1870 when the Church of Ireland ceased to be established. Long before, however, the college, regretting its inability to elect Roman Catholic students to foundation scholarships (under the Charter), awarded them special scholarships, called "non-foundation scholarships". In this way in the nineteenth century a very fair and liberal policy was carried on. We were therefore not a little surprised to read a survey of Irish University history, given by the Most Revd. M. Browne, D.D., Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway ("Irish Times", 29th May, 1959) when addressing a school prize-giving in Galway. Dr. Browne said that the history of Irish University education was much neglected and ignored, which is quite true indeed. But when he spoke of Trinity College he said—

"Even when the English Government removed the Penal Laws in 1782, Trinity College still maintained them for 90 more years. It was only in 1873 that the restrictions against Catholic students were removed."

Plainly, the impression is that the college preserved till 1873 the obstacles to Roman Catholic higher education which had obtained prior to 1782—that for ninety years the college held out against Roman Catholic students. We believe that Bishop Browne is labouring under an error here, in confusing the restrictions on fellowships (two or three a year on the result of a ferocious competitive examination) with the freedom to enter, study, and graduate which had been available throughout the century. For instance, Sir Michael O'Loghlen, a native of Co. Clare, and the first Roman Catholic to become a Judge in the Irish Courts (1836), had graduated at Trinity College in 1809. Stephen Woulfe, also a Roman Catholic from Co. Clare, and Chief Baron of the Exchequer in 1838, graduated from Trinity College in 1812. David Pigot, a Corkman, and Chief Baron in 1846 graduated at Trinity College in 1819. We cite these three instances of Roman Catholic graduates of the college before 1820 who rose to the chief positions in the law courts in disproof of the view that restrictions against Roman Catholic students lasted till 1873. It may be assumed that there were Roman Catholic graduates of the same college following other professions in the early decades of the last century.

* * *

It must be remembered that in the first half of the nineteenth century the number of professions (and of professional men) was very small. Medicine, surgery, engineering, and the law did not require attendance at a university. Indeed engineering and architecture must have depended exclusively on apprenticeships (as did medicine and surgery till fairly recently). Law, as far as solicitors practise it, still requires apprenticeship, not graduation, and the admission to the Bar depends on qualifying at the Inn of Court, not on the university course. For medicine and surgery Dublin had the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons and the Apothecaries' Hall. It is plain that great numbers of Protestants entered the professions without having studied at Trinity College, so that the situation was in fact less one of hardship than one of grievance. Even the grievance cannot have gone very deep. A real grievance among professional men was, we acknowledge, the inability of experienced and worthy Roman Catholic barristers to be called within the Bar "to take silk" as counsel, before 1829.

* * *

In the account of Irish University education, in the "Irish Times" report, we do not see any reference by the Most Revd. Dr. Browne to the Queen's Colleges and Queen's University in Ireland. These colleges, Cork, Belfast, Galway, together formed the Queen's University in Ireland, and were chartered over a hundred years ago (about 1845-49). They were wide open to all creeds or none. Religious tests were not to be employed. Instead of being welcomed as a step to begin with, and one suited to the education available at the time, these colleges were condemned as Godless, and Roman Catholics were directed to avoid them. Only the one in Belfast (now the Queen's University of Belfast) made much progress because it was in the centre of a large Protestant population. But the fact that as late as fifty years ago Belfast had only a few hundreds of students: well under a thousand, shows that the real demand for university education in Ireland was small. When the Roman Catholic bishops condemned the Queen's Colleges, and soon after inaugurated the Catholic University (a nobly conceived plan), it was a failure for many reasons, but not least because it did not secure many students. People say sometimes that its great handicap was the want of a Crown Charter to confer degrees. But we suppose it could have had a Papal Charter for the purpose, following upon ancient well-recognised precedents, and the Roman Catholic world would have acknowledged it.

* * *

If Trinity College to-day is unsuited to Roman Catholics (and their bishops declare it a grave sin to go there), must it not have been worse a century ago when in the exclusive control of Church of Ireland clergymen (all the fellows but two had to be in Holy Orders)? Ought we to complain of college rules to exclude Roman Catholics if it is wrong for Roman Catholics to attend there?

* * *

Dr. Browne went on to say—

"When a proposal was made for a separate college for Catholics within the framework of an enlarged and reformed Dublin University, Trinity opposed it with all its might and sent representations to English and Scottish Universities to conduct a vigorous 'hands off Trinity' campaign."

We don't dispute this, but we think that Dr. Browne might have mentioned that the college, while opposing the plan he outlines, had an alternative plan which, as far as we recall its details, was generous, and included the erection of a Roman Catholic chapel for students within the precincts. If it was a fault then that the college emphasised its Protestant character, it appears to be a fault to-day that instead of emphasising its Protestant character, it is supposed to emphasise its liberal character. Roman Catholic Ireland tends nowadays to condemn Trinity College not as "a home of liberalism", but as "a home of false liberalism".

* * *

Dr. Browne then contrasted the other great Irish University, the National, with Trinity College—

"Nowadays, however, many people—even Catholics and even some in high places who should know better—put the National University on the same level as Trinity; and even consider that it is entitled to the same treatment as Trinity. That is not true. There are very important essential differences between the two. Firstly, the National University has no private endowment; Trinity has an annual revenue of £70,000. Secondly, the National makes Irish a compulsory subject for matriculation, Trinity does not. The National has large faculties of Celtic studies. Trinity has one professor."

"Thirdly, the National is undenominational and is debarred from having a religious chapel in its grounds, or from using its public funds to teach religion; Trinity has a Protestant chapel, and uses its funds to educate all the Church of Ireland clergymen."

We comment—the annual income from endowments of Trinity College is obviously totally inadequate for its needs. No university or college to-day can maintain itself on endowment—a few years ago the Clerical College of Maynooth had to appeal to the public for substantial support, and the appeal had, we understand, a gratifying success. Trinity College receives a modest Government grant in aid. The colleges of the National University are dependent on Government grants, but this does not put them in any inferior position, financial or otherwise, in comparison with Trinity. The situation of universities in all parts of these islands is the same—they and their students are necessarily subsidised, and private resources are utterly insufficient in the light of present-day costs and needs.

We have no observations to make upon Dr. Browne's second point save to say this; that "one professor" does not represent the entire personnel of Trinity involved in teaching Irish. There are fellows and lecturers discharging the duties of teaching Irish and allied studies. The title "professor" is not important.

On the third point—the existence in Trinity College of a Protestant (Church of Ireland) chapel and a Divinity School. We are not aware that since 1922 the heads of the three Colleges of the National University ever asked for a change in the University Charter to enable it to grant degrees in Theology, to erect and maintain students' chapels, and to teach divinity. If such a proposition were put forward we cannot imagine Dáil Éireann rejecting it. It is surely unnecessary to regard a University Charter of fifty years ago, granted by the British Government, as unalterable by an Irish Government no matter how strongly desired. In Dublin the University College of the National has close by it the "University Church" founded by John Henry Newman. It is a unique building, and though a public Church, must attract many students. In Cork there is, we believe, a chapel similarly situated. In non-residential colleges chapels are, in any case, less useful, and only a fraction of the four thousand Dublin students could find room in a college chapel.

A faculty of divinity is not necessary in the National University of Ireland since for all practical purposes we must consider that the college at Maynooth supplies its place. Maynooth is a recognised college of the National University, and educates its students for degrees of the university in arts and science. Degrees in ecclesiastical subjects, theology, canon law, philosophy, are conferred under the charter which constitutes Maynooth a pontifical university.

If it is complained that some part of the endowment of Trinity College is spent on the Divinity School, it should be said that money was given to the college long ago for that very object. It would be a breach of good faith to do otherwise than maintain a school of theology. We may assume that no public grants are used for that object. It may also be noted that Maynooth College was founded in 1795 by a Protestant Government, and that from that year till 1870 a large amount of public money was given to the clerical college. In 1870 the annual grants were commuted for a substantial capital sum, but the government in 1870 did not take that sum from the Treasury, but from the Church of Ireland, for by disestablishing that Church the Government secured its property and used it to endow Maynooth College, to commute for a lump sum the Regium Donum paid to Presbyterian ministers, and to finance intermediate education. Other objects were financed as well. From this it can be seen that the existence of a divinity school in Trinity College is no injury to anyone, and ought not to be considered as ground for objecting to students going there. We have, in fact, never heard of a Roman Catholic student becoming a Protestant while attending the college; and we have no reason to suppose that the "liberalism", which is deplored by many, has made sceptics or agnostics.

* * *

Looking back on the history of Ireland in the last hundred years we are inclined to the view that the governments of the mid-nineteenth century made a great mistake in not chartering and endowing the Catholic University of Cardinal Cullen and J. H. Newman. This may seem to be a strange statement for us to make, but 1. Cardinal Cullen was strongly conservative and anti-revolutionary; and 2. Dr. J. H. Newman wished to make the university acceptable to Roman Catholics from England and Scotland and elsewhere, as well as serving the interests of higher education in Ireland. Such a university could have had a stabilising effect on young Irishmen and could have created a bond of goodwill between the two countries. Had such a step been taken instead of the hopeless persistence in trying to establish a strictly secular non-sectarian higher education, the more recent history of our country might have been happier and different.

Opinion is bound to be speculative, and in the last century concessions to Ireland, were made very reluctantly, and fear of the Vatican was in many minds. Looking back is always a temptation we know, but our history is not cheerful and retrospect goes hand in hand with regret. Nevertheless, the genuine aspects of the higher education of the nineteenth century ought not to be overlooked. We may all share the Bishop of Galway's regret that there is "one branch of Irish history much neglected and ignored—the history of Irish university education." We hope we have dispelled some misunderstandings and indicated facts often ignored.

GUIDANCE OF CONSCIENCE.

An address by
Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D., broadcast over 2CH, Sydney.

One of the commonest arguments urged against the validity of the Protestant position is that it leaves the members of the different Protestant Churches without any clear guidance in matters of conscience. Our Roman Catholic friends continually tell us, "We have an authoratative statement from a priest which justifies our actions or condemns them, as the case may be, and therefore we are in the position of being able to say, 'I am not doing what the Church teaches, but I am fulfilling the law of God; you on the contrary, as a Protestant, are bound solely by your own particular inclination and judgment,' and that explains the great difference in conduct between Protestants."

Are Protestants at a Disadvantage?

Now, if that were true, it would be a very serious argument, and we would have to face it. But we retort, and I think with justice, that while we are far from stating that Protestants are perfect, and indeed we deplore very greatly the serious lapses among members of various Protestant denominations, nevertheless when the matter is considered on a broad basis, we discover that Protestant countries and Protestant people exhibit at least as high a standard of morality as their Roman Catholic friends. We are making no accusations in this matter, we are simply trying to answer an objection.

If the guidance that is given to Roman Catholics were of such a convincing character that they all immediately responded, except perhaps the apostates and renegades, then there would be a standard of morality in Roman Catholic countries that would contrast very strikingly with the standards observed in Protestant lands. But we say unhesitatingly that is not the case. In both countries there are serious lapses from the mind and will of God which we all deplore, but there is not the outstanding difference in conduct that the argument which we have outlined would suggest. On the contrary, we dare to say that in Roman Catholic countries there is frequently manifested a disregard for certain spiritual realities to a greater extent than is manifested in their Protestant neighbours.

That, of course, is a matter of dispute, and it would take a long time to develop it, but we content ourselves, in order to meet this particular situation, by stating that the manifest differences which ought to arise if people on the one hand were almost divinely guided, and on the other hand were left to their own devices, does not manifest itself in the world at large. It was a Protestant country for example, that first set the standard of abolishing slavery. It was a Protestant country that first introduced the idea of a fair return for labour, and we might instance many other cases, as for example, the care of the sick and the poor, though, of course, we have to acknowledge that in that particular valuable work has been done, and is being done, by various organisations of the Roman Catholic Church. But that, after all, it might be said, is merely a negative argument. It is the familiar tu quoque, and people say this is not the thing in which we should indulge, therefore, I propose to indicate to you that there has been in the Roman Catholic Church very serious divisions of opinion concerning moral conduct, not merely among those who are members of the communion—a thing we might naturally expect—but among those who professed to be leaders and guides:

R.C. Leaders Differ

Some of my readers might have heard of the interesting correspondence between Canon Meyrick, a very distinguished Anglican clergyman, and Cardinal Manning, after he had defected to the Roman Catholic Church. Canon Meyrick drew attention to the fact that some of the teaching of Liguori was of a very doubtful moral character, and there resulted an interesting correspondence which has been published. Indeed, the controversy arrested so much attention that Cardinal Newman was compelled to intervene on his own behalf and declare very definitely that he did not support some of the moral positions laid down by St. Alphonsus da Liguori. He begged the Saint's pardon for differing from him, but we have never been told whether he got it or not. But here is a concrete instance that people should take in hand and consider carefully.

Here is a Cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church setting himself in direct opposition, on a moral question, to one who was canonised and made a doctor, and who, we are told, is therefore authoritative in all his teaching, and that the Church had found no occasion for censure in anything that he said. If that be the case, and the correspondence to which I have referred undoubtedly proves that it is the case, then we are relieved of the necessity of stating that there is a uniform standard in the Roman Catholic Church and a variety of opinion in the Protestant Church. We are compelled to say, on the contrary, that both Churches exhibit serious difference of judgment on very vital and important moral matters.

Teaching for the Young

But the matter can be brought a bit nearer home, and presented in a more popular manner. In Ireland for many years, books circulated which were entitled "Books for Children and Young Persons." I have in hand Book 14, which is entitled "What Every Christian Must Know and Do", a new edition revised, by the Rev. J. Furniss, of the Society of Redemptorists. It will be borne in mind that the Redemptorists are a body of people who are specially selected for the duty of holding missions, and having conferences with those who are distressed in conscience, and, therefore, one might naturally expect, that a book that was widely issued for young children with the authority of one who was a Redemptorist Father would express the general sentiments of the Roman Catholic Church on great moral questions.

Now when we examine this book we find certain startling things in their relation to moral conduct, things which give a shock to Protestants, and, as a matter of fact, also gave a shock to many earnest Roman Catholics, so that ultimately these particular pamphlets were withdrawn. I remember some years ago a friend of mine entered a Roman Catholic bookshop in Dublin and asked for Father Furniss' book. The gentleman who was behind the counter produced the book, but added: "You know, a lot of things in these books are at least a little doubtful." That is the situation which has to be faced.

It may be asked, however, what it is that made earnest Roman Catholics question the wisdom of placing these books in the hands of children. I venture to present to you one or two statements in "What Every Christian Must Know and Do." The writer draws a distinction between mortal and venial sins. This is what he says: "Mortal sin—if you commit a mortal sin make an act of contrition directly and go to confession as soon as you can. Venial sin—live in the firm purpose of never committing a venial sin. If you fall into venial sin, even many times, do not be vexed at yourself or discouraged, but always strike your breast or at least be sorry for a moment, and resolve not to commit it again." That is a very easy way of satisfying your conscience in a matter of venial sin. You strike your breast, you are sorry for a few moments, and you resolve not to commit it again, and then the whole business of repentance is apparently completed.

But when we turn to page 26 of this particular manual, we get rather a shock. The sin of stealing is mentioned and we are told it is a sin to steal, except in some cases of most grievous distress: for example, if a person was dying of hunger and he took only what was necessary to save him. Then the writer goes on: "It is a venial sin to steal a little. It is a mortal sin to steal much—for example, to steal from a workman a day's wages, or to steal less from a poorer man, or more from a richer man, or from parents. If you steal from a rich person you commit a sin, because it is always a sin to steal. But if you steal the same from a poor man, you commit a greater sin, because the poor man suffers more from the loss.

If you steal often a little it is a sin each time, and when the little sums come to make altogether a large sum, then it becomes a mortal sin." So that if I steal a little, so long as I do not continue to steal a little, according to the judgment of this writer, I simply strike my breast and feel sorry for a moment, and that's all that I have to do. Again, if I want to steal from anybody I have to make careful inquiries into his financial position. If I am satisfied that he is a very rich man, then it is a venial sin to take a little from him. These judgments are injurious, and it is no wonder that earnest Roman Catholics felt that this book should be withdrawn. "It is also a mortal sin," the writer goes on, "to steal a little, if at the same time you have the will and intention to steal much if you could." What casuistry! And I want to direct your attention to the fact that this is a book for children—to be put into the hands of impressionable youngsters, whose moral judgment, we may assume, was not at the time fully developed.

Can we, in view of this particular illustration, and in view of the correspondence between Canon Meyrick and Cardinal Manning, to which I have referred, really assert that the guidance of conscience, which is supplied to us in the Roman Catholic Church, is so far satisfactory that Protestants are at a loss without it? You can form your own judgment. It is needless to say my judgment has been formed already.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 75.

Presbyterians, the resolution said, should refuse to accept these unjust conditions and should do their utmost to dissuade other members of their Church from doing so.

Neither Presbyterian nor Roman Catholic should be intimidated by any warnings or threats that a mixed marriage in a Presbyterian Church would be invalid; it would not indeed be recognised by the Roman Catholic Church, but it would be a marriage in the sight of God and in accordance with the law in Great Britain, Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland.

—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph",
12th June, 1959.

[We are glad to see this forthright warning of the danger and unsuitability of mixed marriages coming from the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. The Church of Ireland has frequently given the same warning, and the conditions of such marriages under the "Ne Temere" Decree are not consistent with the self-respect and spiritual integrity a Churchman or a Presbyterian ought to have].

* * *

The Worker-Priest

A year or two ago we related from different sources a good deal of information about the "worker-priest" movement in France. This movement meant that a number of Roman Catholic priests were working whole-time at trades and in industry and trying to recatholicise the lapsed workers. The cutting below gives the latest news—

Worker-Priest Issue Discussed at Vatican

Pope John had a lengthy talk with Maurice Cardinal Feltin of Paris at the Vatican yesterday amid reports of a fresh approach to the controversial "worker-priest" issue.

Cardinal Feltin, in a magazine interview immediately after Pope John's election last October, indicated that he wanted to raise again the question of the French worker-priest movement, banned by the late Pope Pius XII in 1954.

The Cardinal arrived in Rome two days ago for his audience with the Pope. Vatican officials did not disclose the subject of the talk.

But Vatican sources said Cardinal Feltin carried a 30-page report by 14 French bishops, suggesting some changes in the worker-priest movement that could make it acceptable to the Vatican.

Pope John himself, who served in post-war years as Nuncio to France, was reported to be keenly interested in the problem.

The movement of the French priests, who donned overalls and went to work full-time in factories, in an effort to bring back workers to the faith, caused one of the most bitter post-war controversies in the Catholic Church.

There were charges that some of the priests, sharing the workers' life, had been "converted" to Marxism instead of converting their colleagues.

Pope Pius XII in effect banned the worker-priest movement in 1954 by allowing priests to work in factories only part-time. Supporters of the movement complained that this deprived it of all effectiveness.

Alfredo Cardinal Ottaviani, Pro-Secretary of the Holy Office, was reported to be among those who advised Pope Pius to ban the worker-priest movement.

One of the main objections to the worker-priest movement was that full-time work did not leave participants enough time for liturgical work.

Cardinal Feltin has indicated that the Church in France is seeking a new form for the worker-priest movement which could overcome Vatican objections.

A Vatican source said the movement might be changed into an organisation of "worker" missionaries including laymen as well as priests. The source said the movement, if approved by the Pope, would eventually be extended all over the Catholic world.

—"Irish Times", 12th June, 1959.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 8—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	85
Our Lord and His Mother	86
Editor's Chair	90
"Jehovah's Witnesses"	92

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.Christianity in the East

Our changing world is bringing to maturity younger Churches which, we are tempted to think, are still under Western direction and guidance. This article is instructive.

Asian Christians Confer: Seeking Answers

The great missionary expansion of the Protestant Church during the last century and a half has resulted in large self-governing Churches in Asia and Africa counting many millions in their membership. It is not difficult to criticise the missionary methods of a century ago; they resulted in a pattern of church life which does not accord with the very different Asian scene as we know it to-day; nevertheless we may not think lightly of those early missionaries and their supporters. Without their pioneering faith and courage the world would be a very different place to-day: apart from the existence of so large a Christian community, Asia has been deeply influenced by the impact of the mission of the Church. The Asian revolution of our day, with its profound social changes and religious revival, is itself largely the work of men and women who first learned to respect the dignity of man and to dedicate their lives to setting their country free, through the education they received in Christian schools and colleges.

But the scene has changed, and the old pattern of many denominations in Asia, each linked by sentiment and interdependence with a Church or missionary organisation in the West, is no longer suited either to the needs of Asia or to the aspirations of the Asian Church. There is unreality in a situation which links the Ceylon Methodist in close relationship with the Methodist Church in England, and the Burmese Baptist in similar ties with the Baptist Church in America, and leaves them not only separate from one another but so remote as to have no contact, though both are engaged in the same task in closely similar circumstances.

This old pattern of missionary work, with separate churches ignorant of one another and each dependent upon a mother Church in the West, was inevitable in the circumstances of the last century, but to-day it is an anachronism, and its replacement by a new pattern of relationships is one of the tasks which confront the Church to-day. It is in this context that the First Assembly of the East Asia Christian Conference, held in Kuala Lumpur in May, assumes such great significance. This was a Conference of Asian Church leaders, not of missionary societies: there were a few observers from the West, as there were from Africa, but the leadership of the conference was in Asian hands and its findings reflect Asian thinking.

The composition of the Assembly was wide-embracing; it included delegates from the ancient Mar Thoma Church of Travancore and of the Philippine Independent Church (a Catholic Church of three million members which broke away from the Roman obedience at the beginning of the century), as well as from the Church of South India, and the many churches between Pakistan and Korea (including Australia and New Zealand) belonging to the Anglican, Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, and Presbyterian confessions. Many of the delegates were lay men and women, some of whom took a prominent part in the leadership of the Assembly's thinking.

The theme of the Assembly was "Witnesses Together," and the programme provided opportunity for much time and thinking on the problems which are confronting Asian Christians in a world of rapid social change, of revived religions, and with a population increasing at an explosive rate. What is the nature of the democracy that a Christian should seek in such a world? In lands where the population is growing more rapidly than the food supply, and hunger is just round the corner, is the political freedom which we associate with Western democracy as important as a rapidly developing economy which a less liberal form of government can ensure? What is the meaning of religious liberty, and do the same principles apply both to a Buddhist child attending a Christian school and a Protestant child attending a Catholic school? If "mission" is the obligation of the Church in Asia as much as of the Church in the West, what changes are necessary in the relationship between missionary societies and their dependent churches? In a rural economy which makes it impossible for a community to maintain a full-time professionally trained ministry,

—(Continued on p. 95.)

OUR LORD AND HIS MOTHER

It is fairly plain that there is an intention to expand the relationship of Our Lord and His Mother by assigning to her qualities and experiences parallel to His. If the Christian faith and creed declare that Our Lord was Virgin-born, then a large part of Christendom must assert that the birth of His Mother was also exceptional: she was Immaculately Conceived. If Our Lord issued to his hearers the invitation, "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy-laden and I will give you rest," His Mother is described by the term "Refuge of Sinners". If Our Lord is Our Mediator and Redeemer, His Mother is now associated as "co-redemptress" and "co-mediatrix".

After His death and Resurrection Our Lord ascended into Heaven. Parallel with the Ascension is the doctrine of the Corporal Assumption of the Blessed Virgin into Heaven.

It is natural for us to study these theological developments, as we want to believe what is true. Believing what is true, or trying to arrive at truth, is a proper task for professing Christians; and evangelical Christianity must satisfy itself that its faith is not neglecting or ignoring any doctrine which is really essential to a right understanding of the Gospel.

* * *

As we cannot at this present time attempt to study the whole range of the doctrines associated with Our Lord Jesus Christ we confine ourselves now to the doctrine of the Assumption, which, as we have said, appears to be a parallel to the doctrine of the Ascension. A few years ago the dogma of the Corporal (or bodily) Assumption of the Blessed Virgin into Heaven was declared at Rome to be a truth divinely revealed, and to be believed by all Christians. The declaration came, we believe, within the terms of the decision of the Vatican Council of 1870 that when the Pope speaks ex cathedra to define a matter of faith he is induced with infallibility. When the dogma was approaching definition (and after it was defined) a great deal was written and published on both sides. Our pages contained several articles on the subject, including the Pastoral Letter of the two Archbishops of the Church of Ireland in which they showed the absence of Biblical or Patristic evidence for the dogma. They held that the definition had erected another barrier to the restoration of Church unity, and in this they were of course right. We do not of course think that the dogma of the Assumption is the only barrier, or the most serious one; but it asserts as a fact something of which we have no possible knowledge. Had the subject been left an open question which a man might accept or reject we would feel differently, but when it is put to us as a new condition and requirement for eternal salvation, then we say that the want of any real evidence, the confusions and contradictions of the scholastic theologians, and the sheer non-necessity of such a dogma compel us to dissent.

* * *

Lately we read a short theological treatise on the Assumption by the Rev. Fr. Joseph Duhr, S.J. (translated and published in England in 1951). The translator says that the papal definition of the dogma of the Assumption "is an infallible declaration that this fact has been revealed by God as part of the Christian deposit and must be believed by all . . . it does not create a new belief . . . it does not add to the deposit which was handed on to the Church by the Apostles and which was complete at the death of the last Apostle." The translator also says that "this detail had already been given to the Church in the apostolic age".

Now here at the outset we find ourselves in a world of thought very different from our own. It appears to us that the point involved in the quotation above is that the Pope has declared the Assumption to have always been part of the original Christian faith—we ask for proof. Did Christians of the apostolic age believe that the body of the Blessed Virgin had been removed to Heaven? The date of the apostolic age cannot extend beyond the year 100 A.D., i.e. a maximum space of seventy years after the Crucifixion. So, we are told, the Church was well aware of this before 100 A.D. How can that be even asserted? We say "asserted", rather than "proved", for even assertion demands some degree of evidence. The translator also employs the phrase "a fact which was always at least implicit in what Christians believed". If the Assumption was held "implicitly", and not "explicitly", it becomes difficult to discuss the subject at all, because it is notoriously hard to prove a negative (i.e. that they did not hold it implicitly), and hard to acquiesce in the position that as there is no explicit (i.e. written) evidence, it must be accepted as implicit in ordinary faith.

How do we know that the doctrine was held implicitly? Apparently the present-day answer is that the Pope has said so.

If the Apostolic Church held and taught the doctrine some trace of it must have remained in the surviving Christian "writings" of the "sub-apostolic" age. As far as we can discover there is no trace. We know that much of the early Christian literature has perished—yet the literature of the age of the Fathers and Councils is comparatively abundant: if the Assumption was a revealed fact it would undoubtedly appear in some of that literature, at least by clear implication. No one has so far supplied us with evidence from the fourth century. From the fourth century onward we are removed a long way from original Christianity, and each century thereafter carries us further away, and at the same time further into unsatisfactory speculations, dubious exegesis, and regrettable credulities.

* * *

Fr. Duhr in his introduction refers to a Dr. Ernst of Bamberg who taught, he says, that "the Assumption even to-day must be counted among those pious beliefs which, while not without some verisimilitude or even a certain probability, yet are no part of the deposit of faith entrusted to the Church by her divine Founder." "Till the time of his death Dr. Ernst held tenaciously to this point of view and defended it strenuously."

The controversy among German Roman Catholic theologians here referred to was some thirty-five to forty years ago. Fr. Duhr speaks of Dr. Ernst's "indisputable historical erudition". This erudition led him to the conclusion "that neither the liturgical texts nor the alleged agreement of the Fathers and theologians permit the statement that the bodily Assumption of Mary is implicitly revealed". Let it be kept in mind that Dr. Ernst was a Roman Catholic, and that he was engaged in the enquiry "is the Assumption part of the deposit of faith entrusted to the Church by her divine Founder?" We must note of course that he wrote before the Definition was made, and at a time when the possibility of making a definition was only a speculation or discussion among theologians (as it had been in older days.)

* * *

Fr. Duhr like many theologians (and like many who fancy that they are theologians) begins his own study of the Assumption by setting down some very comprehensive views. It is commonplace with these writers to lay down broad principles derived (as they suppose) from their Church's authority to arbitrate and instruct on everything, and then to deduce from these broad, and comprehensive principles the precise details and limits of dogmas. One of these is put down as follows—"Concerning truths we are bound to believe, the only authority to be consulted is the holy Church." This is true in a certain sense, but that sense involves a further question—how are we to be sure of the Church's accuracy and credibility? For the reformed Churches there is the authority of Holy Scripture, and we say, that "whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man as necessary to salvation". In other words, the Church in fact has in the Bible a permanent record of its faith, and a standard of truth from which it has no right to differ. We must not only consult the Church concerning truths we are bound to believe, but we must examine the Church's verdicts in the light of that very volume of truth to which the Church has committed itself. If our standard of beliefs is simply "the Church says . . ." we are stopping short. The New Testament tells us of a group of enquirers who heard what the Church had to say, and then examined Holy Scripture to discover "if these things were so"—the people of Berea are commended as "more noble" than others for doing so. Is that not a pattern for all of us? Have we not a far more extensive and complete body of Holy Scripture available for authenticating what the Church says? We agree that on this question of the Assumption the New Testament does not guide us to a decision; and there are historical truths which lie outside its pages. The Assumption could be true, as far as the New Testament goes, if we took the view that Our Lord's Mother outlived the latest New Testament writer. We need not even go so far—after Calvary her earthly life is not recorded in Holy Scripture at all, so whatever we believe or disbelieve is outside the truths necessary to salvation.

But, if we say that in this particular question of fact the New Testament does not assist us by any express statement we must have evidence, without which a question of fact can never be settled. Fr. Duhr says "a fact implied in a dogma can be imposed on our belief even when all historical proof is impossible". The instance he gives is the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin. The Assumption would be another such instance.

We say, however, that in the absence of historical proof we are content to label these instances as "pious opinions" (just as Dr. Ernst did). We can never see the necessity (from a Reformed standpoint) of adding to our belief a doctrine for which no more can be said than this—"... a dogma sometimes will appear only as a probable or morally certain interpretation of the explicit data of faith. It is the infallible Church which assures us that this interpretation is the only right one." The Christian Creed is not an expanding one, and the "Deposit of Faith" is not like the widow's cruse of oil. How can we reject the position that what was accepted as saving faith in the age of the Apostles is saving faith to-day? If we say, the first Christians, had they known certain truths would have believed them, we are assuming too much—1. that the points in question are indeed truths, and 2. that they are demonstrably vitally related to our eternal welfare. At this stage we find ourselves brought back to essentials.

The Protestant objection to the dogma of the Assumption may be put briefly—it lays down a condition of eternal salvation which God's Word does not lay down. It bases man's eternal redemption on other grounds than the atoning death of Our Saviour. That is indeed the fatal flaw in all dogmas which are not plainly stated in Holy Scripture. That is the real challenge the infallible Church must face; and that is the real answer to Infallibility itself.

* * *

Of course if you believe in the continuous development of doctrine you may go through life dazzled by the vast possibilities of it all, and may even be fascinated by the steadily increasing conditions necessary to salvation. How otherwise can we think of the implications of this quotation from Fr. Duhr?—"With the infallible sureness of a higher instinct, which is not shackled by gaps in the documents, nor the uncertainties of the past, nor the ambiguities of a text, and which is superior to the logic of the theological reasons that prepare for the definitive pronouncements, the Church develops the incomparable richness of the divine legacy she has been charged to guard and manifest." We must keep our feet on the ground. The Protestant must be very suspicious of "the infallible sureness of a higher instinct" which in such airy fashion dismisses everything which in any other responsible department of life and thought will be considered indispensable. In face of those who assure us that the Church values reason, here is "a flight from reason."

We repeat what we have said more than once, that we see no virtue in adding to what is to be believed. Necessary truth is not so multiform, so proliferating, so persistently uncompleted—"Repentance towards God, faith towards Our Lord Jesus Christ" satisfied the Apostles, and may well satisfy us. The New Testament unfolds the implications adequately; and the Christian's vocation is to walk worthy of Him Who has called us out of darkness into the marvellous light of truth.

* * *

The following statement of Fr. Duhr "the mere fact that the Church proposes a truth for our belief guarantees for us, better than any historical proof whatsoever, that it is contained in the Apostolic revelation, at least in germ" again shows us how deep the cleavage is between Reformed and unreformed Christianity. If we combat Roman Catholic doctrines on the supposition that they rest on a common basis with our own we shall be sadly mistaken. If we recognise that the dogma of Infallibility is the basis now accepted for Roman Catholic doctrine we shall see clearly where our protest should be directed, and also, we shall do greater justice to the sincerely held convictions of Rome. When it is thought that evangelical Protestantism and Roman Catholicism stand on a common foundation it is natural to suppose that Rome has knowingly parted with fundamental truth. But when we mark the contrast between grounding our faith upon ancient Christianity and Holy Scripture (i.e. the faith of Christ and His Apostles), and grounding a faith to-day upon the Church's Infallibility we bring beliefs into proper perspective, and note that we argue in fact from different premises.

* * *

Though evidence as we understand it is not thought very important, yet Fr. Duhr pays some attention to it. He reminds us that the well-known dogmatic theologian, much quoted nowadays, Dr. Josef Pohle, declares that "in the first five centuries there is no indication of belief in the Assumption of Mary, neither in literature nor in Christian monuments. He also reminds us that Fr. Jugie ("La Mort et l'Assomption de la Sainte Vierge", 1944) set out to establish a historical basis for the dogma, but gave up the attempt, and tried to derive the dogma of the Assumption from the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. We ask, must not all other attempts to justify or establish the dogma be vitiated by this original defect—that the ancient Church discloses no trace whatever of this belief? It is indeed improbable that any new documentary evidence will be discovered (though precious new documents do occasionally come to light as for example, the "Teaching of the Apostles", or "the Dead Sea Scrolls").

Fr. Duhr tries to bring forward a ray of light in the ancient Catholic darkness of the fourth century, but confesses that it is "quite feeble and disputed". It is a sculpture in a sarcophagus in Saragossa, of a woman kneeling in prayer with a man on each side. One explanation is that it is the Blessed Virgin with St. Peter and another Apostle—a form of sculpture which is said to have become the first conventional art-form for the Assumption. But on the other hand, a Benedictine priest, Dom C. Leopart, regards the sculpture as a symbol of the City of Saragossa!

A further fragment is a phrase in a writing of St. Epiphanius who noted that the Bible gives no information about the end of Mary's life—"Is she dead or not; was she buried or not? We do not know." But what St. Epiphanius had in mind has never been satisfactorily explained.

It may be worthwhile to note that Dr. Ernst is quoted by Fr. Duhr with approval when he comments that the expressions used by Epiphanius "do not go further than the veneration given to the Mother of God by Elizabeth". While we do not call the Blessed Virgin Mary "the Mother of God" (holding that that description is due to a misunderstanding of the Greek title "Theotokos" as used in the Nestorian controversy), we accept the evangelical standard of respect as shown by her cousin Elizabeth whose salutation is preserved in the Gospel of St. Luke—"the Mother of my Lord" is correct, but it is not equivalent to "Mother of God".

* * *

We accept also the truths of the Virginity and Maternity of Mary, but are confident that they ought not to be interpreted and built upon as later writers did. What Epiphanius meant by these attributes is not what a writer of today means—development has taken a wrong turn.

Liturgical forms, that is to say, the services appropriate to Christian festivals, are often ancient. Some of them commemorate Our Lord's Mother very fittingly, and she has as much right to be commemorated as many another. But we need to avoid the common error of reading into these forms of service the ideas of very much later times. We know, for instance, how the language of early liturgies regarding the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is sometimes interpreted as though early Christians held the doctrine of Transubstantiation and what is meant to-day by "the Sacrifice of the Mass", though the dogmas belong to a period many centuries later. So with some liturgical language concerning the Blessed Virgin. If there was an early commemoration of "the Falling Asleep of the Blessed Virgin" it does not prove that ancient Christianity believed in her bodily Assumption into Heaven. If they affirmed her immortality we must make no more of it than of the grace of immortality given to other saints.

By the end of the seventh century, we are told, the celebration of the Falling Asleep of B.V.M. (i.e. death) was observed "universally". The end of the seventh century is six hundred years after the end of the first century. Think of the differences between the twentieth century and the fourteenth century—to us the fourteenth century is remote, mediaeval, obscure, crude. Enormous changes have come about in thought and conduct. Can we not see that want of real evidence over a period of five hundred years is fairly conclusive? To argue from evidence which arises five hundred years after the supposed event is not likely to be effective.

Fr. Duhr says that the majority of theologians think that the celebration of the Falling Asleep really meant "the immediate exaltation of Mary's person in both soul and body". It would be heroic indeed if modern Roman Catholic theologians held any other view than the one favoured by the Church. Dr. Ernst did dissent from the current view—he is quoted as saying "The Assumption must not be understood necessarily in the sense of 'corporal' assumption." He seems to have held that "the primary and essential object is nothing more than the entrance into beatitude of the soul of the most holy Virgin, a fact dogmatically unassailable."

Some popular sermons which have survived from eight or nine centuries after the Blessed Virgin's death, may be understood in a way which favours the corporal or bodily Assumption; but sermons are popular appeals, and credulity was a large element in many of them in the Dark Ages. Even sermons from the Eastern part of the Church are not marked by any great investigation of evidence. Eloquence in the pulpit is not equivalent to rational enquiry: noble flights of oratory will not compensate for the absence of all evidence in earlier and enlightened ages.

(To be continued)

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

GOD.

How can we know God? We can know God by what He has done, and is doing: we can know Him by what He has revealed: we can know Him by His Incarnate Word. It is therefore quite wrong to speak of God as "unknowable", unless in the sense that His ways "are past finding out"—we can never have complete and exhaustive knowledge. Such knowledge, however, is not necessary for us. The effective limits on our knowledge are also in part due to our insufficiency, for the creature cannot comprehend totally the Creator, and finite mind cannot measure the Infinite and the Absolute.

Recognising our limitation does not prevent us from conjecture or speculation. Men have always tried to form complete intellectual concepts of God. This we may call metaphysics or philosophy. As an exercise it has never been confined to the Christian faith: all world-religions, as well as ancient heathenisms, have given much thought to the matter of defining the Godhead. There have been preposterous and absurd notions of God; but also profound and noble ones. Yet we are compelled to say that no satisfying faith in God, faith which recognises our inadequacy, as well as God's inspiration, can exist apart from His revelation of Himself. Philosophy and theosophy are not to be despised, but must not be compared with the knowledge derived from "thus saith the Lord".

* * *

What God has made known to us may be distinguished into natural truth about Him, and supernatural truth. We can use the light of nature to obtain true ideas, and we need the light of revelation to build upon those true ideas the knowledge of God as a moral personality to whom we are kin. But as the Bible incorporates the true ideas derived from the light of nature along with the true ideas given by revelation, we need not go outside its pages in order to learn. Here indeed is one of the most important and convincing aspects of the Bible: natural religion is brought into association with revealed religion, and thus we have eternal truth brought before us as comprehensively as we can grasp it.

* * *

Natural truths about God are those which we know to be necessary to the very idea of God—self-existence is one—no rational view of God can make Him dependent on any factors, agencies, or contingencies outside Himself. From Exodus 3. 14, "God said unto Moses 'I am that I am'" to Acts 17, 24, "The God that made the world, and all things; therein, being Lord of Heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is He served by men's hands, as though He needed anything, seeing He Himself giveth to all life and breath and all things" the lesson of divine self-existence is plain: it expresses a natural truth.

Implicit in this natural truth is the fact of God's eternity. This fact is constantly stated in the Bible—"From everlasting to everlasting Thou art God" (Ps. 90, 2); "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (2 Pet. 3, 8).

With it may naturally be linked the truth that God is infinite. Plainly, against the finite, relative, and transient nature of creation, we must place the infinite, and place it not only as an abstract idea, but as a Being, the Infinite One, Who is Jehovah.

Similarly, we can examine the Bible and find ample recognition of the many and supreme attributes of God which are borne in upon us by the order of nature and reason—He is unsearchable, i.e. inexhaustible. He is invisible, for He is spirit, not matter (hence one of the chief concerns of the Old Testament writers is to eradicate from Israel the heathen notions of idolatry). He is incomparable—some twenty-five or thirty years ago a popular series of religious books bore titles put in the form of questions, and one of the titles was "What is God Like?" This is a popular way of putting it, but a way which is quite wrong. God is not like "anything", for all else must be less than He, and in quality must be different. The Bible, as usual, puts it correctly: its question is: "To whom will ye liken God?" (Isaiah 40, 18). The answer called for must be negative—"To no one", for there is none else (Isaiah 46, 5).

* * *

We next note those qualities which are expressed as a rule by the clumsy and puzzling words "omnipresence", "omnipotence", "omniscience". Be it noted that these are not words of the English Bible, and are not translations of plain Hebrew or Greek Biblical words. They are theologians' words. They represent true ideas of God, that He is everywhere, all-powerful, and knows all things. Those are truths which are necessary in face of the facts that God creates, and sustains all things—His creative work is continuous, and His sustaining power is the secret of life and order and the reign of law. Were He possessed of attributes which fall short of these He would be less than the Being made known by Revelation. We have met with the theory that God is growing up with His universe, and that His authority, physical and moral, is as yet defective or imperfect. Whatever may be said for this as a speculative possibility, we dismiss it as inconsistent with the Christian view of God. It may be interesting, of course, but we cannot consider it a Christian opinion, or a Hebrew one—"Who is able to build Him a house, seeing the Heaven and the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain Him?" So spoke Solomon (2 Chron. 2, 8). "The Most High dwelleth not in houses made with hands; as saith the prophet 'the Heaven is My throne, and the earth the footstool of My feet.'" So spoke St. Stephen (Acts 7, 48).

This may suffice to show how clearly the Bible puts forward the fact of the Divine omnipresence.

As for omnipotence, it is enough to refer to Psalm 135, 6, "Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that hath He done, in Heaven and in earth," and to Our Lord's words (Mk. 10, 27), "With men it is impossible, but not with God: for all things are possible with God."

Omniscience is also made plain as a characteristic of God—Elihu said (Job 34, 21), "His eyes are upon the way of a man, and He seeth all his goings." Proverbs says (15, 3), "The eyes of the Lord are in every place, keeping watch upon the evil and the good." St. John (1 Jn. 3, 20) says, "God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things."

* * *

Beyond the attributes we name above there are the moral qualities of God, and of them the Bible constantly speaks, because they are revealed to us by God's own will—He is perfect, holy, just, true, good, righteous, faithful, loving, merciful, gracious, compassionate, tolerant, forgiving. These are adorable and comforting as well as disciplining qualities of God. They are not limitless, automatic, or mechanical in their operation. We have all been puzzled and confused by the existence of evil in the world, by great natural catastrophies, by the horrors committed by men, races and nations against other men, races, and nations. We have sat securely and looked on at the long drawn-out agonies of people better than ourselves—have we not all asked, "Why does God let these things happen?" If he can prevent them and will not, He is not Good; if He cannot prevent them then we have been deceived in our thoughts about Him! How do we solve that problem?

The answer is that we do not solve these problems, for we recognise our inability. "We are but of yesterday and know nothing because our days upon earth are a shadow." It is a matter of age-long human experience that "one dieth in his full strength" whereas "another dieth in bitterness of soul and never tasteth of good." But ought we not to say that the whole problem of evil is involved in the principle of freewill? Human freedom, if it has great advantages in the development of human personality, has also enormous disadvantages in the fruits of disobedience, and in man's inhumanity to man. The existence of evil is an insoluble problem, and we are usually hindered from admitting a personal agency of evil, "the prince of the power of the air", by the fear of being involved in dualism. This fear is perhaps a consequence of philosophy rather than of theology—an interim dualism is not anti-Christian.

Can we account for all kinds of human wickedness by ascribing them to God's gift of freedom? In view of the consequences is it a gift a good God ought to have given? Here again we can only say that the development of human faculties and personality has been inseparable from free-will. Progress and freedom are one. The man who chooses evil may also choose good, but all human choices are ultimately over-ruled by God for His eternal purposes. We know that there are no easy solutions for men's difficulties, but it would be a surrender to far more intractable problems if we were to give up faith in a God Who is holy, just, loving, and good.

Taking all we can into account, the Christian view of God and man is the most satisfactory. It is also the most rational for it is what God Himself has unfolded to us.

* * *

Finally, we are "to see God in the face of Jesus Christ", "Who is the effulgence of His glory and the impress of His substance" (Heb. 1, 3)—"A clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty . . . an effulgence from everlasting light and an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image of His goodness" (Wisd. 7, 26—see R.V.M.). The incarnate life, and the experience of suffering and death which were Our Lord's, do not solve the problem, but they do remove it from the category of the meaningless and irrational. If the love of God is inseparable from suffering, and if redemption is not cheap, but unutterably dear to God we can see enough light to strengthen faith and to give us hope until patience has her perfect work. If in the world we have tribulation, we can be of good cheer because our crucified and risen Lord has overcome, and the fruits of eternal victory are His.

"JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES"

The substance of a sermon preached in Christ Church, Weston-super-Mare.

By The Rev. R. J. Coates, M.A. (Bristol).

"And after eight days again His disciples were within, and Thomas with them: then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you. Then saith He to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold My hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into My side; and be not faithless, but believing. And Thomas answered and said unto Him, My Lord and my God."

Who are the Jehovah's Witnesses?

The title is one they have chosen themselves. In former days the followers of this religion were generally known as Russellites. The movement began through the work and preaching of Charles Taze Russell, of Pennsylvania, about 1872. The present members of the sect do not like the name Russellites or Russellism. "Pastor" Russell as he later became known, after a rather chequered history, into which I do not need to go this evening, died in 1916. At the time of his death it was said by his followers that when the history of Christianity came to be written, Pastor Russell would be given the place of honour next to the Apostle Paul. The next leader of the movement was a man known by the title "Judge" Rutherford. He died in 1942 and was succeeded by the present chief, Nathan H. Knorr. During its history the sect has had several names given to it by its members and its critics: Russellites, Rutherfordites, Millennial Dawnists, The International Bible Students' Association, the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, etc. In 1931, at an International convention of its members, held in Columbus, Ohio, the designation "Jehovah's Witnesses" was chosen as the name by which the followers of this religion wish to be known.

What do they believe?

Like all other dogmatic interpreters of prophecy the Witnesses have had to alter some of their beliefs. Russell had said that the living members of the body of Christ would be glorified some time before 1914. Rutherford altered this statement in 1923 to read some time after 1914. No doubt some further editing of the forecasts will be necessary as the passage of time falsifies their predictions. There is one cardinal doctrine, however, to which the Witnesses hold fast at all times, and that is that all other Christians are wrong in their teaching. They speak disparagingly of other Christians as "religionists", and in particular they are very hard on the clergy, whom they denounce continually. "Christendom" is used as the description of something which is false and corrupt.

Why should we speak about this sect which is against everyone? We are forced to do so by their continual aggression. The initial advantage, apparently gained by the Witnesses on this score, can soon be dissipated by anyone who inquires into the divisions which have occurred during the short history of the movement, or the personal character of the first leader, "Pastor" Russell. We must speak on this subject for the sake of the followers of this religion. If our points of difference were only on minor matters we could ignore the whole business even though we might suffer constant misrepresentation and abuse. But the matters on which we differ are fundamental. We differ on our belief in God. You and I this day, with millions of our fellow Christians in this and other lands, have offered worship to our Lord Jesus Christ. We have praised the Blessed and Sacred Trinity. If the teaching of the "Jehovah's Witnesses" is right, the doctrine of the Trinity is an invention of Satan and the teaching of the deity of Christ is blasphemy. We could not disagree on a more vital issue; we are forced to speak what we believe to be the truth about God, and confess the constant faith of the Church of Christ.

There is nothing new in the teaching of the Witnesses apart from the details of their prophetic interpretation. Their contention that Jesus is not necessarily Divine is but the resurrection of a heresy in the early church known as Arianism. Their teaching that Jesus before His incarnation was an angelic creature is but the revival of another heretical view known as Gnosticism. Their creed is no new discovery; its errors have all been answered before, and very adequately.

Leaving aside therefore many minor points, in the time at my disposal I am going to deal with three main issues: first, the Person of Christ; second, the Doctrine of the Trinity; third, the Doctrine of the Church and Salvation.

The Person of Christ

When our friends the Jehovah's Witnesses in the local church heard that I intended preaching on this subject, they wrote me a letter, and in the main I must say it was a kindly letter and I thank them for it, warning me against the danger of misrepresenting them. They sent me a book entitled Let God be True, which they say is an up-to-date and authoritative statement of their doctrine. I have within the last forty-eight hours refreshed my knowledge of their teaching by reading this book and what I have to say about them is based upon it. They say that Jesus before His incarnation was the angel Michael. He became man, died on the cross, and was resurrected not bodily, as is the orthodox belief, but as a spirit creature, whatever that may mean. The important point is, He is a creature; He did not exist from all eternity; there was a time when He was not; He was made by God.

What does Holy Scripture say on this subject?

Our appeal is to the Holy Scriptures. The Jehovah's Witnesses claim to base their teaching on no other foundation. Does my text sum up the New Testament attitude to Christ? Is the confession of Thomas the true confession? "Thomas saith unto Him, My Lord and my God." Is He God? That is the point at issue, my brethren. Are we worshipping a man or are we worshipping God? I want you to notice that the confession of Thomas is supported by Christ's own claim. Whatever the Jehovah's Witnesses may think of the claims of Jesus Christ, the Jews were in no doubt as to the implication of what He said. I want to turn to three passages in St. John's Gospel where we read that the Jews sought to kill Jesus because of the claims He made. In St. John 5. 18 we read: "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God." Again in St. John 8. 51-59, Jesus made a claim which the Jews recognised placed Him above all mortals; He claimed to give eternal life to all who kept His word. The Jews asked, "Are you then greater than Abraham?" and in His answer our Lord said, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad. Then said the Jews unto Him, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast Thou seen Abraham? Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was (R.V. margin: 'was born') I am." Immediately they sought to stone Him, because they thought He was blaspheming. Note that our Lord claimed not only pre-existence before Abraham, but He used the title of God as His own. God revealed Himself to Moses as the I AM; Jesus claimed the same timelessness as the Eternal. "It is clear," says Archbishop J. H. Bernard in his commentary on St. John, "that John means to represent Jesus as thus claiming for Himself the timeless being of Deity as distinct from the temporal existence of man. This is the teaching of the Prologue to the Gospel about Jesus (1. 1, 18); but here Jesus Himself is reported as having said I (am) He, which is a definite assertion of His Godhead and was so understood by the Jews. They had listened to His argument up to this point, but they could bear with it no longer. These words of mystery were rank blasphemy, and they proceeded to stone Him."

The other passage in St. John which I wish to refer to is found in chapter 10. 27-39. Our Lord promised eternal life to His sheep and assured them that no one would be able to pluck them out of His hand. "My Father," He said, "which gave them Me is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand. I and My Father are one." Then the Jews tried again to stone Him. When He asked them why they did this they answered, "For blasphemy; and because that Thou, being a man, makest Thyself God." Our Lord, as St. John then records, argued with them from the Scriptures in a thoroughly Jewish fashion and according to the principles adopted by the Rabbis. If, He said, the Judges in the Old Testament were spoken of as gods because they were God's representatives, why do you deny Me the title Son of God when I am the one specially consecrated by the Father and sent into the world? My works testify that I am in the Father and the Father in Me. Again they sought to take Him, but He escaped.

The Deity of Christ

My brethren, it is clear from the New Testament that Jesus was crucified because He made a claim which the Jews considered to be blasphemous. He claimed not only the Messiahship, but Deity. This dual claim underlay all His words and works. You remember when the man sick of the palsy was brought by his four friends to Jesus (see Mark 2. 1-12), and He said to him, "Thy sins be forgiven thee," the scribes who were present reasoned in their hearts saying, "This man blasphemeth; who can forgive sins but God only?" Jesus read their thoughts as God alone can, and did not lessen His claim but accepted their challenge and gave a demonstration of His authority by raising the man up to health and strength. At His trial before the High Priest He solemnly acknowledged His Messiahship and claimed a Divine origin and Divine power in the future, which caused Caiaphas to rend his clothes and cry out "Blasphemy!" (Matthew 26. 63-66). The prophetic Scriptures of the Old Testament tell of the coming of a Messiah who is God. Isaiah says He shall be called Emmanuel, God with us; also he speaks of Him as the Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Micah says His goings forth are from everlasting; and Malachi says, The Lord (i.e., God) shall come to His temple.

There is one passage of Scripture which I think is of particular importance in dealing with the teaching of the Jehovah's Witnesses on the Person of Christ. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the first two chapters of his letter contrasts the nature of Christ with that of angels, and tells us plainly that when He became the Saviour He did not take on Him the nature of angels, but human nature (Heb. 2. 16). If the writer believed, as the Jehovah's Witnesses do, that Jesus was an angelic creature before His incarnation, he could not have written of the possible alternatives of taking human nature or angelic nature. In the first chapter, where he contrasts the glory of the Son with that of angels, his words are most emphatic and conclusive about the nature of Christ. He writes (1. 6-8), "And again, when He bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him. And of the angels He saith, Who maketh His angels spirits and His ministers a flame of fire. But unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of Thy Kingdom." Our Lord Jesus Christ is not an angel. He is God. There are many other important passages in the New Testament which clearly support the orthodox teaching on the Person of Christ, but to which we cannot now refer. The Jehovah's Witnesses ignore most of them, and attempt by strange translations to blunt the obvious meaning of some of them.

The Doctrine of the Trinity

We pass now to a brief consideration of the Doctrine of the Trinity. Of course if you do not believe in the Deity of Christ you do not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, that teaching which sums up all we know about God, developed as a result of the incarnation of the Divine Saviour, and the coming of the Holy Spirit. The facts of revelation about the threefoldness in the nature and being of God are there in the New Testament. The doctrine which the term "the Trinity" seeks to express is based firmly on Scripture. The Jehovah's Witnesses try to make much of the fact that the word "Trinity" is not found in the New Testament. They are very fond of using the word "Theocracy", but it is not found in Scripture either. But they use it because they believe it expresses truth which is found in the Bible. We use the word "Trinity" for precisely the same reason. In the book Let God be True the writers examine four texts which they say are usually quoted to support the doctrine of the Trinity.

The first text quoted is 1 John 5. 7, as found in the Authorised Version. "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost and these three are one." The compilers of Let God be True quickly show that this verse is not part of the original Scriptures, as it is not found in any manuscript before the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries. He has learned this from orthodox Christian scholars and admits that the text is not found in any modern translations apart from Roman Catholic ones, but yet he pretends that it is the most important text used in support of the doctrine of the Trinity. That is only deception to try and influence ignorant people. No one with any claim to even moderate knowledge would use the text in support of the doctrine. Not one of the Greek or Latin Fathers of the third, fourth or fifth centuries, when the controversies about the doctrine of the Trinity were at their height, used the text. Obviously they could not because it was not known; but the doctrine was.

The next text quoted is St. John 10. 30, "I and my Father are one". It is rather astonishing to find the verse discussed without any reference to the context. No attempt is made to explain the Jews' criticism that Jesus made Himself equal with God by His claim (see 10. 33). Neither is there any explanation offered as to why they wanted to stone Him for blasphemy.

1 Timothy 3. 16 is then discussed as a basic text in support of the Trinity or Incarnation, for of course the former is founded on the latter. Again the reading "He who was manifested" instead of "God was manifested" is given as though this were a fatal blow to the orthodox. There is no admission that the alternative reading is the one given in the Revised Version of 1881, before the Jehovah's Witnesses had got going.

The last text discussed is St. John 1. 1, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." This is translated, "In a beginning was the word, and the word was with the God, and a god was the word." It is significant that the Revisers of 1881, who had Unitarians on their Committees, did not make any alteration or suggest any alternative to the Authorised Version translation. It is well supported and grammatically sound. Do the Jehovah's Witnesses believe there are many gods? Apart from any disputed translation of the text, can we conceive that the Apostle in writing his gospel would open it with words which are contradicted by the confession of St. Thomas which is obviously a climax of its teaching?

It is a very strange omission, to say the least of it, that this book Let God be True discusses the doctrine of the Trinity without any reference to St. Matthew 28. 19, 20: "baptising them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost". The commission is not into the names, but into the name, that is, the one nature of God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Neither is there any mention or discussion of 2 Corinthians 13. 14, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all." Such texts are obviously too awkward for non-trinitarians, who profess to base their religion on the Bible only.

The Doctrine of the Church and of Salvation

I must refer briefly to the strange teaching of the Jehovah's Witnesses on these important subjects. They teach that our Lord's return took place in the fall of 1914. His return was invisible and not in bodily form. The first resurrection followed in 1918. It also was unobserved by the world at large. Only the "Witnesses" were aware of the great happenings. It is hard to reconcile this with the New Testament description of the world-shaking consequences of Christ's second advent. The most extraordinary doctrine of the sect, however, is the teaching that the church consists only of the 144,000 mentioned in Revelation 14. Despite the millions of known saints of God in all ages the number is taken quite literally. The great multitude apart from the 144,000 mentioned in the Book of the Revelation is, it is said, composed of the ordinary members of the "Witnesses" whose destiny is apparently an earthly heaven when Christ sets up his millennial Kingdom. This teaching is the basis of the once popular catch-word in the days of Russell, "Millions now living will never die." No hope of salvation is held out for those who are not members of the Jehovah's Witnesses. Opponents of the movement are doomed to destruction. Your attitude to them and their message determines your salvation (Let God be True, p. 194). The Church of England teaches that no man is saved by the profession of any law or sect, but only through the name of our Lord Jesus Christ (Article 18). Your salvation depends ultimately on your personal relationship to Him. St. Paul says: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved, for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Romans 10. 9, 10 R.V.). Will you not say with Thomas, "My Lord and my God"?

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 86.

what changes are necessary in the structure of the Church? Is the English parish or circuit the model for India—or does the New Testament provide a better guide?

As the discussion in the Assembly proceeded one thing became increasingly clear: the Church in the West, with its too-rigid attitude towards communism, remote from the resurgent culture of Asia, and bound by its own denominational history, has not got the answer to these profound and pressing questions. Perhaps the Church in Asia does not know the answer either, but it is important, and a matter for thankfulness, that in the inauguration of the East Asia Christian Conference Asian Christians have found a means of coming together to think and pray their way into these problems. It is to be hoped that the Churches in the West will be ready to listen, for they have much to learn. G.B.J.

—"Manchester Guardian", 12th June, 1959.

* * *

British Roman Catholics Increase

The Catholic population of the dioceses of Great Britain increased by 115,924 in the course of a year, bringing the total to 4,194,830, according to the newly-released British Catholic Directory for 1959.

Presenting statistics as of the beginning of last year, it records another 476,350 Catholics in Northern Ireland, making the overall total for the United Kingdom 4,671,180.

The bulk of the Catholic population, 3,422,500, is recorded for England and Wales, with another 772,330 Catholics in Scotland.

Conversions officially recorded during 1957 in England and Wales totalled 14,581 compared with 14,077 in the previous 12 months.

These figures given in the new Catholic Directory are the most conservative estimates available for regular practising Catholics in this country based on parish and diocesan returns.

Though they increase gradually each year they are generally considered by Catholics to be short by something like 1,000,000 of the actual figure for those who attend Mass on Sundays and fulfil their Easter duties.

The total population for the United Kingdom at the last census in 1951 was 53,327,333, giving Catholics a constant proportion of slightly under one in ten.

Order priests rose by 287, bringing the total to 2,964. They remain at about 64 per cent. of the diocesan clergy, who increased by 79 to 4,617.

Churches open to the public increased from 3,085 to 3,144, marriages from 42,825 to 43,456 and child baptisms from 100,438 to 107,125.

Britain now has 1,391 primary and all-age schools with 418,717 pupils, 59 "direct grant" schools (run by private groups with the help of the local government education authorities and taking some tuition-paying students) with 28,948 pupils and 605 independent (normally fee-paying) schools with another 97,277.

Liverpool, with 488,600 Catholics, is the biggest diocese numerically, followed by Westminster (461,000).

Catholics in the English-speaking world are estimated by the Directory at 63,459,543 and throughout the world at about 423,000,000.—"Catholic Weekly", 29/1/'59.

—(Quoted in "The Vigilant", Melbourne, March, '59).

Fatima

A warning by Sister Lucy, to whom Our Lady appeared at Fatima in 1917, that God would chastise the world "in a tremendous way" through Russia in 1960 unless it offered prayer and penance, has been published in Mexico.

The warning was given in an interview Sister Lucy gave in 1957 to Fr. Augustine Fuentes.

Fr. Fuentes is the Roman postulator for the beatification cause of Sister Lucy's cousins, Francisco and Jacinta Marto, who saw the apparitions with her.

Third Secret

Sister Lucy told him: "Believe me, Father, God is going to chastise the world, and in a tremendous way.

"The chastisement of heaven is imminent, Father. 1960 is not far off, and what will happen then will be a very sad thing for all if before then, the world does not offer prayer and penance."

(This was apparently a reference to the so-called "third secret" of Our Lady of Fatima, a message given by her to the three children during the apparitions, but not to be made public before 1960.)

Nations' Fate

Sister Lucy continued: "Tell them, Father, that the Blessed Virgin said many times to my cousins, Francesco and Jacinta, as well as to me, that many nations would disappear from the face of the earth, and that Russia would be the instrument of the chastisement of heaven for all the world, if before this we did not bring about the conversion of that unhappy nation."

His report is published in Hacia Los Altares, journal of the Veraacruz diocese.

—"Sunday Press", Dublin, May 31, '59.

[The "Fatima" prophecies are a little like some of the extreme interpretations of Bible prophecy we have had from certain Protestant quarters. The chastisement of heaven is certain to fall upon sinners, sooner or later and Russia is not the sole offender. But we should be distrustful of particular dates. Sister Lucy had no new message to give the world. God's revelation was complete nineteen centuries ago.]

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	—	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	0	4
The Confessional	—	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY
7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 9—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS		Page
Passing Events	97
"J. B. S."	98
Our Lord and His Mother	99
Editor's Chair	102
Useless Kinds of Religion	105
The Story of a Priest	106

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Pope John Clears the Air

Any doubts regarding the aim of the Pope's proposed Ecumenical Council were cleared away by an announcement he made recently that members of other denominations will be "invited" to "rejoin" the Roman Catholic Church.

A special dispatch from Rome, April 3, said the statement was the latest in a series through which the pontiff gradually has clarified the role of the Council "for the reunion of Christianity" which he means to summon two years from now. The first statement permitted the interpretation that Roman Catholic and Protestant leaders might meet on equal footing to discuss reunion. At that time we frankly stated our disbelief that the council could meet on a basis of equality without the Roman Church forsaking its basic claim that it is the only true church (See The Sentinel, Feb. issue, page 20). For the Pope to acknowledge that other denominations are also Christian churches or are part of the Church or body of Christ, as such a meeting would indicate, would abolish any claim to supremacy the Roman Church could make. It would be relegating itself to the status of being just another denomination.

At this time and age we never could see the Vatican agreeing to the character of equality proposed for the Council with the subsequent change in status involved. Consequently we were not surprised that his new statement underlined plainly that the Pope, despite his conciliatory personality, has been prevailed upon to stand firm on the traditional Roman Catholic claim that the Church of Rome is the only one founded by Christ.

It will pay the Protestant churches to study carefully the wording of the papal pronouncement in this instance. "The Ecumenical Council," Pope John said, "will give a magnificent spectacle on unity. It will show how united is the Holy Church of God. By its very nature the meeting will serve as an invitation to the separated brethren who call themselves Christians to return to the common fold. The leadership and protection of that fold was given by Christ to Blessed Peter by an irrevocable act of the Lord's will."

One short look at this deliverance is sufficient to convince anyone that the Roman Church stands where it has always stood on the question of unity. It is that all other Christians must enter the Roman Church as erring children who have strayed and are coming back to the fold. This means clearly that all Protestant leaders who attend the council must know that from the start they will become the subject of pressure and the whole weight of Romanist ecclesiastical propaganda to bend them toward apostacy. There will not, and never could be, any compromise on the part of the Vatican on the issue of reunion. In the circumstances, it seems certain that Protestant participation in the Council would be meaningless, worthless and extremely ill-advised.

—"The Sentinel", Toronto, May, '59.

* * *

A Paradise for Divorce. Political Grounds in E. Germany

Bonn, June 9.

East Germany has become a "paradise for divorce". According to statistics produced there roughly one marriage in five ends in the divorce court, and of these cases a great many are based on "political incompatibility". The divorce rate is roughly double that of Western Germany.

East German courts grant divorces for such reasons as the insistence of one member of the family on taking children to church or on giving them a "petty bourgeois" upbringing. Interfering or failing to support the political work and political beliefs of a member of the

—(Continued on p. 107.)

"J. B. S."

With the deepest sorrow we record the death on Friday, 7th August, of the Reverend Canon James Bartley Shea who for nearly sixty years was an occasional contributor to our pages under the initials "J.B.S." Older readers will recall Canon Shea's remarkably clear-sighted and well-informed articles on many subjects and will remember the humour which he was never at pains to suppress. Sometimes a reader might underestimate Canon Shea's learning because of the fact that he never thought it necessary to write learnedly. Smaller men are always tempted to parade their knowledge and to draw attention to their cultured tastes and savoir faire, but J.B.S. wanted no more than to be understood by his readers, and so he always wrote for the ordinary man, and carried his readers along with him even in matters which other men might make learnedly obscure.

This conspicuous quality in J.B.S.'s writings came from the fact that he had been about the world, and had mixed freely with his fellow-men, and never pontificated or adopted an attitude towards others. He constantly believed that truth is something in which all honest men have a personal interest, and he argued and debated about spiritual truth for its own sake, so that down to the end of his very long life (he had reached his ninetieth year), he was welcomed and valued by many Roman Catholic friends though they knew how firmly he rejected the distinctive Roman Catholic dogmas.

Canon Shea was born in Castletown-Bere in the remote west of Co. Cork. He was a native speaker of Munster Irish, and also wrote the native language with deep appreciation of its literary character. He was an accomplished writer of Irish verse, and was aptly and worthily described as "the last of the Munster poets". A few years ago, he won a prize, in public competition, for a poem in Irish. As well as that, he wrote very good English verse, both religious and secular. We have traced poems by him in "The Catholic" as far back as January, 1895, when he was twenty-five years old, newly returned from some years of residence in the United States, and a student in Trinity College, Dublin. From the earliest we quote a verse which indicates the faith he maintained to the end—

"I bow to God and Him alone,
Receive as true His Word;
His blood for me can still atone,
His Truth is still my sword."

Not long since we saw in a secondhand bookshop a small volume of poems by him: English verse, published, if we remember correctly, in Kilkenny. The price was five shillings. Those who know the secondhand book-trade will know how few volumes of the poetry of sixty years ago can command a price of more than a few pence. This, then is a small sign of the bookseller's belief that he had something out of the ordinary.

Two other publications of far later date may be referred to—a translation into Irish of the (Latin) Confession and Epistle of St. Patrick, which appeared in 1932 as part of the commemoration made that year of the fifteen hundredth anniversary of the coming of Patrick to Ireland, and "St. Peter and Rome", a short book which was a serial in our pages. It is a really good discussion of the literary materials for the story that Peter once lived in Rome. (We have still some copies available in this office—see advt.)

We cannot omit to refer to the many contributions Canon Shea made to the Church of Ireland Gazette. The story of his early life and experiences in America was serialised, and this autobiography was eagerly read. It was entitled "A Speckled Bird". More recently, a series of articles, "Where have the Fairies Gone?" was much enjoyed. It was a very lively and scholarly enquiry into the disappearance of much of the extraordinary fairy-lore and superstition which formed a sort of second religion in rural Ireland. No less a person than the Berkeley Professor of Metaphysics in the University of Dublin told the present writer to say to Canon Shea how much he profited by reading it.

Prior to his retirement some fifteen years ago Canon Shea spent over forty-five years in the Ministry of the Church of Ireland, nearly all the time in Western Connaught in the diocese of Tuam. The Church of Ireland showed little appreciation of his intellectual gifts, manly character, spiritual insight, and pastoral ability. But few men were more genuinely admired by those who were able to perceive great worth and able to value high convictions. We enjoyed his companionship, his sincerity, and his solicitude as did many others, and we thank God for leaving His servant among us so long.

J.B.S. put his view of things very simply—"When I came into this world love was waiting for me, and when I go into the unseen world love will be waiting for me there as well."

From the time he came into the Church of Ireland he never wavered in his conviction that he had obeyed the Father's Will, and that sustained him well.

OUR LORD AND HIS MOTHER

(Continued from August)

Last month we gave the first part of a survey of the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and shewed that the objection to this dogma is that in 1950 it was made a belief necessary to salvation. Drawing information from the book entitled "The Glorious Assumption of the Mother of God", by the Rev. Joseph Duhr, S.J., we made an effort to summarise the historical situation which is that no evidence of the belief is found in the surviving Christian literature of early ages of the Church. This is, in fact, the answer to any claim that the belief rests on age-long tradition. Even if we agree with the Council of Trent that Holy Scripture and tradition are equal sources of religious truth we must accept that tradition here simply does not exist.

* * *

No matter what our views of the science of Mariology may be, we must demand real evidence, and not be content to have a late and doubtful opinion turned into a sound foundation for a necessary dogma. We are well aware that in certain places in the fifth century there was an annual celebration of "the Falling Asleep of the Blessed Virgin Mary". Falling asleep is a New Testament word, and is in no way linked with belief in a corporal assumption. We here in Ireland commemorate each year on the 17th day of March the falling asleep of St. Patrick—in no sense do we signify a belief that Patrick was taken up bodily into Heaven. "Falling asleep", then, has none of the implications which substantiate the dogma. We should be careful to resist any suggestion that evidence for a commemoration of the death of the Blessed Virgin is evidence of her Assumption. Further, the statement that she is in Heaven, which is found in ancient writings, is an obvious truth, but not to be taken as proving her bodily Assumption. St. Paul longed "to depart and to be with Christ": he is with Christ, and has been since a day in the first Christian century. We do not, however, deduce from that fact that his body must be with Christ as well. The immaterial and spiritual, not the carnal, abides for ever.

Anyway, for Fr. Duhr, evidence is not important. What the Church says now is conclusive for him. We have already quoted words of his which show his faith in "the true instinct of the Church" in defining the dogma. We think that instinct is a doubtful and anti-intellectual ground on which to base any dogmatic faith, and, in addition, we say that Revelation is a great factor in spiritual truth, and may never be displaced or undervalued in favour of an emotion, which is what we consider to be fruit of an instinct. Though Revelation does not, in this instance, contribute to the knowledge of the circumstances of the death of Our Lord's Mother, we refer to it to show that God has not left His people to acquire religious or spiritual knowledge by instinct.

* * *

We cannot follow Fr. Duhr in his view that "the flowering of Marian theology in subsequent ages grew out of the unfathomable mystery of the divine maternity". The concept of "the divine maternity" is not familiar to Protestants because it has no substantial place in the New Testament, and because it sets up too much of a parallel to the divine Paternity, the Fatherhood of God which is the vital aspect of the Divine nature Our Lord constantly dwelt on.

Some sixty years ago a Fr. Carson (an Irishman we believe) who was in charge of a Roman Catholic mission on the south coast of England, published a very valuable book with the title "Reunion Essays". He wished to set out Roman Catholic doctrines in a moderate and intellectually acceptable way. He sided, for instance, with the "minimisers" in regard to the Vatican Council's decree of papal infallibility, and did so, we believe, sincerely. In writing on the divine maternity of the Blessed Virgin he called the essay "the Maternity of God". In it he refers to the opinion "widespread among Catholics" that Mary is more capable of understanding their special needs than God the Creator. Their instinct tends to "relying on her mercy than on that of Jesus wearing the severity of a Judge, though He be God made man". Fr. Carson describes this as an "unchristian and untheological notion of Mary's maternity as a prerogative peculiar to her, given to us by Jesus from the Cross ("Son, behold thy mother")

This notion (a "distorted notion", Fr. Carson calls it) is described thus—"Mary is made out to be a goddess of love, compassion, tenderness, and sympathy. In her a woman's virtues are idealised, a woman's weaknesses and imperfections absent. She is considered to have attributes to which God is a stranger . . . she is, in one word, a mother, and that places her on a plane of a higher order than the humanity of Christ, or even the eternal fatherhood of God."

Fr. Carson then sets out the true idea of the nature and attributes of God— "... He has the perfections of womanhood in their completeness; He has also the perfections of manhood; the perfections of childhood are His with those of boyhood and girlhood . . . No creaturely perfection can bear comparison for a moment with the infinite Being containing all perfection . . ." He adds "this truth is still more apparent when we remember that everything in the universe owes its existence to God. He therefore possesses in Himself the being and the perfection which He shows forth in time by the work of creation."

"In Him 'all paternity is named' (Eph. 3, 13), and, can we doubt it? all maternity as well." We desist from quoting Fr. Carson further. We consider that he made a worthwhile contribution to Christian thought in expounding the true nature of God, and criticising the crude popular idea of the "divine maternity".

To dwell on the words of Our Lord to St. John, "Son, behold thy mother", is a good thing if we rightly understand the loving kindness implied and concentrate on Our Lord's concern for His mother—filial love was foremost in His mind even in the hours of agony on the Cross. But need we go beyond the plain sense of the words from the Cross? Need we say that in addressing St. John Our Lord was addressing all humanity and declaring all humanity's privileges and duties in relationship to His mother? We are quite well aware that certain fairly early Christian writers speak of the Blessed Virgin as "the second Eve"—this metaphorical or figurative language is well enough, but there is no obligation on Christians to treat it as if it were in a text of Holy Scripture. It seems to be a parallel in its own way to the truly Biblical teaching about Our Lord as "the second Adam". The fact that He is the second Adam has no bearing whatever upon the imagery which describes His mother as "the second Eve".

It is easy enough to see that if the first Eve is "the mother of all living", the "second Eve" may appear to some pious souls to be "the mother of all the redeemed". Yet this is a distinct error; a theory which has no basis in the Word of God.

* * *

Last month we referred to the sermons of the Dark Ages (or, as modern historians may prefer it, of the early Middle Ages). They and the liturgical observances of the time belong to so late a period that they are proof of nothing but fervid piety, and the peculiar emotional quality of much mediaeval religion.

* * *

Fr. Duhr gives us a quotation from Salomon of Sprinckirsbach, a mediaeval preacher, who comments on a liturgical prayer referring to Mary not being tied by the bonds of death—Salomon's words are, "If this is true it follows that death is conquered and she has ascended in glory with her body." This, as readers know, is the very language in which the evangelical preacher speaks of the triumph of Christ! This is what the true Catholic creeds declare of Our Lord and of no other.

It is frequently said of the Blessed Virgin that she "underwent the death of the body without being able to be held by the bonds of death." This sentence inevitably reminds us of what St. Peter said about Christ, "Whom God raised up, having loosed the pangs of death: because it was not possible that He should be holden of it." (Acts 2, 24).

* * *

We note that the schoolman St. Albert the Great (more than a thousand years after the death of the Blessed Virgin) taught the Assumption "and expounded the argument from its fitness". The argument from "fitness" is really not an argument at all. It has no ground in Revelation, and it has no intellectual value. To some minds there is universal fitness in "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust". The life of the soul is supernatural, but the life and death of the created body is natural, and the one exception, that of Our Lord, is due to His unique personality, purpose, and promise.

* * *

The abundant evidence given by Fr. Duhr that the corporal assumption was widely believed through the Middle Ages and into modern centuries cannot prove anything. We accept it as evidence of what people thought—no more. Let it be remembered that the same people never questioned many views about the Cosmos which are completely given up to-day. For them, the earth was the centre of the universe. So we cannot regard their beliefs as contributing anything evidential or confirmatory to the doctrine which at the very highest ought to remain an open question.

* * *

Some mediaeval teachers had curious ideas: Gabriel Biel is referred to as claiming that the corporal Assumption of Mary "maintains and strengthens our faith in the resurrection better than the victory of Jesus over death. For Jesus after all is God, while Mary is purely human". This is indeed an extraordinary argument, as we see it; for it suggests that a mere hypothesis, a pious opinion, is more convincing than the Word of Him Who said, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever . . . believeth in Me shall never die" (John 11, 25).

* * *

By the time of the Reformation the Assumption was commonly held to be a doctrine no one could doubt or deny without "rashness". We assume that the theological definition of rashness must carry the idea that doubting may be mistaken, for the matter doubted may turn out to be true. We do in fact throughout life doubt, deny, or abide in ignorance of, many things which are true, or which may be true. But we are now challenged in this dogma of the Assumption with the claim that our doubt, denial, or ignorance will involve our damnation. Of course we may answer "if we knew it was true we would believe it." This answer, however, is met by the statement that the infallible voice of the Church has declared it to be true, so there is no longer obscurity, ambiguity, or excuse for delay. Our refuge then is to admit honestly that we are invincibly ignorant. We are, for we cannot believe that there are any other conditions of eternal salvation than those made plain in the Word of God.

* * *

Fr. Duhr, drawing near his conclusions, makes this statement: "In the course of our exposition the reader has been able to note that Holy Scripture holds but a secondary place in the argumentation of the Fathers and theologians." We have ourselves referred to the fact that New Testament witness could not state the fact of the death of the Blessed Virgin Mary if she was still living when they wrote. Yet it may also be taught that as she was many years older than the apostles, she had died before some of them wrote. But when we consider how little is told about her (after the Nativity) it is plain that the Holy Spirit did not guide the sacred writers to write about her.

The paucity of information in the New Testament has led some Roman Catholic students to interpret some passages of the Old Testament as prophetic or descriptive of Our Lord's Mother. This is a feature of Mariology, and is usual in the text books and magazines. There is, in addition, a verse in the Revelation of St. John the Divine which is often given as connected with the Blessed Virgin (the woman clothed with the Sun—ch. 12. 1). But the soundest commentators on the Book of Revelation have another interpretation. No one, we suppose, will disagree with Fr. Duhr when he writes—"Scripture, even with the comments of the Fathers, does not seem to give us a true proof of Mary's great privilege." The privilege here is not of course the human Motherhood of the Redeemer, but the Assumption. We agree with our authors that "the principal support of belief in the Assumption is the conviction of the Church."

* * *

We have tried to give a sober account of the dogma as expounded by Fr. Duhr. It is important to understand what Roman Catholic scholars say about their Church's teaching and to pay due attention to their Creed. As evangelical Christians we need to give a candid reason for our stand, a reason which is sensible and spiritual. We need also to be satisfied that what we believe is what God wants us to believe; and that what we disbelieve is what God does not require us to believe.

Our position is, we hope, a simple one. The one basis of saving truth God has given us, with guarantees that we can trust it, is His Word. If we believe what God has set His seal to, we have all the truth we need. All the conditions of eternal life are clearly stated in the New Testament, and no man, generally speaking, need be unaware of them. How can a dogma which only became a dogma in 1950, or 1870, or 1854 be necessary to salvation? Are no Christians who died before 1950 safe? Is it satisfactory to say that "if they had known they would have believed"? Is "implicit faith" an answer to all such problems? What about all who lived and died, before Rome's infallibility was claimed, in the days when men were content with the ecumenical Creed of Nicaea? They could condemn more than one bishop of Rome as a heretic, for no infallible voice was heard in their day. We return to the safe anchorage of the soul in life and death—the written Word tells us all we need to know—the Gospel is there complete.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.

The Fatherhood of God is the most familiar thought in the Christian view of Deity. We see in the Scriptures of the Old Testament an occasional insight into the reality of the Divine Fatherhood but we may compare it to the faint light of dawn when contrasted with the noon-day sun of the revelation brought to us by our Redeemer. The name "Father" came to Our Lord's lips instinctively and spontaneously. He had not to train Himself to think of God as Father: He had eternal familiarity with "Our Father which art in heaven."

* * *

We think that the earliest instance of Our Lord's reference to God as Father must be the one recorded by St. Luke (ch. 2. 49), "Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?" It was the occasion in His boyhood when He lingered in the Temple instead of accompanying His mother and Joseph on the return to Nazareth. From the beginning of His active public ministry He employed this name for the Eternal God though many of His hearers must have thought that a less homely and more austere title might be more fitting. Indeed on at least one occasion resentment and recrimination were strong, for we read in the gospel of St. John (ch. 5. 18), "The Jews sought to kill Him, because He not only broke the Sabbath, but also called God His own Father, making Himself equal with God." Incidentally, this charge against Him was the true significance of the filial relationship. We wonder if "Jehovah's Witnesses" are not compelled by their own logic to agree with the Jews.

* * *

A look at any fairly full Concordance (for instance, the larger editions of Cruden, if Strong or Young are not available), will show a very interesting fact. We open Eadie's edition of Cruden which is always at hand, and count up Our Lord's use of the name Father—according to it in the Gospel of St. Matthew are four references. In St. Mark are two references. In St. Luke are five; but in St. John are over fifty references. This is the Gospel in which it is recorded that Our Lord said, "I and the Father are one," and its author, as we know, begins, by stating that "the Word was God", and that "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory". How justly the Gospel of St. John comments on that charge laid against Our Lord that He made Himself equal with God—"Of course He did, because in His eternal personality He was.

* * *

We spoke of the faint traces of the awareness of the Divine Fatherhood among the people of the Old Testament: The Psalmists express the relationship as symbolic—"A father of the fatherless is God in His holy habitation" (68. 5), "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him" (103, 13).

There is a passage of peculiar splendour and graciousness in the prophet Jeremiah (31, 1-14) in which we read, "Thus saith the Lord . . . 'I am a father to Israel'." In Malachi (1. 6) the Lord of Hosts rebukes the priests who pervert His ordinances—"If I be a father, where is My honour?" Apart from these there is little else in the Old Testament to prepare us for the wonderful unfolding of the parental affection of God for His people; the individual and the community. Even though it is said that the later Jews were inclined to use the name Jehovah less frequently than their forefathers, they did not use the name "Father", but "the God of heaven", as for example, in Ezra, and Daniel. Hence we are justified in regarding the title "Father" as a remarkable contribution to our understanding of God in His relationship to the people of His creation and choice. It is the bond of the Divine—human fellowship, and Our Lord thus fulfils the task described by St. John—"No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him."

* * *

Now that we joyfully accept the Fatherly relationship of Jehovah and His people "all that are afar off; as many as the Lord our God shall call" we need not be impressed by any reference to the heathen description of Jupiter, "the father of Gods and men", because the heathen poets who used the phrase meant it in a physical sense, and their legends and nonsensical stories bear this out. The God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ bears a relationship of spiritual Fatherhood, totally different.

* * *

What are the characteristics of the Divine Fatherhood in Christ towards us? On at least ten occasions the Apostle Paul tells us in simple words—Our Father extends to us "Grace, peace, and mercy." Love too, as we expect, e.g. "Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. 6. 23).

Grace, peace, mercy, love! What unmeasurable riches of the spirit are here expressed! The more we turn these words over in our minds and think about them, the more their all-comprehending spiritual power unfolds itself to us. They are the keywords of Christian faith and of Christian theology. We doubt if they are found so vitally placed in any other religion.

How are these supreme elements in our faith applied practically to our need? We employ this phrase because we are often tempted to supply an abstract definition of God as though we were philosophers. As Christians, living, or trying to live, a Christian life in conditions which often make it hard to do so, we need something different from abstractions. We need to translate "Grace" into workaday experience: we need to possess peace in our souls and not merely to have the capacity to talk about it: we must penetrate through the often grim actualities of life to discern the mercy which is not always on the surface: mercy and love belong to far more than the brief span and outward circumstance of earthly life. We have eternity, so let us not ignore the words of the much-enduring St. Paul—"Our light affliction, which is for the moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. 4, 17). How then are we to look at these practical expressions of the Fatherhood of God? We put forward some New Testament facts which give the answer.

* * *

1. The parable of the prodigal son, and the parable of the merciless creditor teach something about forgiveness, and Our Lord taught us, in the Lord's prayer, to ask for forgiveness. The Psalmist might say of God, "There is forgiveness with Thee that Thou mayest be feared", but ought not the Christian to put it this way, "There is forgiveness with Thee that Thou mayest be loved"? Forgiveness is something we can understand; and we can admit the duty of forgiving and exercise it ourselves. Fatherly forgiveness has its own unique quality. In it there is a measure of faith, hope, understanding, patience, love, rehabilitation, confidence. If these qualities are in us there is plainly something of God Himself in us, and the divine image is not obliterated. The knowledge that God forgives us, or better, has forgiven us (the tenses are not insignificant), ought to create in us the disposition to forgive. Are there not obligations following upon the message of the beloved disciple, "I write unto you because your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake"? (1 John 2. 12).

* * *

2. If God has no pleasures in the death of the wicked (Ezekiel 18, 23), He can have no purpose to consign the penitent and forgiven, i.e. the redeemed, to eternal death. His purpose for them is eternal life. In this the Father is sharing His eternal home and inheritance and riches with His children. Our Lord came as our elder brother to tell us of all that is in store for us—"In My Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you: I go to prepare a place for you, . . . that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14. 3).

3. Sonship is a well-known New Testament condition of the Christian. By adoption and grace it is ours. This may be more simply put by saying it is the Father's gift and will that we should possess eternally the privileges of sons and daughters of God. Sonship is not a static condition. It ranges from the dependence of the infant to the equal partnership of the mature adult. In the realm of the spirit we may reach the status of being fellow-workers with God. After we are clothed upon with immortality the extent of our fellow-work may be illimitable—"Our fellowship (even here) is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ" (1 John 1. 3). That is true because we are not bond servants, but sons—"because ye are sons God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts" (Gal. 4. 6).

* * *

4. Prayer. The filial relationship ought to transform prayer. Without Sonship prayer may well be importunity, wheedling or begging. It may be servile; and a deep contrast with the true approach to Our Father. The Redeemer has assured us of the Father's readiness to hear as well as of the son's right to ask. Can we not say truthfully that a son's right to ask is only limited by the wisdom of the Father. The Father does not accept or reject on the ground of caprice.

It is easy to recall the many lessons in prayer which Our Lord taught, e.g. "Ask and ye shall have." "Ye ask and receive not because ye ask amiss" is a saying which St. James probably quotes from Our Lord. The à fortiori lesson that if we give good gifts to our children the Father will assuredly give the Holy Spirit to them that ask is a notable instance of paternal solicitude.

The Lord's Prayer is of course the supreme prayer of sonship and fatherhood. It is of such a nature that it is well-nigh a universal prayer, and expresses the longing of all sorts of men to find peace, strength, nurture and fellowship with the Creator. We ought not to seek to give an exclusive interpretation to the Lord's Prayer—let it have the widest use, and let us give it the richest and fullest meaning.

* * *

5. The Fatherhood of God involves the true thought of unity, for the divine fatherhood creates a family relationship. The unity of the family is a fitting symbol of the unity of God's people. It is a unity which allows freedom and diversity. No one should want uniformity. A family in which the father insisted on uniformity of dress, behaviour, outlook, opinion, would no longer be a family: it would have become a platoon.

When we think of unity we must first of all think of our unity with Father, Son and Holy Spirit; and then we make the right approach to unity as a family with our fellow-Christians. It is fairly generally understood now that religious unity is not collective submission to spiritual dictatorships, but is a free association in deliberate response to the leading of the Spirit and the Father's Will. We may remember that Our Lord prayed that His people might be one in the way in which He and the Father are one. That means, we conclude, a family and filial unity. Such a unity is not to be enforced by tyrannies or compulsions. The big in this world are not to dominate the small, (and the small should not assume that they are small because they are right). The Christian family may be one in loving recognition that whether big or small, learned or simple, white or black, they are God's children. That is the only really substantial and true basis for unity.

* * *

6. The Father's protection and mercy are matters for contemplation and thanksgiving. But here there are mysteries at the moment insoluble. The enormous and protracted load of suffering, torment, and misery experienced by millions of our fellow-men and women in recent years must challenge our faith. No Christian will callously dismiss the problem by saying that it was deserved. We ought not to content ourselves either by describing such experiences as divine punishments. What we need for ourselves is the faith which says, "Though He slay me, I will trust Him." We need the faith which recognises no uninterrupted continuance of sunny days, but is prepared for hard weather, storm, and earthquake. In regard to others and what they endure, let us admit the mystery of suffering: let us deny or dismiss no facts, but in patience and submission trust God and remember the Saviour's words, "In the world ye shall have tribulation." The world is not what we would like it to be, and Our Lord's direction to keep on praying "Thy Kingdom come" is plain evidence that the Kingdom is not here yet. The Christian must pray, and sympathise and relieve where possible. What Christ said of the men on whom the tower fell in Siloam is a permanent lesson for us. The problem or mystery will remain for the present age, but we can wait with confidence for the future glory.

* * *

7. Glory is a condition of blessing and transformation which fits the nature of man for the heavenly life and fellowship. It is a word in frequent use, but often its meaning is not analysed. In the Old Testament it often means excellency or pre-eminence—the exaltation of God Himself, or of His servants above others. In the New Testament it has the same thought of distinctiveness, and a deeper quality, a quality of radiance (which is often symbolised in Christian art by the "halo").

Some writers see in God's "glory" in the Bible a reference to His qualities and attributes which call forth awe and admiration. Others may deduce from Holy Scripture a sharing of God's glory with His family, so that the glory of His redeemed people is the fact of the Father's love for them. Above all, and in a unique sense, the glory of the people of God is our Redeemer—the Son of God taking our nature and becoming one with us.

* * *

So, the Gospel of the Divine Fatherhood is the inner truth of the Christian faith. The entire fulfilment of our Redemption and new Birth is the fruit of the Father's love. For this we have the best of all testimonies, the Word and the victory of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

USELESS KINDS OF RELIGION

By the late Rev. John Charles Ryle, D.D.
Lord Bishop of Liverpool

There are two ways by which a man may lose his own soul. What are they?

He may lose his soul by living and dying without any religion at all. He may live and die like a beast; prayerless, godless, graceless, faithless. This is a sure way to hell. Mind that you do not walk in it.

He may lose his soul by taking up some kind of religion. He may live and die contenting himself with a false Christianity, and resting on a baseless hope. This is the commonest way to hell there is.

What do I mean by useless kinds of religion? I will tell you.

The first thing I wish to say is this. A religion is entirely useless in which Jesus Christ is not the principal object, and does not fill the principal place.

There are only too many baptised men and women who practically know nothing about Christ. Their religion consists in a few vague notions and empty expressions. "They trust that they are no worse than others; they keep to their Church; they try to do their duty; they do nobody any harm; they hope God will be merciful to them! they trust the Almighty will pardon their sins, and take them to heaven when they die." This is about the whole of their religion.

But what do these people know practically about Christ? Nothing: nothing at all! What experimental acquaintance have they with His offices and work, His blood, His righteousness, His mediation, His priesthood, His intercession? None: none at all! Ask them about a saving faith—ask them about being born again of the Spirit—ask them about being sanctified in Christ Jesus. What answer will you get? You are a barbarian to them. You have asked them simple Bible questions; but they know no more about them experimentally than a Buddhist or a Turk.

And yet this is the religion of hundreds and thousands of people who are called Christians, all over the world.

If you are a man of this kind, I warn you plainly that such Christianity will never take you to heaven. It may do very well in the eyes of men; it may pass muster very decently at the vestry-meeting, in the place of business, in the House of Commons, or in the streets: but it will never comfort you; it will never satisfy your conscience; it will never save your soul.

I warn you plainly, that all notions and theories about God being merciful without Christ, and excepting through Christ, are baseless delusions and empty fancies. Such theories are as purely an idol of man's invention as the idol of the Juggernaut. They are all of the earth, earthy: they never came down from heaven. The God of heaven has sealed and appointed Christ as the one and only Saviour and way of life, and all who would be saved must be content to be saved by Him, or they will never be saved at all.

I give you fair warning. A religion without Christ will never save your soul.

But I have yet another thing to say. A religion is entirely useless in which you join anything with Christ in the matter of saving your soul. You must not only depend on Christ for salvation, but you must depend on Christ only and Christ alone.

There are multitudes of baptised men and women who profess to honour Christ, but in reality do Him great dishonour. They give Christ a certain place in their system of religion, but not the place which God intended Him to fill. Christ alone is not "all in all" to their souls. No: it is either Christ and the Church; or Christ and the Sacraments; or Christ and His ordained ministers; or Christ and their own goodness; or Christ and their own prayers; or Christ and their own sincerity and charity, on which they practically rest their souls.

If you are a Christian of this kind I warn you also plainly that your religion is an offence to God. You are changing God's plan of salvation into a plan of your own devising. You are, in effect, deposing Christ from His throne, by giving the glory due to Him to another.

I care not who it is that teaches you your religion and on whose word you build. Whether he be Pope or Cardinal, Archbishop or Bishop, Dean or Archdeacon, Episcopalian or Presbyterian, Baptist or Independent, Methodist or Plymouth Brother—whosoever adds anything to Christ, teaches you wrong.

I care not what it is that you add to Christ. Whether it be the necessity of joining the Church of Rome, or of being an Episcopalian, or of becoming a Free Churchman, or of giving up liturgy, or of being dipped—whatever you may practically add to Christ in the matter of salvation, you do Christ an injury.

Take heed what you are doing. Beware of giving to Christ's servants the honour due to none but Christ. Beware of giving the Lord's ordinances the honour due unto the Lord. Beware of resting the burden of your soul on anything but Christ, and Christ alone. Beware of having a religion which is of no use, and cannot save.

It is an awful thing to have no religion at all. To have an immortal soul committed to your charge, and neglect it, this is dreadful.

But it is no less an awful thing to be content with a religion that can do you no good.

Do not let this be your case.

THE STORY OF A PRIEST— THE REV. RICHARD BALMACEA

In Ireland we hear little of the Philippine islands, though we know that they are in the far East; a great group of islands in the Pacific Ocean. We know also that they were for a long time part of the Spanish empire, but were taken from Spain by the United States after the Spanish-American War of some sixty years ago.

When the Philippines were under Spanish rule the Christian faith (as the Spaniards understood it) was propagated by some orders of friars, and a fair proportion of the native peoples eventually adhered to the Roman Catholic faith: the rest are Mohammedan and pagan. When American rule began a more liberal atmosphere was created, and evangelical missionaries were comparatively successful among the non-Christians. There was also a substantial break-away from Rome under the leadership of an influential priest. His followers, numbering, we have heard, many hundreds of thousands, at length entered into fellowship with the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States which has a bishop and a number of congregations in the islands.

Thus the Philippine people as they became more educated and enlightened under American paternal government were enabled to realise that there are other expressions of Christianity than the one they inherited from the Spaniards. There are different Protestant Churches, and an ample field of work and witness available to all of them.

* * *

Since the Second World War the Philippines have become an independent republic like the former Dutch East Indian empire, their nearest neighbour. We understand that the Philippine government recognises religious liberty and freedom to evangelise. While there are probably a thousand Philipinos who are Roman Catholic priests, there are also many ex-priests. Some of these are ex-priests because of unsuitability, but others are ex-priests because they have found a simpler and more evangelical faith. Such a one is Richard Balmaceda.

Balmaceda was educated first by the Fathers of the Society of the Divine Word, and then by the Dominican Fathers in the philosophical faculty, from which he received a licentiate-ship in philosophy (this qualification is, we suppose, rather like an M.A. degree).

He was a diligent student, and anxious to equip himself for refuting Protestant arguments because at the period of his studies Protestant propaganda was active in the province where he lived. When his training was completed he entered the priesthood, being ordained in 1938. Quite early in his sacerdotal career he engaged in controversy with Protestant pastors, and in various parishes where he worked as an assistant curate he kept this up. He had the added incentive that the Protestants seemed to him to be American outsiders. He would probably not have thought that a few generations earlier the Spaniards were outsiders and intruders!

Public or private discussions with Protestant teachers and students went on intermittently over the long period of twenty years during which Fr. Balmaceda laboured in different parishes. He steadily tried, he says, to investigate Protestant claims and arguments in order to refute them, and this need made him an industrious student of the Book from which the Protestants drew their teaching. His professional text-books were less helpful than he had anticipated.

* * *

As he studied the saving purpose of God, and the means thereto became clearer and clearer—"Believe in Christ" became the plain necessity, for Christ Himself said, "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

As the years went by he became more and more dissatisfied. This may be the experience of many in the priesthood, but the force of habit; the accustomed conventions; the shrinking from a radical upheaval of life, combine to impose an apathy of spirit. An intellectual and spiritual standstill results.

But Fr. Balmaceda was not discouraged. As truths of Scripture dawned upon him he enquired after more knowledge, and at length he came into touch with Christ's Mission, New York. This society of former Roman Catholic clergymen helped him greatly, and he was able to reach the decision to leave his work as a Roman Catholic curate. Like the Rev. Thomas Connellan in similar circumstances (see "Hear the Other Side", Thomas Connellan's autobiography, obtainable from this office), Fr. Balmaceda disappeared from view, and with the aid of friends settled in a distant city and in fellowship with evangelical Christians became fully convinced of the personal salvation we have in Christ. He realised that Our Lord Jesus Christ is the only Teacher, and the Word of God is the sole arbiter of our faith. He abandoned the traditional infallibilities and turned to the teaching of the New Testament as the sufficient revelation of truth.

* * *

We note with interest that an important branch of learning which led to a decision was the study of Church history—it raised the problems of the authentic successions of popes, of religious persecution, of apostolic poverty and ecclesiastical wealth. It gave him an insight into the origin and development of ritualism and legalism. He perceived that religion was top-heavy with non-essentials. The present reality of the redeeming power of the blood of Christ became all-sufficient, and Fr. Balmaceda was free.

We hope that his labours in the evangelical ministry, if that is what God calls him to, may be greatly blessed. In whatever state of life he continues we may be sure that he knows where to look for the necessary grace, for at length he has tasted the good wine of the Gospel.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 97.

family is a ground for divorce—if that member happens to belong to the Socialist Unity party and to believe in dialectical materialism.

An Easy Formula

Another easy formula for political divorce is "interfering with the political and economic progress of the People's Democratic State." This can cover a multitude of sins, from failing to put a husband's carpet slippers out for him to arguing with him over the logic of contributing his savings to party funds. Even more sweeping is "the marriage has been judged to have lost all social content."

A good example of what may happen in a divorce case was supplied recently by a Stralsund court. It found a mother guilty of having forced her children to go to church, of calling Marxist-Leninism a "false ideology", and of refusing to instil a proper sense of democracy into her children. In this case the plaintiff—who happened to be the mother—was divorced from her husband, who had in fact already deserted her. But the wife had to pay the costs of the case and was informed that, as a working woman, she would contribute 70 marks a month for the upkeep of the children, custody of them being given to her Marxist-Leninist husband.

Checked by Western Court

An equally revealing case was brought before the Federal High Court in Karlsruhe for revision last month. A Stuttgart dentist travelled to the East German town of Sommeria and took a temporary job as a panel dentist there. After three months he sued his wife for desertion and was granted a divorce in Sommeria. While the case was being heard, the dentist visited his Stuttgart practice in Western Germany in order to make sure it was being properly run by his assistant. A few weeks later he returned to Stuttgart and resumed his practice. Shortly afterwards he paid a visit to Sommeria in order to get married there, returning immediately afterwards to Stuttgart.

The Federal High Court has ruled that the use of Eastern Germany as a larger Reno for divorce purposes is not legal. The Stuttgart dentist is now a bigamist in Western Germany and a properly married man in Eastern Germany.

—"Manchester Guardian", June 10, '59.

* * *

Facts and Figures

South Korea

Protestants in South Korea now number 1,323,091. The breakdown of the larger groups is as follows: 864,262 Presbyterians; 345,685 Methodists; 45,500 Seventh-Day Adventists; 27,076 Salvation Army; 17,116 Baptists.

Africa

One out of every three Africans is Moslem. This makes a total for the continent of about 65 to 70 million. There are possibly 30 million Christians counting all groups that profess any relationship to Christianity. There are about 12 million included in the Protestant Christian community.

* * *

New Sayings of Jesus

"Comparable in importance to the Dead Sea Scrolls and of even greater significance to students of the New Testament." That is how visiting Swiss Theologian, Oscar Cullmann ("Time", Mar 23), described the subject of his lecture at Manhattan's Union Theological Seminary last week.

Lutheran Cullman was giving the public a first detailed and fascinating report on the so-called Gospel of St. Thomas, one of 44 Coptic manuscripts in leatherbound papyrus books found in 1946 in a tomb in upper Egypt some 60 miles from the city of Luxor.

Common denominator of this treasure-trove is Gnosticism, a potent heresy of Christianity's early days, which interpreted Jesus' life and teaching as an esoteric message of salvation directed to an elite equipped with secret knowledge. As such, most of the manuscripts are interesting mainly to scholars. But the Gospel of St. Thomas has a special concern and fascination for all Christians, for it is a 3rd or 4th century collection of 114 "sayings of Jesus" that dates back to a Greek manuscript from the first half of the 2nd century—within 50 years of the Gospels themselves. Such compilations of quotes, set down without any connecting narrative, were used, modern scholars believe, by the authors of canonical Scripture.

Beatitudes and Parables

Some of the sayings are word-for-word versions of material in the four canonical Gospels, some are variations of the Gospel versions, some are quotations from Jesus known only through the writings of the early church fathers, and some are completely unknown. The word-for-word repetitions include the sayings about the mote and the beam, the blind leading the blind, that which is hidden and must be revealed, the prophet not without honour save in his own country, "to him that has shall be given," leaving one's father and mother to follow Jesus, and some of the Beatitudes, e.g., the poor having the kingdom of heaven. Many parables are also included: the sower, the thief in the night, the tares, the mustard seed, the marriage feast, the wicked tenants, the pearl, the hidden treasure.

Dr. Cullmann cited two examples of Christ's sayings found both in the Gospel of St. Thomas and the church fathers: (1) "He who is near me is near the fire, and he who is far from me is far from the kingdom"; (2) "Split a piece of wood—I am there; lift the stone and you will find me there."

Among the sayings hitherto unknown:

"Jesus said: If those who lead you say to you: Behold, the kingdom is in heaven, then the birds of heaven will precede you; if they say to you that it is in the sea, then the fish will precede you. But the kingdom is within you and it is outside of you."

"Mary said to Jesus: Who are your disciples like? He said: They are like small children who have settled in a field which is not theirs. When the owners of the field come, they will say: Leave our field to us. They are completely naked in their presence, and so they will leave it to them and give them their field."

"Jesus said: The kingdom of the Father is like a man who wanted to kill an important person: he drew his sword in his house, he pierced it through the wall to see if his hand would be steady; then he killed the important person."

Unknown and Genuine

Will the newly found "Gospel" (scheduled to be published soon by Professor Henri-Charles Puech of the College de France, and colleagues) affect the New Testament? No, answers Theologian Cullmann: The collection "was rightly not included in the New Testament." His reason: It includes "obviously Gnostic material," and apparently was compiled by a Gnostic who arbitrarily put the collection under the authority of the Apostle Thomas.* Says Cullmann: "Our four canonical Gospels are the only ones on which we can rely. Again and again we must marvel at the fact that from the large number of primitive Christian writings only those were accepted as canonical which really came from the oldest time and which were free from heretical tendencies.

"On the other hand, it is possible for previously unknown and yet genuine sayings of Jesus to be found in other documents which are not in the canon, sayings which, even when they bring no fundamentally new revelation, are capable of enriching and furthering our understanding of the canonical gospel."

*Doubting Thomas, the disciple who is best known for his verification of Jesus' resurrection by touching the wounds in his hands (John 20: 25-28), was a favourite of Gnostic writers, who attributed to him extensive missionary journeys in Persia and India. The Mar Thoma Church in southern India claims him as its founder.

—"Time".

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

		s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.

BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland and
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 10—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	109
Hebrew Christians	111
Aspects of Prayer	112
Editor's Chair	114
Reviews	117

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Brazil—The Most Roman Catholic Country?

There is currently considerable debate in this country as to whether Brazil or the U.S. deserves the title of the biggest Catholic nation in the world. Gustavo Corcao, writer and Roman Catholic lay leader, denies that Brazil should have the title, which it has often been given. In an article published in "O Estado de Sao Paulo" (the State of Sao Paulo), he argues that although 93.7 per cent. of the Brazilian population is listed as Roman Catholic, less than 10 per cent. are practising Catholics. As proof of his statement he cites the "miserably" low number of young men entering the priesthood, and the fact that there are only about 7,000 priests for 50 million Roman Catholics. Corcao concludes that if Brazil is the biggest Catholic nation it must have the most "Bad Catholics". He explains that the method of classification (counting as Catholic everyone who has been baptized in that church) causes confusion. In this country, he says, baptism is more a social tradition than a religious ceremony.

In another article published in the same newspaper, Corcao writes that the U.S. should be dubbed the biggest Roman Catholic country. The basis for his statement, frequently quoted here, is that the U.S. has 30 million "conscious Catholics" while no single Protestant denomination has nearly that number. In rebuttal, Protestant leaders point out that the Roman Catholic figure includes children and the Protestant statistics do not, and that the various denominations are all part of "one Protestantism".

—(Quoted in "The Vigilant".)

(These details are interesting as Brazil is a country of enormous potentiality. Brazil to-day has large and steadily expanding evangelical churches, and Gospel work is rapidly growing).

* * *

Canada—Fewer Italians, Please

Canada's longtime aim in regulating immigration is to increase the population without diluting the British strain below its present 48%. This policy has no warmer proponent than Immigration Minister, Ellen Fairclough, a member of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and a descendant of a family of United Empire Loyalists who fled the American Revolution to remain under British rule in Canada. So to Minister Fairclough, the 1958 immigration statistics were frankly disturbing. For the first time since World War II, Britons failed to contribute the largest share of immigrants; they were outnumbered by Italians, 28,564 to 26,622.

"It seems that immigrants from Italy," said Minister Fairclough, "immediately they come to this land, want to bring out their brothers and sisters and other relatives." To put a brake on this Italian custom and help restore the old immigration pattern, the Cabinet last week adopted an order-in-council suspending the free immigration of Canadian residents' non-dependent relatives from Italy—not to mention the rest of Continental Europe (except France), Lebanon, Israel and Latin America.

—(From "the Vigilant")

* * *

United States of America—Churchgoing

Last year set a new record for churchgoing in the U.S., and the churchgoingest part of the country was the Midwest, the Gallup Poll reports. During an average 1958 week, more than 50 million U.S. adults went to church—nearly a million more than at the previous peak in 1955. This represents 54 per cent. of the population in the Midwest, 52 per cent. of the East, 51 per cent. of the South, and only 35 per cent. of the Far West. Roman Catholics, for whom weekly Mass is obligatory were more regular than Protestants. But the Protestant showing compares favourably with Britain (nearly 80 per cent.

Protestant), where only 14 per cent. of the adults said they had attended church on the Sunday preceding the survey.

The latest analysis of the religious composition of New York's metropolitan area, published this week by the city's Protestant Council, gives dramatic evidence of the decline of the once-preponderant white Protestants in Manhattan and vicinity. In 22 counties of the metropolitan area (reaching into New Jersey and Connecticut), 29.5 per cent. of the population is Roman Catholic, 18 per cent. Jewish and 15.9 per cent. Protestant; 2.2 per cent. is listed as "other", and 34.4 per cent. is unaffiliated. More than 55 per cent. of the city's estimated 960,000 Protestant church members are nonwhite. Among the nonwhites, the council, in an odd ethnological stance, listed 440,000 Negroes and almost 90,000 Puerto Ricans.

—(Time, January 12, 1959)

* * *

Australia — Pro-Roman Catholic Migration "Unchristian"

The secretary of the National Catholic Rural Movement (Mr. B. A. Santamaria) said it would be un-Christian and inimical to the interests of Australia for Roman Catholics to seek a migration policy designed to establish a Roman Catholic majority in this country.

A questioner asked him if the movement should urge a policy of migration which would enable the movement to have a stronger voice in a now predominantly Protestant country.

The question referred to earlier remarks by Mr. Santamaria about the necessity of raising the migration quota from a "hypothetical 100,000 a year to a real 300,000," and accepting Asian migrants.

Mr. Santamaria answered: "When you are facing the vital question of survival, and you are not able to get migrants from Europe, you take everybody you can get—young or old, rich or poor, healthy or sick, Catholic or Protestant.

"I believe that for Catholics to adopt any other policy would not only be un-Christian and inimical to the interests of Australia, but would whip up flames of sectarianism already sufficiently high in this country."

—("The Vigilant")

(This is a welcome recognition that a sectarian immigration policy can be of no benefit to the Commonwealth).

Strong Support for Plan to Merge I.M.C. with World Council

The proposal to unite the World Council of Churches and the International Missionary Council in a single body was approved in principle on Tuesday by the World Council's Central Committee, which is meeting on the Island of Rhodes. The only substantial opposition to the proposed merger came from the Eastern Orthodox members of the Committee.

The I.M.C. developed from the Edinburgh Missionary Conference of 1910, and was constituted in 1921. The World Council came into being in 1948.

The two bodies already work in close co-operation, and have a common secretariat for East Asia. A standing joint committee provides for regular consultation and planning.

Principle Accepted

The question of the future relationship of the two bodies was a major item on the agenda at the I.M.C. Assembly at Accra in January, 1958. A draft plan of integration was considered, and the Assembly resolved, by fifty-eight votes to seven, to accept integration in principle.

The Central Committee of the World Council, as a result of Tuesday's decision, has now entrusted the W.C.C.-I.M.C. Joint Committee with the task of working out plans for integration.

Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen of New York, chairman of the W.C.C.-I.M.C. Joint Committee, had earlier told the Central Committee that forty-four out of the 173 W.C.C. member Churches had already indicated support of the plan. At the same time twenty-two of the thirty-eight national Christian councils in the International Missionary Council had responded favourably.

Two W.C.C. member Churches had voted in opposition to the plan. These were the French Reformed Church and the Church of Ireland. The remainder of the W.C.C.'s 173 member Churches had not yet replied.

Final Action in 1961

Three national Christian councils affiliated to the I.M.C. were opposed to integration. They were in Norway, Belgium and Brazil. The Congo council had withdrawn from the I.M.C. because of its opposition. Twelve councils had not yet replied.

Draft forms of a constitution for the integrated body were submitted to the Central Committee for review by member Churches during the coming year. A revised constitution will be submitted for adoption at sessions of the Central Committee next year. The I.M.C. is also expected to endorse the revised constitutional drafts in August of next year.

Final action on the scheme will be voted at the first session of the W.C.C.'s third Assembly, scheduled to take place in India in late 1961. At that time the new constitution will need a two-thirds majority endorsement by members of both bodies before it becomes official. If it is adopted, the Assembly will then be convened as a meeting of the integrated organisation.

Dr. Van Dusen's report touched off a sharp debate, in which Eastern Orthodox representatives expressed strong opposition to the proposed integration. The Metropolitan James of Philadelphia, representing the Œcumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, urged the World Council "to remain what it is—a Council of Churches."

Anxieties Remain

He said that Eastern Orthodoxy wished to be "positive and helpful" and to maintain its membership in the World Council, but that "our fears remain". The Eastern Orthodox Church hesitated because the I.M.C. included members which were not Churches, and integration might mean that the World Council's missionary witness would be a non-Church witness. "Can there be any witness apart from a Church or confession?" asked the Metropolitan.

Professor Basil Ioannidis, of the Greek Orthodox Church, urged that the World Council should move slowly, because integration would result in a mammoth organisation which would be difficult to interpret. He claimed that the eleven-year-old World Council was still not understood by its own member Churches and people.

Fear of "Mission"

Bishop Lesslie Newbigin, general secretary of the I.M.C., said that the entire budget of the I.M.C. amounted to less than half the extra sum needed to finance the new united body.

The Metropolitan Parthenios of Carthage, representing the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria, Egypt, declared: "For us Orthodox the word 'mission' is something which we fear. I don't know why. It's my tradition. For this reason I say to you 'go slowly'."

It is believed that behind the formal Orthodox objections lies a constant fear that integration might help Western Christian bodies to proselytise in areas where Orthodoxy

HEBREW CHRISTIANS

Hebrew Christians in Europe are honestly trying to help both the Church and Israel, the former to a new and clearer understanding of her Jewish root and Jerusalem as her only rightful mother, the latter to the recognition of their Jewish Messiah, through all the fog of man-made usages and institutions. They will argue that both Israel and the Church have grievously sinned against the light given to them and will include themselves in that responsibility and guilt, thus creating a further aspect of fellowship. Being at once Jews and Christians, they dare not make the mistake of taking from both sides whatever they like and dismissing what they dislike, but accept the heritage of both, glory and shame alike, and seek to turn them into a new attitude in order to help both their brethren after the flesh and those after the Spirit. Not only the Goyim have failed, but Hebrew Christians as well, for they embody all that is good and bad from their Jewish and Christian backgrounds and have entered into their history of failures and mistakes.

Our brethren often sigh under the strain of that twofold responsibility and burden, which is all the heavier as they have to pass it on to the next generation. For every duty the ordinary Christian has to perform the Hebrew Christian seems to have two, and this ought to make him look with sympathy upon those who try to evade that dual burden by assimilating completely to a Gentile church. Their attitude is understandable; they refuse to be reminded of their Jewish past and will sometimes go the length of denying their Jewish background altogether. All the Hebrew Christian believer can do is to point out to them that their Jewish cradle or descent was no coincidence. God knew exactly why He placed them there, showing them all the riches of Moses and the prophets and then revealed to them the fulfilment of our people's hopes in the Messiah. On other occasions a similar attitude of patient understanding has to be applied to Gentile friends who seem to have forgotten that the Church is the true offspring of Israel and cannot live without drawing its sap from Israel. One cannot leave them to their ignorance, but has to explain and teach, even at the risk of being looked upon with suspicion. If some Hebrew Christians went too far in that direction and actually courted suspicion by behaving as though Judaism meant everything to them and Christ very little, we ought to remember that only very few cases of that kind ever happened and were usually brought about by an anti-Jewishness which has its very deep roots in the development of Christian thought.

—Rev H. D. Leuner ("The Hebrew Christian") quoted in "The Lamp and the Light", July, '59.

ASPECTS OF PRAYER

We have in the English tongue several words which may be looked on as synonyms for prayer—supplication, intercession, beseeching, imploring, etc. The Greek of the New Testament in like manner has various words for prayer. Of course it may be said that there are really few or no synonyms; and that there are distinctions finely drawn which mean that no two words are identical. For this reason we suggest that the distinctions enable us to see that there are different aspects and qualities of prayer. The richer and fuller our grasp of prayer the more intelligent our practice will be.

* * *

St. James (5. 16) urges us to pray for one another, and adds that the prayer of a righteous man availeth much. The R.V. word here is "supplication", and the Greek word is basically "a need"—thence an asking, an entreaty, a supplication. The word in this sense occurs as the prayer of Zacharias (Lk. 1. 13), and in 2 Cor. 1. 11, "Your supplication", and in Phil. 1. 11, "Your supplication", and 2 Tim. 1. 3, "My supplication", and also in the same sense in 1 Pet. 3. 12, "their supplication".

Supplication then is a very necessary aspect of prayer. It suggests the sense of need, and an element of urgency combined with it. This may be illustrated by reference to the familiar invitation in the Epistle to the Hebrews—"Let us draw near with boldness into the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy and may find grace to help in time of need" (4. 16).

To this we may add that supplication calls for the right attitude to God. We need to come with the candour which confesses sin and offers no excuses. St. John tells us—"If we confess our sins He is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

Before God we must have no defences. We must be "naked and laid open before the eyes of Him with Whom we have to do" (Hebr. 4.

13). Our Lord Himself submitted, even to death "wherefore God highly exalted Him" (Phil. 2. 9)—"the disciple is not above His master".

* * *

We may recognise that the spirit of supplication may be a strict discipline, and may demand sacrifices of time and self-will, and self-esteem. It is a service of God like all other sorts of prayer because it is a testimony to our faith and the sign of belief that God is "the Hearer of prayer". Its quality of dependence, even of surrender, witnesses to the great warrant of all prayer—"God is Love".

* * *

Another aspect of prayer is simple asking—presenting a petition. An instance we all recognise is "Give us this day our daily bread." Is it not implicit here that we have the right to ask? St. Paul, we think, would not restrict prayer to the greater and more pronouncedly spiritual needs: "in nothing be anxious; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 4. 6).

We may sing with John Newton:

"Thou art coming to a King;

Large petitions with thee bring."

but the smaller needs remind us that all our life is divinely created, and our daily needs must not be kept from God, as though only our eternal needs are suitable for His attention.

* * *

Our Lord called the House of God, i.e. the Jerusalem Temple, "a house of prayer". This word, recovered from Isaiah 56, still astonishes us with its simplicity and universality. The Temple was accepted as the place of sacrifice and ceremony—what a challenge to all that was the claim that in truth God's house is "a house of prayer for all people"—not only for prayer on behalf of all people, but a place of prayer for everyone—Gentile as well as Jew. When the human devices of observance, rite and offering no longer satisfy: when their effectiveness ceases to be convincing, we return to the one enduring possibility that if we come to God in self-surrender: if we say from the heart

"Nothing in my hand I bring",

He will be found "more ready to hear than we to pray".

He "to Whom all hearts are open, to Whom all desires are known, and from Whom no secrets are hid" will be no longer "Deus Absconditus", but the One "in Whom we live, and move, and have our being".

Prayer is "direct action". It is not spiritual "gate-crashing", for there are no gates. Did Our Lord ever suggest that there were any obstacles to our prayer on God's side? We think not.

* * *

We have also to remember the plain exercise of prayer in intercession. Intercession will cover prayer for "all sorts and conditions of men"—for the needs of the Church on earth, for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom, for the personal victory over sin, and for all necessary grace. We might hazard the suggestion that the prayer of intercession (as, for example, in Acts 13, 3) is not primarily personal but concerned with wider needs.

"Brethren, pray for us" is a request for intercessory prayer. The prayer in Hebr. 13, 18 is a reminder of a duty laid upon all Christians to pray for each other. We ought to pray "for those that love us, and those that hate us, and for those who have desired us, unworthy as we are, to pray for them". It is worthwhile to add "and those whom we have forgotten do Thou, O Lord, remember". These are two extracts from what is called "a prayer of the Eastern Church". It has been for many years in use in the Church of Ireland and has taught us our duty to intercede in an effective way. So understood we are each other's advocates here on earth. We are united by a common interest, for we need all the help we can obtain in our spiritual warfare. To pray for each other is a necessary activity where there is real Christian faith. We may intrude here the observation that the behest "brethren, pray for us" is not an argument in favour of seeking the intercession of the saints (i.e. in this connection, the dead in glory), for all of us here, in the body, may know well enough each other's needs, but we cannot show that the dead know the needs of earth any longer. We cannot show that they are able to hear our prayers, and consequently we should consider it best of all to pray to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. God knows our needs: we know too, in part. Beyond this we have no knowledge; and in any case, when we have the right to come boldly to the Throne of Grace what need is there to supplicate elsewhere?

* * *

What remains to complete the practical aspects of prayer? We read St. Paul's words in Philippians 4: "In everything by prayer and supplication let your requests be made known unto God": something is missing from our quotation, the simple phrase "with thanksgiving". Here is the element needed to complete our prayer. In 1 Cor. the Apostle writes of the unlearned saying 'Amen' to our "giving of thanks". Gratitude becomes the Christian. In the old homely word, we should "count our blessings" and be thankful. Let us try to be thankful to God for the experiences which improve us. The complete life is not a chronicle of sunny days alone—a landscape's beauty is made up of shadows as well as of brightness, and the Christian's life must include the rough with the smooth, the dark with the light. If we are tempted to write off the shadows as mere negatives we are failing in wisdom and discernment. If we thank God for everything we are transforming what might be put aside as negation into something positive and constructive. The Christian must say

"With mercy and with judgment

My web of time He wove,

And e'en the dew of sorrow

Were lusted with His love."

* * *

Thanksgiving ought not to be merely formal. It is more than words: it is the disposition of the heart and mind. We may even say that it is the Christian attitude to God and to life. Let us recall what St. Paul says to the Church at Colosse—"Established in your faith, even as ye were taught, abounding in thanksgiving." Is this too much to expect from people such as we are? We believe that we can learn the wisdom of thankfulness if we put our minds to it. Thankfulness is uplifting and refreshing. In middle life we tend to apathy and spiritual dullness, and the cure for this is the will to be thankful—"Rejoice in the Lord always." Here is the very factor we need to change us from a mere acquiescence in things to a forward-looking and creative attitude. For the thankless nothing is really worthwhile; whereas the thankful sees

"every common bush afire with God".

* * *

The Revelation of St. John is commonly thought of as a source book of future history, but it is supremely a testimony to faith, and thanksgiving is a dominant note. Earth's sorrows are for the moment, but the blessings of the redeemed are eternal. The vision of God shows us the living creatures giving glory and honour and thanks to Him that sits upon the throne. They say "Blessing and glory and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might be unto our God for ever and ever." As this will be our song hereafter, ought we not to begin now to practise the prayer of "faith and thanksgiving"?

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"THE BIBLE ONLY."

No doubt our readers have heard the old phrase "The Bible and the Bible only is the religion of Protestants"—it was in fact the title of a book by a seventeenth century English writer, William Chillingworth, who had for some years been a Roman Catholic. The book is still valuable (as indeed it must be in the very nature of things), but much of its reasoning has been taken into other later books and thus has been given fresh currency.

Many non-Roman Catholics have objected to Chillingworth's principle. They have said that a book cannot be a religion, and that we ought not to approach the Bible as Mohammedans approach the Koran (we confess that we don't know exactly how Mohammedans approach the Koran, but we assume that they regard it with deep veneration and believe it to be true). We are sure that Chillingworth was aware of such possible criticism, and that what he wanted was to uphold the fact that the Protestant religion (by which he meant the faith of the Church of England and of those who endorsed its basic doctrines) is grounded in the Bible and nowhere else—traditions form no part of its doctrines. Chillingworth was naturally reacting against the theory laid down at the Council of Trent that tradition and Scripture are equal sources of Christian truth. The word "equal" has never been used before Trent in this connection, so it is little wonder that Chillingworth's contemporary, the well-known diarist, John Evelyn, could refer to "the new Trent religion."

If it were said that the Creeds of the general councils of the undivided Church are binding as such on all Christians it was enough to refer to the Church of England Article which says that the Creeds are to be believed because they are based on the warrant of Holy Scripture. It is noteworthy that these Creeds (Catholic in the right sense of the word) affirm nothing but what is plainly taught in the Bible. Chillingworth, then, is asserting the authority of the written word over the unwritten traditions. He contrasts what we know definitely to be revealed by God with the inchoate and indeterminate "traditions", late and unreliable in many instances.

* * *

The point is not the incredibility of tradition, or the impropriety of it as a guide to orthodox thinking, but the fact that it is not an independent source of truths necessary to salvation. Tradition may interpret saving truth: it cannot be allowed to add to it. The present attitude to tradition in the Roman Catholic Church appears to be that a popular opinion which has been fostered over some centuries can become "definable". If it is "definable" then it becomes "defined" by infallibility and is stated to be a truth necessary to salvation. That seems to us to mean that no one can say at any time before the end of the world what the Christian faith really consists in. A man who thought he knew its necessary truth in the year 1800, and believed all that was proposed to him for acceptance, was in fact wrong for later in that century two new dogmas, each necessary for salvation, were decreed (the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, 1854, and the Infallibility of the Pope, 1870). In this century, in 1950, a third necessary dogma was decreed, the Corporal Assumption of the Blessed Virgin.

* * *

Connected with this is the implication of the Infallibility decree of 1870. No one can tell us authoritatively what decrees of previous popes have the quality of infallibility. It is true that theologians name ten or a dozen papal pronouncements in the past fifteen hundred years and say they are infallible. If the theologians are right, it is the theologians who are infallible! In fact, until a pope declares infallibly what pronouncements of his pre-deceivers are infallible, and what are not, we shall still be in a state of suspense about matters which are considered to be of eternal consequence for all who are not invincibly ignorant.

* * *

How happily we can turn from all these complicated and confusing matters to the Bible! We cheerfully admit that there are many diversities of interpretation of scripture truth, and many contested views of Christian doctrine, but we, no more than Chillingworth, feel helplessly nonplussed when these facts are pointed out. We are not concerned to defend every aberration which passes under the much misused word "Protestant". We will fight no battle in defence of Christian Science, or Seventh Day Adventism, or Christadelphianism, or other Transatlantic novelty or heresy. We make no common cause with Spiritism or Jehovah's Witnesses or Mormonism. We uphold Evangelical Truth, the orthodoxy of the ancient Creeds, and the Reformation Confessions of Faith which harmonise with them because they harmonise with God's Word as His Church in ancient days understood it.

We ought to say here that we believe in free speech and condemn any sort of ecclesiastical Fascism which would prevent it. Let denials of religious freedom of utterance be the unworthy badge of Spain, not of Ireland. Let us not bawl down the men we disagree with and maybe misunderstand, but meet them fairly in orderly debate. A man may easily shout down another: it requires only lungs, not brains; but to meet in serious discussion is the only way likely to ensure conviction.

* * *

We may differ in expounding God's Word—let us choose a significant historical instance, the conflict between Calvinism and Arminianism in the seventeenth century. The two schools took opposed views of certain important theological matters, but no one has claimed that either one party or the other denied the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, or denied the Atoning Work of Christ, or denied the future life of the redeemed, or denied the moral law of God. Evangelical Christians do not mean by their disagreements that they consign each other to eternal damnation. What are in fact the differences between Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists, Congregationalists, making up among them the vast bulk of what is called Protestantism? The differences are, all of them, secondary and minor issues—church order, church government, forms of worship. Who in their senses would regard these matters as fundamentals of the Christian faith? Take up the hymnbook of any of these communions, and mark how much is common to all of them. The hymns common to all of them are probably the main part of each book, numerically preponderant. The teaching or sentiment of these hymns represents the popular expression of Christian truth, based on the Bible, which these denominations desire their adherents to accept.

Of course in all these churches opinion is not in a straitjacket, and therefore individuals may from time to time voice their own personal views. That is healthy and candid, for a right-minded family is not compelled to uniformity of thought and expression. A father who insists that every member of the household should think and say and do what he dictates and nothing else, will scarcely be looked on as the ideal parent. He is certain to do far more harm than good.

Rome may make a virtue of "thinking with the Church": but evangelical Protestantism wants to go a step behind that, to try to ensure first that the Church will think with God's Word written. Then things fall into their proper relationships, and we think with the Church because the Church thinks with the Bible. Was it not indeed for that very reason that members of the Church wrote as they were inspired by the Holy Spirit? It is true of the New Testament as of the Old that "whatsoever things were written afore time were written for our learning that we, through patience, and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope."

* * *

We lately glanced over a Roman Catholic pamphlet by a Jesuit (Fr. de Zulueta) called "The Bible Only". It takes the form of a homely little story such as might appear in the less sophisticated weekly papers—a Church of England Vicar preaches a sermon on the Bible as the rule of faith. A simple villager gives a summary of it to a young ex-seminarian who had, we are told, "received careful and special instruction in Catholic doctrines". The ex-seminarian (who quit his seminary for reasons of health) says "how can a sensible chap like you swallow down such rubbish?" (Thus it is implied that the vicar is more or less of an ignorant imbecile). The villager protests, and his friend repeats that it is rubbish for a clergyman to teach that the Bible suffices by itself. He makes the point that the Bible does not contain all God wants us to know. We agree that God permits us (and, we may think, wants us) to know much about the natural world of His creation, though the Bible does not tell us everything. This, however, is different from saving spiritual truth. The ex-seminarian, we are told, could go on to say that as Protestant sects do not agree in everything they cannot have found out the one meaning intended by God. We have shown the foolishness of this position by what we have said earlier. The Church of Rome once held the doctrines now professed in the Church of England. It went on to make large additions to them, and it was those additions which at the Reformation the Church of England discarded (the Church of Scotland behaved similarly in essentials). Then we are told that the young man could have pointed out that "Christ had appointed an Infallible Church to interpret the true revelation of God to man". This sounds impressive, but is it true? We cannot accept the interchangeability of "Christ's Church" and "the Roman Catholic Church". We cannot transfer to Christian antiquity the developed idea of later times which is signified by the word "Infallible".

The young man in this story did neither of these things—he and his village friend had supped on black puddings, so he thought of a trap for the villager and said, "Suppose God's Word forbade you to eat black puddings, would you think it sinful to do so?" The villager agreed that he would. Then the young man read out to him that apostolic message to the converts from heathenism that they were "to abstain from blood" (Acts 15, 20). This seemed to put the villager in a pretty fix, particularly as the young man claimed that he was free from the restriction because "the Catholic Church explains to me that the rule no longer binds Christians—that the prohibition against blood is withdrawn", but those who said "the Bible only" had no way out!

Perhaps the author of this edifying tale did not recognise that a positive law such as this can expire quite simply when the special circumstances calling for it cease to operate (in this case the wisdom of heathen converts not offending Jewish susceptibilities), whereas a natural law (such as one of the Ten Commandments) binds us continually.

The next brilliant point made is the assertion that "the Bible can't speak and explain itself". Hence it is deduced that the Bible by itself is not sufficient for guidance. We have already referred to the traditional understanding of Bible truth which is evangelical orthodox and not denied by any part of the Christian Church—Rome like us and like the Orthodox East accepts the teaching of the Bible on the basic facts of God's nature and providence; on the realities of grace and faith; on the resurrection and the future life. These are all so clearly taught in the New Testament that only "a natural" could fail to perceive them. No person needs assistance in seeing that these are vital and luminous truths. If a doctrine is not a luminous, but an obscure, one it cannot be of primary and present importance.

Further, the careful reader of God's Word, who takes trouble to compare the various presentations of a particular truth will find that Holy Scripture is largely self-explanatory—Fr. de Zulueta may despise those who accept the Thirty-Nine Articles "in all their anti-Catholic crudity" (his own words); but we beg to say that the purest Catholic truth is expressed in Article VI which declares that whatever is not read in Holy Scripture, nor may be proved by it is not to be required to be believed by any man as an essential to his salvation. This is not Reformation "crudity" but the faith of the Fathers. The clumsy ineptitude of the anti-Church of England argument in this pamphlet surprises us.

* * *

The ex-seminarian whose delicate health terminated his studies but did not prevent his supping on black-puddings and whisky (so our author) seemed to be scoring very easy victories, and the outcome may be foreseen: edifying tales of this sort are much addicted to the "argumentum ad hominem". The Protestant simpletons of the story are easily abashed and silenced. One instance is the question of the Sabbath or Lord's Day. The hero asks a local preacher who joins in the talk to say where the Bible tells the Christian to keep the Sunday. This is a very old topic, the distinguishing between the Sabbath (7th day) and the Sunday (1st day). Of course the point is the claim that the Church changed the observance, not a command of God. We could readily admit that the Church did do so (i.e. the first Christians who consecrated the first day commemorating the Resurrection) as long as we are not made to believe that the principle of God's Commandment is abrogated. But in fact the New Testament emphasis on "the first day" as a day of worship and thanksgiving may rightly be understood as an instinctive response to the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

* * *

The ex-seminarian is pictured as saying, "I have only tried to show that the Bible is useless for the purpose for which you Protestants use it. In fact, it is practically useless, in great measure, for deciding doctrines, i.e. without an interpreter." Now here we have an unconscious admission that these words are doubtful—What is the qualifying clause "in great measure" doing in this sentence? The fact that it is there explodes the whole assumption, for it is an admission that the Bible does decide some doctrines, and then the question is "What doctrines?" And the answer the Protestant orthodox make is "the doctrines necessary to a right understanding of the Christian faith, but not the doctrines which gradually grew up as accretions upon the faith."

In addition, the practical Christian life and faith exemplified by evangelical Protestants and based on Holy Scripture is a sufficient reply to the assertion that "the Bible is useless for the purpose for which Protestants use it."

We have followed this pamphlet far enough to show how much there is still to be said for the ancient doctrine of the supremacy of Holy Scripture. William Chillingworth's phrase is not yet outworn even when we consider it in the light of modern thought.

REVIEWS

"The Story of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Trim"
—by the Revd. W. L. M. Giff, Canon of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. 40pp. 1/6.

[As no publisher's name, or name of selling agent is given, we can obtain and supply from this office at 1/9 post free, or application may be made to the author at Clara House, Clara, Offaly.]

Canon Giff some time ago published a very interesting booklet on "The Story of Clonmacnoise", an ancient diocese which has long been merged into the Church of Ireland diocese of Meath. His present booklet is an historical account of the Church of St. Patrick at Trim, and the special reason for writing it is the new circumstances of the Church which was erected into a Cathedral Church for Meath diocese quite recently. Trim is one of several cathedrals bearing the name "St. Patrick". Two of them are well-known—St. Patrick's in Armagh, the seat of the Archbishop, and St. Patrick's, Dublin, which is designated "a national cathedral"—others such as Killala and Trim are scarcely known by any outside their own immediate neighbourhood. This account of St. Patrick's, Trim, ought to make this very old foundation more widely known. It deserves to be a centre of interest because it is as a church reputed to be many years older than Armagh, so that its history goes back to the fifth century of our era.

Trim town has a long tradition and has witnessed many stirring events. It was the chief western outpost of the Anglo-Norman Pale in the Middle Ages, and its ecclesiastical institutions were many. The church attached to one of them was long used as the mediaeval cathedral, but it came to an end through the Tudor suppression of the monasteries. The Church of St. Patrick of which Canon Giff writes was never monastic or conventual. When we say it was raised to cathedral status quite recently we may remember that for many generations the newly appointed bishops of Meath were in some sense enthroned in it, so that it seems to have been a "de facto" cathedral. What was done a few years ago was to make it a cathedral "de jure" and to furnish it with a Dean and Chapter. Of course a cathedral may exist without a Dean and Chapter, for a cathedral is "the bishop's church", as distinguished from the typical parish church. As a "bishop's church" we may follow Canon Giff in going back to the beginning when Christianity first came to the place on the River Boyne where Trim now stands. The pioneer was Lomman, sent there by St. Patrick because the local chieftain was married to a British woman who might welcome the preacher of the Gospel who had come from Britain.

The story of Trim is part of the St. Patrick story. Many books have been written about St. Patrick and his life and doings in Ireland, and the impression is often given that the writers know what he did and where he went—but in actual fact we have no certainty at all about anything connected with St. Patrick apart from what we read in his own writings. The numerous "Lives" are hagiography, not ascertainable history. But if we are to tell a picturesque story of St. Patrick we must take some notice of the "Lives". We may speak of the "legend" of St. Patrick, but at the same time we may remember that Dr. Todd says of the story of the founding of Trim that there is nothing impossible about it. Patrician studies are in an extremely fluid condition, and apart from the saint's writings there is no account of him till at least two hundred years after his death.

* * *

Canon Giff carefully follows the story of Trim, through the period of the Danish incursions and the subsequent arrival of the Normans in the twelfth century. The resultant changes in the constitution of Irish Christianity brought it into line with continental Europe. Anglo-Norman bishops were appointed to Meath, and Trim, town and church, ceased to be typical of the old Irish Christianity. As far as we can judge the resumé of Anglo-Norman history and the Reformation changes is accurate, and Canon Giff has done an excellent piece of compressing or condensing the available information. He has wisely confined attention to St. Patrick's, Trim, and has not sought to write on Trim generally (though that would have been worthwhile if space had allowed it).

* * *

The ups and downs of St. Patrick's and its parish in the post-Reformation years are well told, and the narration ends with a survey of the adaptation of St. Patrick's as a cathedral. Biographical notes on some of the more notable clergymen of Trim, including Dr. Reichel, later Bishop of Meath, add much to the value of a most useful publication.

We suggest that the next edition might abridge the section concerned with the middle ages, and include a description of the church building—a separate pamphlet on the church would then be unnecessary. We congratulate the writer on a careful and judicious piece of work. It compares favourably with several other sketches of Cathedral history on sale in Ireland.

"Roman Catholicism in the Light of Scripture"—F. C. H. Dreyer and E. Weller. London, Protestant Truth Society. 210 pp. 8/6.

The publishers furnish the following interesting note on the origin of this book—

"The original manuscript was written in Chinese by the late Mr. F. C. H. Dreyer, who was a missionary of the China Inland Mission, and who, through his work in China with that Society obtained first-hand knowledge of the doctrines and workings of the Roman Catholic Church to an extent of which few in this country would realise.

"For the production of this book we are greatly indebted to the untiring work of Mr. Ernest Weller, another missionary of the C.I.M. who not only has translated the manuscript into English, but has added to it in a way which is most commendable in making the whole volume a complete compendium on the Roman Catholic faith. No little thought went into the choosing of the title, and as a result "Roman Catholicism in the light of Scripture" does truly indicate the contents of the book, for all the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church are examined herein in the light of Bible truth, not in any spirit of disputation for disputation's sake, but that the Truth may be clearly seen, and its sub-title "Prove all things" exactly expresses the desire of the publishers that this should be done."

Thirty-five brief chapters examine the distinctive doctrines of Roman Catholicism and compare them with the teaching of the Bible. Apart from this, the book gives a general impression of the popular devotional practices which occupy the attention of most of the active members of that Church. A fair example of the sort of popular religion the writers have in mind may be quoted—a commentary unnamed—affords this quotation about the grounds for believing in the Immaculate Conception. "The words 'Thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee' contain the hidden meaning 'Thou art without original sin.' They also imply that Mary from her birth was entirely free from sin." Not having access to the commentary we cannot tell why its presumed Roman Catholic author should quote Luke 1, 28 in the Protestant rather than the Douay version ("Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with thee"), but we think the writers do well to reject esoteric meanings in plain scripture statements.

On the Assumption, about which we have written much recently, it is emphasised that no historical proofs are available. We recall saying this to a Roman Catholic who replied that one historical proof of the Assumption is that there are no relics of the Blessed Virgin in existence, such as there are of other saints whose bodies have not been taken up into heaven. We leave it to readers to consider for themselves the value of this "proof". But we say that this sort of argument assumes that physical relics would have been kept and venerated at the time when the Blessed Virgin died, say about the end of the first century. This we may be sure is quite wrong, for the pursuit of and veneration for the relics of the saints belongs to a later and less spiritual day. When the large-scale regard for relics was established in the Church the belief in the Assumption was already in existence, so that we see the improbability of an enquiry into the relics of the Blessed Virgin—hair or articles of clothing are in a different class. It should be added that there are no guarantees of genuineness attached to what are commonly thought of as relics of the Apostles.

The want of historical proof of the doctrine of the Assumption is admitted, as we have seen. Holy Scripture is not designed to meet this question, as we have pointed out, on chronological grounds.

* * *

A good chapter is on "The Papal Succession". We have more than once pointed out that even if we recognised in the New Testament a certain priority and leadership of Saint Peter, there is no guidance given to lead us to the belief that this priority transferred itself to the bishops of Rome when they emerged from the obscurities of the second half of the first century. It is admitted by scholars, we believe, that the evidence for bishops in Rome in the first century is confused and puzzling. We quote the following—"In answer to the question 'What proofs can you give that St. Peter was ever Bishop of Rome?' she (the Church) says (Question Box, page 145): "It was not divinely revealed that St. Peter was Bishop of Rome, but it is a dogmatic fact, i.e. an historical truth so certain and so intimately connected with the dogma of primacy, that it comes under the divine infallible teaching authority of the Church. The Vatican Council defined it as an article of faith that St. Peter still lives, presides, and judges in the person of his successors, the Bishops of Rome.'"

Our authors say: "So now, notwithstanding admitted absence of divine revelation, Peter, by Papal definition, was Bishop of Rome and moreover still lives, presides and judges in the person of his successors, the Bishops of Rome." Here is a vital point where the testimony of Holy Scripture is essential, and at this very point it is absent.

* * *

Another chapter on a vital theme is the one on Justification. This was a very prominent question in the sixteenth century during the Reformation, and many confessions of Faith of that day emphasise it. In this age it may tend to be obscured by other considerations, but it remains (as in the Church of Ireland Thirty-Nine Articles, or in the Westminster Confession of faith, or in the Confessio Augustana of Lutheranism) the basic doctrine of our salvation as apprehended by us. It was long debated at the Council of Trent (and probably was imperfectly understood by many of the prelates assembled there). It is emphatically an outstanding doctrine of the New Testament. The book before us sets out clearly the real problem and upholds the reformed faith doctrine of Justification, which is, naturally, the recovery of Scripture teaching.

* * *

We have no hesitation in commending this volume, especially to those who have opportunity of friendly and considerate discussion of religious questions with Roman Catholics, as a very useful handbook. It must be distinguished from such older works as Blakeney and Stanford, and it may with advantage, be studied along with them.

THE EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE

Managing Editor: Elizabeth Braund. Consulting Editors: Rev. J. I. Packer, D.Phil., Rev. J. Elwyn Davies, B.A. Bi-monthly. Subscription for one year 7s. 6d. (incl. postage 8s. 6d.). Single copy 1s. 3d. (incl. postage 1s. 5d.). Personal orders for six or more copies post free. Orders to: The Evangelical Magazine, 22 Grove Park Road, London, W.4. A magazine for Christians of all ages, and for those with doubts and questions about the Christian faith. It aims to provide clear Bible teaching, a realistic outlook and honest enquiry into problems of to-day. It seeks to declare the whole faith and to show it applying to the whole of life.

=====

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 111.

has a foothold, such as the Middle East, among Christian Arabs, and in Africa.

—("Church Times", 28th August, '59).

[It is interesting to note that, to date, 44 out of 173 member Churches favour union of W.C.C. and I.M.C. Of the remainder we may find a proportion against union. We note the two Churches opposing it are the Church of Ireland and the French Reformed, both capable of intelligent and independent thinking. Merger with W.C.C. would cause division in many mission areas thus harming Christian Witness].

* * *

SCANDINAVIA

Ordination of Women: A Crisis

Although Sweden's law allowing women to take holy orders in the (Lutheran) state church went into effect on January 1st, no women have yet been ordained. One woman applied, but since she had no intention of becoming an active minister her application was rejected. Four women theologians are willing to serve as pastors (among them Margit Sahlin, a member of the World Council of Churches' Central Committee), but they have decided not to ask for ordination at the moment lest doing so cause still more discord in the church. All the bishops have agreed to confer with each other before any of them permits a woman to be ordained in his diocese.

The Swedish Church Assembly's acceptance in principle of the service of women as pastors has had repercussions at home and elsewhere. High- and low-church Swedes who oppose the law have formed a Joint Council for Church Fellowship Based on Bible and Confession. The leaders of this "confessional front" are Bishop Bo Giertz of Gothenburg and Dean G. A. Danell of Vaxjo. The dean was chairman of a high-church meeting recently held in Hjalmseryd at which a statement was adopted declaring: "The ordination of women is not valid, as it lacks authorisation of the Lord of the church. The Church Assembly has exceeded its powers and has no authority in opposition to the Word of God."

In January, for the first time in several years, the Church of Sweden failed to invite Anglican representatives to take part in an episcopal consecration—that of two new bishops at the Cathedral of Uppsala. Apparently the Swedish bishops did not want to risk aggravating the touchy question of future relations between the two State Churches.

—("The Vigilant", Melbourne, 14th June, '59).

* * *

Virgin Mary Forgotten by Protestants—Holy Father

The Holy Father, in an address to 10,000 pilgrims at Castelgandolfo, yesterday, said that in the Protestant religion, the Madonna appeared to have been forgotten.

Speaking at the weekly general audience in his summer villa, the Holy Father spoke of Catholics' need to "obey the Commandments in this agitated world".

"All must carry a cross," the Holy Father said. Some are small and light; others are big and heavy.

Remarking that he wore a small cross on his breast like all bishops, the Pontiff said: "I am fully aware that many of you have bigger burdens to carry."

Christ's Cross

The Pope said that when Christ was given the Cross to carry, and when He died on it, He was not alone. The Blessed Virgin was with Him.

But the Protestants, who still call themselves Christians, have forgotten the Virgin Mary. It appears as though they have expelled her from their creed."

"This constitutes a wrong to Our Saviour," the Holy Father said.

—("Irish Press", 27th August, '59).

[This extract from one of our daily papers calls for a protest from us. We are not guilty of expelling the Blessed Virgin from our Creed—we say, in the ancient Catholic Creed of Nicaea, that we believe the Saviour was born of the Blessed Virgin Mary. We have taken nothing from the Creed of ancient Christianity, and we have added nothing to it. Sunday by Sunday we Irish Protestants are accustomed to singing the Song of the Blessed Virgin Mary (the Magnificat): how can we forget her? But, we teach nothing the New Testament doesn't warrant].

* * *

The Missionary Enterprise

The Roman Catholic Church still considers the Philippines a mission field. And no wonder, for after 500 years of missionary endeavour backed by all the agencies of government, it can count only 163 Filipino priests as against 1,511 foreign priests in the islands. But in the eyes of Filipino evangelicals their country has ceased to be a mission station of the Protestant churches. Fifty years of Protestant evangelism have produced some 3,000 churches manned by about 2,000 Filipino ministers, and the potentialities of further growth are tremendous. In fact the Philippine church has itself become a church with a mission. In spite of its slender resources, it has already sent out missionaries to Asia and Africa—to Thailand, Okinawa, Indonesia, Borneo, Malaya, Hawaii, Iran—and even America.

[It may be said, in answer to the above, that the standard of training for the Roman Catholic priesthood is so exacting that few Philipinos can reach it; and that evangelical pastors are more easily equipped. But if this is said, then the fact must be pointed out that the basic need of evangelical pastors in the Philippines and in other parts of the world is earnest faith; and when that is evidenced, and followed by a sound practical study of God's Word, the training is adequate. This is particularly so in the evangelical missions where the studies needed are progressive].

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 11—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	121
The Supremacy of the Holy Scriptures	122
The Kingship of Christ	123
Editor's Chair	126
The Gospel and the Jew	128
A Note on 1 Peter 2, II	129
Eleven Men Review Revival	130
Reviews	130

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Roman Catholic Population of England and Wales

We take the following from "The Irish Press", Dublin, 17th August, '59.

First results of a scientific survey, now nearing completion, put the total number of Catholics in England and Wales at five-and-a-quarter millions—almost two millions more than the estimated figure in the current edition of the official Catholic Directory.

Though it was well-known that the numbers had shot up in recent years, most Catholics here were surprised by the news from Mr. A. E. Spencer, Director of the Newman Association demographic survey; that the increase had been so marked.

He said that the effect of the Irish in bringing about this position had been staggering.

Irish Influx

The 15,000 converts a year, the steady increase in the English Catholic birth-rate, the arrival of Catholic emigrants from the Continent, important as they were, would seem to pale by comparison with what the post-war Irish emigrants would, in due course, produce in fresh numbers of Catholics.

"The colossal effects of the Irish influx will begin to be felt in 1970," Mr. Spencer continued. "As many as 16.1 per cent. of the children aged between five and fourteen years then will be Catholic."

[These figures are quoted from "a scientific survey". We have no information about the methods a statistical enquirer used. The Newman Association is, of course, a Roman Catholic organisation. We may set against the annual 15,000 converts the substantial numbers of lapsed, but the effect of constant Irish immigration is bound to be serious in its influence upon the religious loyalties of Great Britain].

* * *

"Save Me" Cry at Church—Bride 'abducted,' but Makes it Seven Hours Late

Police last night said they were investigating a report that a bride had been abducted outside the church in Freeland Drive, Priesthill, Glasgow, shortly before her wedding. Later the girl, Miss Rosemary Travers Gray (22), drove with her parents from her home at Willow Drive, Craigneuk, Airdrie, to Airdrie burgh police station.

The man she intended to marry is Mr. James Waddell, a Glasgow accountant, who is in his early thirties.

A 47-year-old bus driver, Mr. Henry Adamson, who lives next door to Priesthill Parish Church, told a reporter last night he heard a girl screaming outside the church "Save me: Save me."

"Grabbed Her"

"Two men had come out of a car and grabbed her as she was going into the church. They forced her into the car. She was screaming at the top of her voice and as the car drove away I could still hear her screaming."

The Rev. J. McC. Campbell, minister of the church, said last night that he was sitting in the vestry when the best man shouted "The bride has been abducted." Mr. Campbell said that he did not take what the best man said seriously at first.

A look-out was being kept for a car which was said to be involved. It was thought to be travelling towards Airdrie, Lanarkshire.

Miss Gray was still wearing the neat fawn suit in which she had intended to be married when she went to Airdrie police station with her parents.

She stayed with them in the police station for about two hours and then, shortly after 10 p.m., she was reunited with Mr. Waddell. Fifteen minutes later he left the station, smiling, with Miss Gray at his side.

They drove 10 miles to a friend's house in Priesthill, Glasgow, and soon afterwards were joined by Mr. Campbell, who had intended to marry them nearly seven hours earlier.

Mr. Campbell changed into his clerical robe and placed the couple, with their attendants, in front of the fireplace in the living room of the house.

The ceremony started at 11.45 p.m. and five minutes later it was over. Mr. Campbell hurried the couple to the sideboard to sign the register, saying: "It's nearly midnight. We must have this signed now."

After the ceremony, Mr. Waddell said: "I am a bit hazy about what happened at the church. Rosemary and I drove up and the next thing I knew, Rosemary was driven off in a car. I was absolutely stunned."

Asked what happened when he saw Rosemary's parents at the police station, Mr. Waddell smiled and said, "No comment. It is all over and done with now."

Miss Gray, who is a nurse, added, "I am very happy now."

Shortly after midnight the couple left for their honeymoon.

Miss Gray is a Roman Catholic and Mr. Waddell a Protestant.

—("Northern Whig", Belfast, 21st August, '59).

[Is it not deplorable that in Protestant Scotland basic human rights can be interfered with? Or anywhere else? We hope the couple will be led to a strong positive reformed faith].

* * *

Moderator's Appeal on Political Tension

A letter condemning attempts "to make capital out of the ease with which passions can be inflamed" by those who are trying to "intensify political tension" in the Six Counties, was issued to the Press in Belfast yesterday by the Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, Dr. Thomas A. B. Smyth, and the Clerk of the Assembly, Dr. J. H. R. Gibson.

The letter states:—"The members of the Irish Presbyterian Church, in common with other members of the community, have noticed with growing disquiet the efforts of a few to intensify political tension both in the city and country, and the incidents which have already followed.

"We are convinced that we interpret aright the sentiment of our Church when we join with those others in public and religious life who have already condemned this rather transparent attempt to make capital out of the ease with which passions can be inflamed."

It adds: "The claim that Protestantism is thus defended or advanced is false; the only result will be to cast doubts in the minds of many upon our Christian profession."

—("Irish Press", 11th July, '59).

* * *

Something Odd Here?

De Valera has now disappeared into the shadows and his successor is hailed as a

—(Continued on p. 132.)

THE SUPREMACY OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

An address by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D., broadcast over 2CH, Sydney, in "The Case for Protestantism" series.

The whole system of what is popularly called Protestantism rests on the supremacy of Scripture. This position is assailed from two quarters, Modernism and the Roman system.

* * *

The Attitude of Modernism

Modernism is hard to define. Professor Sanday is frequently given credit for the invention of the title. He said, "We are all modern men, and it is not possible for us to divest ourselves of our modernity." But in the eighteenth century it travelled under the name of "The Illumination". Modernism, we may broadly say, seeks to substitute for the inspired volume of Scripture the enlightened conscience of the individual. It suggests that we should not be dependent on an ancient written record for our deeper intuitions of spiritual reality. The Modernists rather sarcastically declare that official Protestantism has substituted an infallible book for an infallible Pope. Clever sayings like these catch the imagination, but they seldom bear close examination.

* * *

The Roman Catholic Church is an avowed enemy of Modernism. Some of my hearers, at least, will be aware that Tyrell, the Irish convert of considerable ability, was excommunicated for teaching some of the accepted tenets of Modernism. The curious can study his defence of his position in the little tractate, A Much-abused Letter. Every Roman Catholic is bound to embrace the sacred Scriptures both of the Old and New Testaments, because, as the Council of Trent puts it, "One God is the Author of both." This is a fact that requires emphasising because some ardent Protestants, genuinely mistaking a logical consequence for an expressed belief, declare that the Church of Rome rejects the authority of Scripture. On the other hand, ardent Roman Catholics vociferously assert that the only defender of the sacred Scripture with any authority is the Church of Rome.

(To be continued)

THE KINGSHIP OF CHRIST

The title "King" when applied to Our Lord marks His supreme authority rather than any circumscribed Kingdom in the temporal sense. His Kingdom is "not of this world", though His people ought to be building His Kingdom here and now. It is not for us to plan His Kingdom, for He has done that long since; it is our duty to implement the plan as far as human minds and hands can do it. The great purpose is to bring all human thought and endeavour into subjection to Christ's Will. Nearly two thousand years ago the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews wrote—"We see not yet all things subjected to Him. But we behold Him Who hath been made a little lower than the angels, even Jesus, . . . crowned with glory and honour" (2. 8 & 9). The vision of faith in the ultimate victory sustains us at this late hour, because it is a vision of Him Who has gone forth "conquering and to conquer" (Rev. 6. 2.). So the title "King" is Our Lord's though we await with confidence the final proclamation—"The Kingdom of the world is become the Kingdom of Our Lord and of His Christ and He shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. 11. 15).

When we pray "Thy Kingdom come" we ought to be confronting ourselves with the challenge to transfer our responsibility from the lips to the life; from the heart to the hands; from the promise to the performance. God works through us. He can work independently of us, but we are His appointed instruments, and have announced ourselves as such. The professing Christian is committed—he may be negligent and heedless, but he can never push aside his responsibility. We have made ourselves accountable, and the Kingdom demands our loyal and sustained service.

* * *

The Christian should be working for something, and his work should be directed towards something. Are we not commonly inclined to consider, with a backward look to Calvary, that we are "in Christ", and will move forward automatically into heaven after death? Do we not assume that conformity to the ordinary decencies of life is sufficient fulfilment of the ethical obligations of the Gospel? Do we not suppose that a regular modicum of prayer and an occasional appearance at Divine Worship meet the requirements? If the honest answer is, "yes", how can all this advance the Kingdom which was urgently and emphatically taught by Our Lord? Would any earthly enterprise, commercial or industrial, flourish if given no greater diligence than we give to the Kingdom of Christ?

Is it not clear that the incentives of Christianity have constantly been diverted into easier channels? Through the centuries it has been found far easier to agitate over the merely professional rather than the personal concerns of our faith. It is always easier to fight for orthodoxy than to fight for righteousness. It is easy to burn a heretic: it is hard to learn the good lesson he tried to teach. It was a simple matter to destroy John Hus: it would have been far harder to change men's hearts, to reform abuses, to correct error. The satanic use of power to destroy the critic is easier than to heed the criticism and repent.

We think, indeed, that very often the threat that heresy entails is a threat, not to sacred God-given truths, but a threat to self-satisfaction, to condonation of failings, to corrupt practices, to indifference to the reformatory truths of the Gospel. A popular assumption nowadays is that "heresy is a very great evil". That may mean that "deviationism", being "out of step", is in itself an evil. If so, we have here a blatant totalitarianism, for it reduces all ideas and thoughts to a single issue—are they conformist or not? It is the religion of the dead-level; the creed of "getting-by"; the policy of treating urgent living issues of faith as subordinate to "the united front".

But, the general and abstract term "heresy" ought to be analysed. Each allegedly heretical position deserves to be studied seriously and charitably, for we think that no man takes up a heresy for mere badness. Religious error is not generally a sign of moral delinquency. We would strongly maintain orthodox and evangelical Christianity, the old Catholic faith found in Holy Scripture, but that, we trust, will never impel us to be unjust to others who differ from us. Upholding Gospel truth has often in the past been marked by bitterness and intolerance. It would ill become us to perpetuate among Protestants the spirit of the Inquisition.

We must judge each error in the light of its own context and the suppositions on which it rests. We ought not to take for granted at the outset that an error is adopted maliciously and with evil intent. The Kingdom of God does not require "man's inhumanity to man" to safeguard it.

* * *

Let us meet religious error, whether it be in unreformed Christianity or among Protestants, with the lessons of evangelical truth set forth in the New Testament. Let us take note that from the very start it was anticipated that errors would arise (note what St. Paul said to the Ephesian presbyters—"From among your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away the disciples after them"—the word "perverse" means "turned aside from the right path" rather than moral perversity—"wrong-headed" rather than "wrong-doing"). The Gospel way to meet them is "to speak the truth in love."

* * *

It may be allowable also to remember that Our Lord had His own attitude to all who were furthering His Kingdom, an attitude His first disciples did not share. In Mark, ch. 9 we read—

"John said unto Him, Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy Name; and we forbade him, because he followed not us. But Jesus said, Forbid him not; for there is no man which shall do a mighty work in My Name and be able quickly to speak evil of Me."

"He that is not against us is for us."

* * *

Of course we are not advocating mere indifferentism as though we saw no serious distinction between truth and error. But we do not belong to a Church which claims to be infallible, and therefore, if we have not plain guidance in God's Word we recognise that there are topics upon which a difference of opinion may exist without the spiritual nature of man being overthrown or the Divine purposes being stultified. For instance, a man may hold dispensational theories—we may believe him to be mistaken, or believe that he has a case: either way the essential truths of the Gospel are not in jeopardy, and the duty of furthering the interests of Christ's Kingdom is not given up.

* * *

Our Lord Himself is King in His Kingdom. After the Order of Melchizedek He is King as well as priest—King of righteousness by the very nature of His Being. From the eternal purpose of God He derives His Kingship over His people and over the principalities and powers which make progress towards the fruition of the Divine programme. Born a King, "born King of the Jews", and also "He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of His Kingdom there shall be no end." This is not a pious theory of Jewish evangelists, but a truth Our Lord Himself stated. Before Pilate, when asked "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" He answered "Thou sayest." Pilate accepted the positive answer when he said to the crowd "behold, your King!" This is also evident in the title on the Cross—"The King of the Jews".

If it be thought that Our Lord's Kingship extended only to earthly Israel we may turn for a correction to chapter 15 of Revelation where we read that the victors in the battle against evil "sing the song of Moses and the song of the Lamb saying "Great and marvelous are Thy works, O Lord God . . . Thou King of the Ages" (or "Nations").

Further, we cannot fail to see in Holy Scripture many references to Christ's Kingdom as something foretold, or, in fact, promised. It is not an elusive mystical theory or a pious speculation, but a very definite, conspicuous reality. We need not fear being charged with shallow literalism if we state that Christ's Kingdom is going to be realised on earth, and is going to bear a special relationship to Israel, and is necessarily bound up with His glorious appearing. There is no present sign that the programme of world evangelism or evangelisation (far too inadequate anyway for the task) is going to convert all men everywhere. We are not told in Holy Scripture that such a possibility exists within human agencies. We are told to proclaim the Gospel of Christ and His Kingdom "for a witness" to all nations. This in no way contradicts "the great commission" of Matthew 28. Christ's people must still try to go into all the world, but they have no certainty of one hundred per cent. success. But that success will come, and every point in the Divine programme will be fulfilled. Human helplessness or inadequacy will not hinder the consummation of the ages. If God, when we were dead in trespasses and sins and therefore unable to help ourselves, was able to save and revivify us, is He not able to inaugurate Christ's royal rule at His appointed time and place?

If a man may be converted in a brief period of time, why not a nation? Why not Israel? As Christians we must not rule that out, or place it among the improbabilities.

* * *

"The God of heaven shall set up a Kingdom which shall never be destroyed, nor shall the sovereignty thereof be left to another people."

"The Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall the Lord be one and His name one."

How shall we turn aside the point of the following sentence in St. Luke's Gospel (1. 31) —"The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father, David, and He shall reign over the House of Jacob for ever"?

To evade the force of this becomes more difficult when we bear in mind the following words of three prophets—

"A day of the Lord cometh . . . for I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle . . . then shall the Lord fight against those nations . . . and His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem . . . and it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall go up to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts . . ." (Zechariah 14).

"At that time they shall call Jerusalem the Throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered into it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem" (Jeremiah 3).

"It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall punish the host of the high ones on high, and the Kings of the earth upon the earth . . . the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously" (Isaiah 24).

No doubt we could bring forward much more prophetic material to expand this and to show the central place occupied by the Holy Land not only in the past, but in the future. A person who viewed the Holy Land sixty years ago or a century ago would have dismissed it as territory long since deprived of all significance—the remnant of long dead things, the barren haunt of thriftless Arabs and a handful of despondent Jews. One who surveys the Holy Land to-day sees a transformation: he will no longer say that it is a country which has had its day—he will see the deserts blossom like the rose. Israel is resurgent for God has intended that it shall come to life again. The near East is becoming a new world to-day, and that means that it is regaining its ancient consequence.

* * *

We turn to Christ's parable of the pounds (Luke 19) and we read, "He spake a parable because He was nigh to Jerusalem and they supposed that the Kingdom of God was immediately to appear." The parable told of a certain nobleman who "went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." The parable told of the return and of the punishment of the enemies of the kingdom—"these mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me; and when He had thus spoken He went on before, going up to Jerusalem." That parable begins and ends with the Holy City.

"He that is Faithful and True, called 'the Word of God' had a name—'King of Kings and Lord of Lords'" (Rev. 19). There is no mistaking His identity for "He is arrayed in a garment sprinkled with blood."

* * *

The reign of Christ is not ephemeral. It will be for ever—"of His Kingdom there shall be no end."

He will reign over Israel (we have referred already to this fact).

He will reign over the Gentiles—"King over all the earth" (Zechariah 14).

His reign in contrast with all human experience of earthly régimes will be righteous—"The nations shall see Thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory" (Isaiah 62).

"A King shall reign in righteousness and princes shall rule in judgment"—when did human rulers do this? Never, not even of the best of them can these words of Isaiah (32) be used. Such a reign has yet to be experienced.

The purpose of Christ's reign is peace: is He not named "The prince of peace"? "In the latter days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established . . . and many nations shall go and say, 'Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord . . . and He will teach us His ways; and we will walk in His paths: for out of Zion shall go forth instruction and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem . . . we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever'" (Micah 4).

Can we find any particulars of our own condition in Christ's reign? Read Isaiah chapter 35 and rejoice in it—"the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE REFORMATION.

The Reformation is a subject of perennial interest. For the Roman Catholic it is always the tragic wilful breach in the unity of Christendom: a calamity second only to Adam's Fall. For the secular writer it is the application to the Church of the "New Learning" and of Renaissance liberties. For the historian it is an effect of the rise of new powers in Europe and the appearance of national states rebelling against the cosmopolitan empire in which temporal and sacred were theoretically one. For the Protestant and Reformed (using these terms in their proper senses) the Reformation was a great spiritual renewal—the emancipation of gospel faith and Church order from the accretions and corruptions of the centuries. For us it is a time when the New Testament and its faith came to the forefront and exercised decisive influence. We take no responsibility for the intrigues and diplomacies of sixteenth century Popes and kings. They secularised religion and the Church; our forefathers learnt to worship God "in spirit and in truth." They subordinated spiritual things to their own seeking after power. Our forefathers tried to honour God and His Word by obedience.

* * *

The Protestant writer is under no obligation to whitewash Henry VIII or Martin Luther or John Calvin or Thomas Cranmer. We neither condone their faults nor over-praise their virtues, for we have never claimed that they were perfect. In different ways, according to His Providence and purpose they were God's instruments, but that did not make them less than men with the faults of the age they lived in. Babylon was once a golden cup in the hand of the Lord but that did not mean that God had no rebuke for Babylon.

* * *

Thus the Protestant has no reason to be nonplussed or alarmed if a Roman Catholic friend challenges him with an objectionable phrase from, say, Luther's "Table Talk", or suggests that Archbishop Cranmer wanted freedom to marry, or denounces Calvin for the burning of Servetus as though his own Church had not for centuries effected the burning of heretics, hypocritically laying the responsibility upon "the secular arm".

Of course, while we honestly admit the failings of the Reformers we are not to be so pusillanimous and obliging as to swallow every criticism of them, or to allow that they were monsters of vice, falsehood, and profanity. They were nothing of the sort. Their standards of conduct were no whit inferior (and often were superior) to the standards of their contemporaries—Luther and Cranmer may compare favourably with sixteenth century Bishops of Rome. Henry VIII and the Evangelical princes of Germany were not sinful above their contemporaries. It ought to be candidly admitted that these men, reared in mediaeval and unreformed religion, had much to learn of Gospel ethics and the true Christian way of life and faith. In many respects they and their followers were morally and spiritually ahead of the religiously decadent system they opposed.

* * *

Some eighty years ago Cardinal Manning preached a sermon at a service to commemorate the Tercentenary of the Council of Trent. He called the Council "a great Council of reformation". He was quite right: it was a great engine of reform in many directions—were its reforms not a very real admission that the Church needed reformation? Had the long appeals for a reform of the Church under official auspices not fallen on deaf ears in Rome the Protestant Reformation need never have happened. We thank God it did happen so that at least some part of Christendom could regain the vital truths of original Christianity, and grow familiar with the Word of God in its wonderful power and glorious truth. But naturally we wish that Reformation had never been rendered necessary. The roots of the necessity lay far back and deep down in the past. The entanglement of the Church in the world, the growth of papal claims, the multiplication of observances, the abuse of tradition, the accretions of doctrines which had no real Christian foundation, the tortuous statecraft of the Church which frequently did much harm, the great schisms, and the really wicked attitude to so-called heretics; these are among the factors demanding a spiritual reformation.

We do not assert that the Reformation was all it might have been, or all it ought to have been; but we are not to contrast a mismanaged and unnecessary reformation with an immaculate Church beset by ignorant and malicious foes. Much heat and anger in theological circles can still be worked up over "unity" of the Church. We can be told that "unity" is the one thing which outweighs all others—that disunity is the great sin, and that the agents of disunity are the chief of sinners. Let it be remembered by us, even if the theologians forget it, that the "unity" of the Church was unknown in the sixteenth century or before it, because from the eleventh century onward the Christian Church was radically split into two great divisions—the Western Latin Church evolved for itself the theory of Papal Supremacy (given its classic expression by Pope Boniface in the middle ages—"it is necessary for salvation that all people be subject to the Roman Pontiff"), but to this theory the Eastern Greek speaking Christians gave a decided negative. There were other factors, but the papal claims seem to have been the decisive ones in bringing about the cleavage which had been threatening for many generations.

Consequently it makes no sense to treat the history of the Church in the sixteenth century as if there were no such thing as the Eastern Orthodox Church, or to treat the history of the Church in earlier centuries as though there were no Jacobite or Nestorian Christians in Western Asia, or no Monophysite Christians in Egypt and elsewhere. We suppose that these last will be written off as heretics, but their existence as Christian communities independent of Rome throughout their history is evidence that unity is in fact an abstract notion. However important the unity of the Church may be, it did not exist in the sixteenth century before Luther began his protest.

* * *

Let us add this, that we are not to think that unity is the only thing that matters. We ought readily to forsake unity in the interests of Truth. There can be, and there is, unity in error as well as unity in Truth. Why should we sacrifice Truth for the sake of unity? We have no mind to make a fuss about small things and secondary things, but we firmly protest against the idea that unity is worth pursuing even when it means surrendering our clear apprehensions of the truths of the Gospel. If reformed Churches are to draw closer to Rome it can only be by progressively giving up reformed and scriptural faith and replacing it by reacceptance of doctrines we have hitherto rejected.

* * *

We are familiar too with the crimes regularly laid at the door of the Reformation. Atheism, secularism, materialism, communism, to name some of the major crimes, are asserted to be the children of the sixteenth century Reformation. Where did atheism become practical politics? In France at the end of the eighteenth century, in a land in which Protestantism (ever a small minority) had been ruthlessly destroyed with sadistic delight. Where did secularism and materialism find greatest response if not in Roman Catholic countries? Why are Protestant Great Britain and America the bulwarks against Communism, and why is Italy, a completely non-Protestant country in no way subject to Reformation impulses, the country with the largest Communist vote in Western Europe?

The Protestant Reformation, coming when it did, averted from Europe for centuries the terrible anti-religious swing which marks our day. The countries where religion is free and Communism is powerless are the reformation lands. Only an iron dictatorship keeps Spain in temporary acquiescence. We take no pleasure in writing thus, but are doing so because we are so beset by false teaching about the Reformation, and we deplore the blindness of so many who cannot face self-criticism but must have a whipping-boy for all their grievances. When things are going wrong it is a human weakness to blame somebody else, never ourselves, and if we can pin the blame elsewhere we absolve ourselves from doing anything realistic to put things right.

* * *

Much criticism may justly be directed against the nationalistic spirit which at the dawn of the sixteenth century tended to centralise power in the hands of monarchs and foster individualistic policies among the nations, but such criticism does not account for the change of religious conviction among ordinary people who were ready to die for their reformed faith. It does not account for the sustained efforts to spread the Holy Scriptures in the languages people spoke and read.

* * *

We may derive some comments on the state of the Church in Western Europe before the Reformation from Roman Catholic sources—

“Undisguised traffic in benefices, from the episcopate down to the smallest vicarage.”

“Indifference and inefficiency of a large part of the secular clergy.”

“Prevalence of absenteeism and pluralities.”

“In many parts of Europe the monasteries were in a deplorable condition.”

“Scholastic theology had ceased to be creative.”

“To contemporaries the later fifteenth century Popes seemed intent mainly upon three objects—the consolidation of their political power in Central Europe, their artistic and literary patronage, and the maintenance of the Papal Curia and financial system.”

“That the Papal Court from, say, 1450 to 1529 was venal and often immoral can hardly be disputed.”

“For Catholics, who believe that the Papacy should seek to elevate rather than acquiesce in contemporary moral standards, it is difficult to extenuate the private behaviour of the Renaissance Pontiffs.”

These are comments on the situation taken from “The Reformation” by H. O. Evennett, M.A., published in 1957 by “The Catholic Truth Society of England.” Mr. Evennett is a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Mr. Evennett as an historical student makes these admissions, though no doubt he could explain how the situation they indicate arose. To us, however, they are a substantial part of the well-warranted grounds of the Reformation. When we add to them the new realisation (through the study of the New Testament and of early Christianity) of what true Christian beliefs are, we find we have solid grounds for defending Reformation principles, and for holding fast to the spiritual freedom they give us.

THE GOSPEL AND THE JEW

Recent months have seen a renewal of the controversy on both sides of the Atlantic as to the justification and usefulness of Christian missions to the Jews.

Those on the Christian side who object to Jewish missions usually make much of their conviction that the revelation given on Mount Sinai is still valid. We doubt whether many of our readers would dispute this statement. Certainly no-one who believes in the inspiration of the whole Bible could question it for a moment. It is also true that there are times when the Church needs to be forcibly reminded of the validity of the revelation given on Sinai. In times of moral lawlessness there is urgent need to remember that the God of the Bible, while a God of Love, is also a Holy God with absolute moral demands which can never be set aside . . . Yet it is here that the dilemma immediately arises. God has absolute demands which fallen man, try as he will, is powerless to fulfil. The sacrificial system of the Tabernacle and Temple represented at once man's consciousness of failure and, in symbolic form, the Divine answer. “God will provide Himself a lamb.” In some way God will do for man what he can never hope to do for himself. The New Testament with its record of the self-offering of the God-Man shows the one way in which this could be accomplished.

To the Christian it is no coincidence that so soon after the offering of the “one, true, perfect and sufficient sacrifice” the symbolic sacrifices of the Temple came to an end. For the Jew, however, the end of the Temple sacrifices left an unbridgeable gap. More and more desperate efforts to keep the law in every detail led to the development of Talmudic legalism with all its excesses and exaggerations. The Day of Atonement, robbed of its sacrificial character, became a day of fasting and penitence when the pious Jew cast himself upon the tender mercies of his God. Yet real peace of mind and assurance of forgiveness still eluded him. Hasidism and various other mystical movements among Jews all represented attempts to bridge this gulf and establish fellowship with God.

Much though the Christian may admire and indeed often be put to shame by the zeal of his Jewish brethren, yet he cannot but feel the tragedy of their ignorance of the Gospel. Nor can he evade his responsibility to offer it to them, with penitence and humility and yet with confidence. Admittedly the wrong treatment of the Jewish people by the professing Church in the past adds enormously to the difficulty, yet this only increases the need for the true servants of Christ to shew His love to His brethren. We must be constantly on the watch to insure that the methods used are always those which pass the supreme test of love. There can, however, be no doubt of our duty. No matter what men may say the battle is not ours but the Lord's and in His strength we can and must go forward.

—"Jewish Missionary News",
Aug.-Sept., '59.

A NOTE ON 1 PETER 2, 11

"Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims . . ."

1. These words recall to our minds the lost sense of the unreality of earthly life: that may sound a little foolish, I know, but a moment's reflection will show us that it is Christian; and a little further reflection ought to show that our religion contains these paradoxical kinds of foolishness which turn out to be the truest wisdom. Think, for instance, of Christ's words, "he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." They are but a single example of that Christian way of putting things, which may sound odd, but patiently discloses a profound truth. We must never suppose that one reading alone will give us the lesson God intends, for the truth about ourselves and about Him does not always spring to the eye. We often need to revise our impressions of revealed truth as we discover its depths.

2. St. Peter may well have felt himself to be an alien in heathen surroundings—a Jew could rarely feel at home in the ancient world outside the frontiers of Palestine. Even in our world the Jew must feel his separateness and the want of a sympathetic kinship with his neighbours. Peter was bound to consider himself a stranger, and to describe his fellow Christians as strangers: in that quality of being "different" he and they had an element of fellowship; a bond to mark their oneness in it.

An illustration comes from the early Christian Epistle to Diognetus—an answer to a heathen enquirer. "Christians dwell in their own countries, but only as sojourners: they bear their share in all things as citizens, and they endure all hardships as strangers. Every foreign country is a fatherland to them, and every fatherland is foreign. Their existence is on earth, but their citizenship is in heaven."

3. Can we, nineteen centuries later than Peter think of ourselves with any degree of sincerity as "strangers and pilgrims"? Are we not in the habit of assuming that we, as professed Christians, are the legitimate and natural inheritors of earth, and that other faiths and peoples are less entitled to that heritage than we? In the last century, during the great ascendancy of Europe in world affairs Tennyson could unhesitatingly refer to "the supreme Caucasian mind"—to-day we begin to feel chill winds from further East, and to wonder if the coming world-rulers and master peoples will not be Oriental. In face of this we shall do well to think first as Christians—as those whose life is a journey, and who know that earth is the starting place, not the goal.

If sincerity is difficult, let us say to ourselves that the New Testament is essentially way-faring or pilgrim literature, and so also is the Old Testament. The Old Testament prophet could look forward to a day when men could sit peacefully under their own vine and fig tree: he scarcely thought of it as a present possibility, for the impression made on his race by the forty years sojourn in the wilderness was indelible—the true concept of Israel as a people—these are some of the things St. Paul tells us were written for our learning!

The Epistle to the Hebrews as we all know is especially the pilgrims' book of the New Testament. Is it not remarkable that its writer draws his examples of the old worship and sacrifice Christ has superseded from the Tabernacle of the Wilderness rather than from the Temple in the Holy City? For him there is no continuing city here: "We seek one to come." Like Abraham we as Christians are to look for "A city with foundations, whose builder and maker is God." He says to us, "Go on" and "go forth".

4. If this emphasis on the Christians' alien status is pronounced in I Peter and in Hebrews, do we find a different outlook in St. Paul? He does not say much about pilgrimage, but he has a great deal to say about the Christian as a soldier, and that teaches the same lesson—Peter says, "I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the soul," and Paul says, "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life, that he may please Him Who hath chosen him to be a soldier." I see here a reflection of the spirit of the Gospels, and of the Christian life in its true perspective.

Shall we not say that the lasting interest of Bunyan's "Pilgrims' Progress" is just this fact that it fits a deep subconscious knowledge in us that we are travelling people—that for us earth is not, and never can be, enough? Our pilgrim hymns may be over-sentimental and even escapist, but a healthy-minded religion will find that much that this world values is irrelevant to the Christian life. When we place beside this the growing instability of human society and the grim possibility of the earth's return to chaos—the one sane reality we know is our eternal goal—we come from God, and to God we shall return.

ELEVEN MEN REVIEW REVIVAL

"Revival Yesterday and To-day" was the theme of a series of special meetings held in Dublin in September. The meetings were sponsored by the churches of four denominations on the north side of the city to commemorate the 1859 revival in Ireland.

To coincide with the holding of these meetings the chairman of the organising committee, the Rev. Canon N. D. Emerson, LL.B., Ph.D., of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, has written a book entitled "The Church of Ireland and the 1859 Revival", which is now on sale.

The meetings were held in various city churches from September 14 to 20, and altogether 11 speakers were heard dealing with different aspects of revival.

The churches which sponsored the effort were: Church of Ireland—Drumcondra and North Strand, Grangegorman, St. George's, St. Mary's, St. Michan's and St. Paul's. Baptist—Phibsboro. Methodist—Abbey Street and Clontarf. Presbyterian—Abbey Church at Parnell Square.

The closing meeting of the series was held on Sunday, September 20, at 8.30 p.m. in St. George's Church, Temple Street, when the speaker was the Archbishop of Dublin, Most Rev. G. O. Simms.

The programme was as follows:—

September 14—Abbey Presbyterian Church, Parnell Square, 8 p.m. Subject: "Revival and History." Speakers: the Rev. Canon N. D. Emerson and the Rev. R. Lee Cole, Clontarf Methodist.

September 15—St. Mary's Church, 8 p.m. Subject: "Revival and Conversion." Speakers: the Rev. G. C. B. Davies, D.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History at T.C.D., and Rector of St. Andrew's, and Pastor L. E. Deens, Grosvenor Road Baptist Church and lecturer at the Irish Baptist College.

September 16—St. George's Church, 8 p.m. Subject: "Revival and Prayer." Speakers: the Rev. W. C. G. Proctor, Rector of Harold's Cross, lecturer at T.C.D., and author, and Pastor D. Maconachie, Phibsboro' Baptist Church, and director of the Telephone Ministry.

September 17—St. Paul's Church, 8 p.m. Subject: "Revival and the Bible." Speakers: the Rev. S. J. Knox, B.A., B.D., Abbey Presbyterian Church, and the Rev. E. M. Neill, Rector of Crinken Parish, and representative in the Republic of the Scripture Union and the Children's Special Service Mission.

September 18—Abbey Lecture Hall, Abbey Street, 8 p.m. Subject: "Revival and Witness." Speakers: the Rev. J. Lynham Cairns, Methodist Church, Abbey Street, and Professor W. B. Stanford, F.T.C.D.

This series of meetings marks the biggest effort in the city to be made by any denomination to commemorate the 1859 Revival.

REVIEWS

"CHRISTIAN LEADERS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY"

The author, the Rev. B. C. Mowll, had rendered, we believe, a valuable service to the cause of Evangelical Truth in gathering together under one cover the life stories of eleven Christian leaders of the eighteenth century, together with their portraits. These fervent men of God, with their bold and uncompromising characters are vividly portrayed to the reader, and many a lesson can be learned from this valuable little book.

The contents of the pamphlet are mainly extracts from Bishop Ryle's well-known book of the same title.

Published at 1s. 3d. in this handy size, we believe the pamphlet will receive a ready circulation:

A NEW CLASSIC OF SOCIAL HISTORY

A Review in "The Sunday Times" May 24, '59
Philanthropy in England, 1480-1660. By W. K. Jordan. (Allen & Unwin. 42s.)

By HUGH TREVOR-ROPER

"When heresy came in, charity began to wax cold." "The monks went out and the poor-law came in." How often, in historical backwaters, do we still hear the faint echoes of these old clichés, the effronteries of Cobbett and Chesterton! If they are still uttered, that is because the evidence, though clear enough, has never been fully documented and presented. Now it has. To an American professor, a scholar to whom English historians have long been in debt, Mr. W. K. Jordan, we now owe one of the best studies that we have of the social philosophy and achievement of the English Reformation.

The work behind this book is formidable. In years of study, of which these are only the first fruits, Mr. Jordan has examined every will, or other discoverable document, recording every gift or bequest to charity, over a period of 180 years—from before the Tudors till after Oliver Cromwell—in ten counties, containing half the wealth and one-third of the population of England. He has followed the fate of every charity thus founded. From these sources he has presented statistics which document and literature which illustrates a great cultural revolution. And he has done all this in a style which, in spite of its scientific precision, is a pleasure, even an inspiration, to read.

* * *

When there is so much to say about a book it is with reluctance that one must concentrate on its bare bones. But briefly, Mr. Jordan shows how, in the half-century before the Reformation, the public charity of the Church had dried up, and private charity—largely devoted to prayers for the dead and casual doles which created more poverty than they relieved—was ineffective. Monasticism was in decay, hospitals and schools neglected. Then, in the sixteenth century, came a new impulse. It was not that poverty became worse, but rather that the human conscience, and especially the lay conscience, became aware of it.

And the Tudor sovereigns, those “most secular as well as most enlightened of all English sovereigns”, were aware of it too. With their genius for working in harmony with the forces around them, the Tudors provided the external conditions: they lubricated the machine which their subjects drove. For in fact the positive legislation of the Tudors hardly needed to be used. “In no year prior to 1660,” says Mr. Jordan, “was more than seven per cent. of all the vast sums expended on the care of the poor derived from taxation.” The rest came from private charity.

In general we may say that, with the blessing of the State, “the bulwarks raised by private generosity against poverty, disease, ignorance and impotence remained sufficient until they were overwhelmed by the forces loosed by the Industrial Revolution.”

How did this impulse start? Was it from Protestantism? Undoubtedly the Reformers, and then the puritan preachers, with their “drum-fire of exhortation”, played a great part. But the movement itself, Mr. Jordan emphasises, was not religious. It was essentially secular. It was the laity who gave the push. No doubt these laymen were pious men, but they would not give for purely devotional purposes.

Church building and repairs, even maintenance of the parish clergy, which (with prayers for the dead, etc.) had absorbed 53 per cent. of charitable gifts before the Reformation, declined rapidly thereafter: it was gifts to education, poor-relief and social improvement which rocketed upwards. Perhaps we should say that religion itself became, at this time, essentially social, and Protestantism was one form of the change. As a puritan writer put it, the old piety offered men stone—soaring cathedrals and great abbeys; the new offered bread.

At all events, the stone crumbled and the bread grew. By 1600 giving had become an infectious social habit. In the single generation from 1610 to 1640 more was given than in all the previous 120 years. The poor were the first beneficiaries, then education. In that same generation “the basic structure of English secondary education was literally created”. In 1480 those ten English counties had possessed thirty-four grammar schools: by 1660 private charity had created and endowed another 437, many in the days of Edward VI, more still after 1600. Neither Mary Tudor nor Archbishop Laud, both of whom preferred public church building to private charity, could halt the process. Even the Revolution did not seriously stay this other, slower, unpolitical revolution, stronger if more silent than itself.

* * *

And who were the leaders of this revolution? They were not necessarily puritans, though Charles I and Laud often made them so. Mr. Jordan shows that they were, above all, merchants and professional men, using urban, especially London, wealth (the gentry were far behind) and the legal device of the trust which Queen Elizabeth's legislation had made easy and which they knew well how to work. He also shows how effectively they worked it. Thanks to it, and to the new spirit of faithful trusteeship, the charities of our ancestors have survived, with negligible wastage, to our day. “We may say with full confidence that we deal here with one of the most amazing records of fiduciary responsibility that the western world has ever known.”

Such a revolution, and such a record surely deserve their monument. It is time that the old myths were laid to rest and the great social achievements of the English Reformation appreciated. What a pleasure it is to see such a monument set up! This book is a masterly, fascinating, exciting work. Its intellectual dimensions—its breath of sympathy and depth of scholarship—are most impressive. It is undoubtedly a new classic of social and cultural history.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 122.

modern Moses to lead his people into the promised land of Ulster.—Senator A. J. Walmsley, at Augher.

—(“Belfast Weekly Telegraph”, 17/7/'59).

* * *

One in 3 in 6-Cos. Roman Catholic

The Catholic population of the Six-Counties has increased by more than 50,000 in the last 30 years, and now represents 34.4 per cent. of the total population, according to the official Six-Counties Year Book, issued in Belfast yesterday. The number of Catholics in 1926 was 420,428; it was 471,460 in 1951.

Other increases for the same period for other religions were: Presbyterian—393,370 to 410,215; Church of Ireland—338,724 to 353,245; Methodist—49,554 to 66,639; Brethren—13,401 to 17,845; Baptist—7,390 to 11,870; Congregationalist—8,206 to 9,346.

Emigration statistics showed that 4,984 emigrated from the Six Counties in 1957, 5,088 in 1956, 3,745 in 1955, 835 in 1937, and 12,884 in 1926.

The Year Book says that the population of the Six Counties on June 30, 1958, was 1,402,300. During the five years from 1953 to 1958, the average marriage rate was 9,367. The number of unemployed in the area last year was 43,496.

Tourist Trade

Over 300,000 tourists visited the area in 1958; and the tourist trade is worth more than £11,000,000 a year.

Dealing with agriculture, the book says that 2,118,240 acres (63 per cent. of the entire area) was under pasture and crops. There were 979,530 cattle, 676,910 sheep, and 980,080 pigs.

When the present hospital building programme is completed—it may not be before 1968—it is estimated that the Hospitals'

Authority will have some 18,500 beds under its control. This will be about 40 per cent. more than the number of beds in 1948.

The year book says that, despite the immense strides forward since 1948, there was some evidence that standards in the area were not yet as high as in Britain generally.

—(“Irish Press”, 14th July, '59).

* * *

Colombia Persecution

Spanish missionary priests, directed by Bishop Jose Lecuona Labindibar, have forced the civil authorities to prohibit Protestant religious services in the town of Puerto Bijao, on the San Pedro River in Cordoba Department.

On Sunday, August 2, the Police Inspector and two policemen interrupted the Protestant Service, prohibited further religious services, and arrested Sr. Alfredo Acevedo, lay preacher of the Latin American Mission in charge of the congregation. Sr. Acevedo was kept overnight in the Puerto Bijao jail and transferred the next day to Monte Libano as a prisoner.

On August 2, the Protestant congregation of this town on the San Jorge River was attacked during its Sunday service. When one member prayed out loud that God would forgive the attackers (among which were police), he was arrested and jailed on the charge of lack of respect to the authorities.

The restrictive order outlawing Protestant Christianity in Puerto Bijao is based on Circular 310-R, according to the Departmental Secretary of Government, Sr. Jesus Rodriguez Coralles.

In forcing the civil authorities to apply Circular Order 310-R, Spanish missionary bishop Jose Lecuona Labandibar is falling back on a violation of Colombia's Constitution. 310-R was issued by the military dictatorship of Lt.-Gen. Gustavo Rojas Pinilla in January, 1954, in an effort to gain the support of the Catholic Church. It effectively suppressed religious liberty in contradiction to the Constitution.

In its seventh pronouncement on the Colombia persecution in as many years the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., in June, 1959, expressed alarm over “persistent evidence of restrictions on Protestants in Colombia and Spain.”

—(“British Weekly”, 3rd September, '59).

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY
7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 12—LXVIII.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1959.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	133
Glory to God in the Highest	136
Editor's Chair	138
The Supremacy of The Holy Scriptures	140
Index	131

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Vatican Bans Worker-Priest Movement

A 15-year experiment with the object of spreading religion among French working-classes has ended with a Vatican ban on the "worker-priests" movement. A directive from the Pope has been circulated to French bishops, forbidding priests from working full-time outside the Church.

The "worker-priest" experiment, which started during the second World War, saw priests take off their robes and don workmen's overalls to labour in factories and live among the workers—to learn their problems and try to spread religion. The movement spread through France and at one time there were over 100 "worker-priests".

Joined Unions

One of its main aims was to reduce the influence of Communists among workers. In some Church circles opposition grew, and there were charges that some priests had become local officials in Communist-dominated unions, and had taken part in economic and political strikes.

Last spring the Archbishop of Paris, Cardinal Maurice Feltin, reported to the Vatican on results of the experiment, and asked for instructions on its future. Church sources said yesterday that the Vatican instructions to the French bishops had asked them to look for other methods of evangelisation of workers.

At the time of the ban there were about 25 "worker-priests" in France.—(Reuter.)

—"Irish Times", 14th September, '59.

* * *

Minister Urges Truce Among Irishmen—Reflections on I.R.A. Outrages

The establishment of a five years' "truce", in which all Irishmen would "cease from harmful and merely destructive political and religious controversy", was urged by Rev. V. G. Griffin, rector of Christ Church, London-derry, when he addressed the annual service of the Ulster Special Constabulary of London-derry City and District in First Derry Presbyterian Church.

He said that there was a deep desire among all Irishmen worthy of the name for the preservation of Christian principles.

Attending the service was Mr. W. W. B. Topping, Minister of Home Affairs, and Sir Richard Pim, Inspector General of the R.U.C.

Stating that whatever else divided Irishmen, he liked to think that in striving to uphold their common Christian values and standards they were all united.

"Healthy Sign"

"To foster and encourage this healthy sign, I believe it would be a good idea if for a period of time, say five years, said Mr. Griffin, Irishmen of all classes, creeds and political opinions, would agree to cease from harmful and merely destructive political and religious controversy.

"And let us not forget that religious controversy to-day is not only to be found between Protestants and Roman Catholics, but between Protestants themselves.

"If all agreed to spend the time in sincere and sympathetic study of the religious or political beliefs of their opponents, then I am confident that, at the end of that period, there would be a better and happier spirit of tolerance and mutual respect among the people of this land.

"Too often the attainment of a certain political or social policy is regarded by some as sufficient justification for the unleashing of savage passions in acts of murder and violence on the lives and property of peace-loving men and women.

Tragic Example

"Alas, we see a tragic example of this in Ulster at present, and it is, therefore, imperative that our Government should have at its disposal adequate forces for the restraint of evil-doers and for the preservation of law and order."

"While we all agree that the pulpit is not the place for a political speech," he said, "I feel bound to say that the Government of the Irish Republic should seriously consider if it is not committing a grave sin against Christian charity and against the very essence of the Gospel by adhering to a policy which, indirectly, assists those who, without legal authority, take up arms against their neighbours and create hatred, strife and bitterness among Irishmen.

"The existence of a narrow, self-conscious Irish nationalism, which found expression with some fanatics in the use of the bomb and the bullet has caused the name Irish to become identified in the minds of some of our people with a manner of life and conduct which are alien and repulsive to us.

Indeed, some of our people are tempted to disown the name of Irishmen because of its frequent unwelcome political and religious associations, and to reserve it for our political opponents.

"We must guard against this at all costs, for such a step would be disastrous for us all.

"We must never allow the name Irish to become synonymous in our minds with an alien way of life, or an alien religious creed. We are Irish—truly Irish.

"We have a right to be here in Ireland and we are entitled to defend that right.

To be ashamed of that name, and to fail to take pride in our Irish heritage, culture and traditions, is to play right into the hands of our enemies."

—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph",
18th September, '59.

* * *

Study of Problems Of Christian Unity

Cardinal Tisserant said in Venice that the meeting of Catholic and Eastern Orthodox theologians in Venice next year was part of a continuing study of problems of Christian unity by all churches.

He added that the gathering would help to meet what he called the need of all churches to "present a united front against atheism and materialism," regardless of technical religious questions.

A special correspondent in Rome says that Rev. Charles Boyer, S.J., issued a statement clarifying the recent Rhodes meetings between Catholic observers and Orthodox delegates to the central committee of the World Council of Churches.

Father Boyer is a member of a hitherto little publicised Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions, of which two observers at Rhodes, French Dominican Father Dumont and Dutch Monsignor John Willebrands, as well as the Counsellor of the German Embassy to the Holy See, Monsignor Hofer, and British Monsignor Henry Francis Davis, now in Rome working for the beatification of Cardinal Newman, are also members. This Conference, established seven years ago, was planned to follow very closely all developments in the ecumenical movement, and to try to establish good relations with the separated Christian churches.

Preparation for Union

Noting that the Catholic Church "occasionally allows some of her theologians to attend, as guests, certain meetings of the ecumenical council," Father Boyer stated that he finds it altogether natural that "these Catholics have held special conversations with the Orthodox delegates, who are doctrinally far closer," and that they got the idea of holding "a special conference, and even to decide to hold it in Venice, because of the close historical ties between the Pearl of the Adriatic and the Eastern world." Other such meetings have already been held, Father Boyer revealed, with due permission, in Paris, Vehlrad, and elsewhere. "They are useful," he said, "but only as a more or less distant preparation for union."

Going on to discuss the recent conflict that has arisen between the Orthodox and Protestant-Anglican members over the proposed integration of the World Council of Churches with the International Missionary Council, Father Boyer cited the protests brought against the proposal, not only by the Catholics, but by the Orthodox groups, who objected that their missions, "already hampered in their activities by the Protestant missions, would be much more so if the Council were to place its interests and its resources at the service of these (Protestant) missions.

True Church

Father Boyer observed that the council, through such a step, would be acting contrary to its own nature, since it was "born of the ecumenical movement, whose aim was to restore Christian unity, but it is not working for unity to uphold one part against the other." By joining with the Protestant Missionary Council, he added, the Council would be acting not ecumenically, but would become something in the nature of a pan-Protestant Council. It says that it must do the work of the Church, but before behaving as if it were the Church, it must seek to find which is the true Church of Christ.

Discussing the differences between the Eastern Catholics and the Orthodox Church, the Jesuit theologian affirmed that "it is clear that there will be union only if the Greeks and Slavs admit all of Catholic dogma." However, it is possible to think, as do certain Orthodox theologians, that agreement on everything will be easy once the Orthodox churches recognise the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome over the entire Church.

As for the Anglican position towards the Catholic Church, Father Boyer stressed that "it is obvious that the present leaders of the Anglicans are pushing their confession ever closer to Protestantism," and this in many ways: "through the union of the Anglicans with other confessions, as in Southern India; attempts at union with the non-conformists in England; hostility towards the pro-Roman Anglo-Catholics."

In this connection, Father Boyer referred to the recent dismissal of an Anglican pastor accused of having followed too high a liturgy. "Because of this, the Roman Church profits by the adherence of excellent ministers, convinced that a Christian must be a Catholic not a Protestant."

Catholic Council

"The Council must not be held with the separated brethren," concluded Father Boyer, in reference to the attitude of the separated Christians toward the Ecumenical Council and the meaning of the Council as the Pope sees it. "This is a Catholic Ecumenical Council; but both its announcements and its achievement constitute an invitation to all for unity."

"Thus far comments made by the leaders of the several non-Catholic confessions have been very reserved, as is natural. But in many confessions there are groups that more deeply feel the need for unity, who are interested in the Council and will hold their minds and hearts open to the light that will be kindled there."

—"Irish Independent", 7th September, '59.

[Here we have a clear statement of the issues involved in the Ecumenical movement and in the forthcoming Vatican Council. Some sanguine Protestants (not the most intelligent) thought that they or their Churches might be invited to the Vatican, but they should have known all along that Rome has nothing to discuss with Protestants. From Rome's standpoint all that Protestants have to do is to recant and submit—if we do we shall be welcome. We are not going to recant or submit.

Lately we noted the proposal to combine the International Missionary Council with the World Council of Churches, and said that we think it is a mistaken policy. It will be agreed to, because the young Churches want it, and older ones, while doubting the wisdom of it, are going to support it. Here they are betraying their own responsibilities for guidance. They know that the "younger" Churches lack experience and wisdom, but they will not obstruct a project which ought to be deferred for twenty years at least].

* * *

R.C. Mother "Threatened with Excommunication"—Then Withdrew Adoption Consent, Court Told

An Irish mother, who gave consent for her child, born in the Isle of Man, to be adopted by a Church of England couple, was told by the Roman Catholic Protection Rescue Society that they would expel her from the Church if she did not claim the child, the Isle of Man Appeal Court was told yesterday.

The court was hearing an appeal by the couple, said to have had care of the child since its birth in August, 1958, and who had unsuccessfully sought an adoption order when the mother returned to the island last February and withdrew her consent.

Deemster S. J. Kneale had rejected the petition for adoption.

The Appeal Court is expected to give its decision to-day.

The Isle of Man Judge of Appeal, Mr. J. R. D. Crighton, Q.C., and Deemster B. W. Macpherson, were told by Mr. J. W. Corrin, for the appellants, that the mother had never seen the child. She had said she was a Roman Catholic and wanted her baby adopted in the Isle of Man when it was born. Told she should see a Roman Catholic priest, she refused. She said she did not want the Roman Catholics to know anything about it, as the news would get back to Dublin.

"Did Not Mind"

When told the child would be adopted by Church of England parents, said Mr. Corrin, she said she did not mind so long as the child was going to a good home.

Later, a woman who had interviewed the mother received two visits from a Roman Catholic priest who told her the mother would like the child to be adopted in a Roman Catholic home in Ireland. At that time the mother had returned to Dublin.

The mother received a letter from the Rolls Office in Douglas fixing the date for the hearing of the adoption petition, and asking if she gave her consent, Mr. Corrin went on. She wrote saying she consented, but six days later, two letters came in which the mother said she was withdrawing her consent.

"We know," said Mr. Corrin, "that these two letters were brought to her house in Dublin by a priest who asked her to sign them and posted them."

The suggestion then was that she wanted her child back in Ireland, said Mr. Corrin. "And it was quite clear that the action was being taken by the Catholic Protection Rescue Society." Her own priest in Dublin became aware that she had this child, he continued, and in evidence in court when the adoption order was sought she said the priests had rushed in and made her do this.

"Would Be Expelled"

The Society told her, said Mr. Corrin, that if she did not go over to the island and claim the child they would expel her from the Church.

Mr. P. W. Farrant, for the Isle of Man Education Authority, the child's temporary guardians, said the Authority had fulfilled its functions under the Adoption of Children Act, 1953.

Mr. A. C. Luft, for the child's mother, said that Deemster Kneale had said he was satisfied that the threat of excommunication was a material factor in the withdrawing of the

—(Continued on p. 142.)

"GLORY TO GOD IN THE HIGHEST"

What is meant by "the highest"? Is it excess of glory; the outpouring of the maximum of praise? The Word in St. Luke's gospel (ii. 14) is not subjective in sense, as far as we can see. It is objective; and its parallel is "on earth", so the meaning refers to "place" rather than to quality or measure. The praise of God in the most exalted place of all, in Heaven itself, is the song of our Redemption.

Whose are the voices of Heaven engaged in this theme of glory? They are the voices of angels and archangels and all the company of Heaven. They witnessed man's fall: They aided him in his fallen state, and now they see and glory in the Father's purpose to redeem him through the ministry on earth of His Eternal Son. If St. Luke tells us of the praises of the angels over man's salvation planned, St. John in the Revelation tells us of the praises of the redeemed over man's redemption accomplished—those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb are before the throne of God and worship Him—"Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth": "Blessing and honour and glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

* * *

We are accustomed to use such phrases as "the Incarnation", "the Nativity", "the Word was made flesh". They are indispensable, but we may find ourselves obscuring the fact (to some degree) by employing technical or theological terms: is it not much to the point that St. Matthew, a very realistic writer, puts the matter plainly when he writes, "the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise . . ." ? When we speak of our salvation we need to do so in practical language, for there is a tendency to use abstract words, and that use takes away from our sense of the personal relationship, the genuine manhood of Our Lord, the trials of His perfect life on earth—"tempted like as we are, yet without sin", and the unmitigated sufferings He endured on the Cross.

"The Incarnation" is the word which summarises the whole process, the coming into the world of God the Son in our nature, and the implications of that event. "The Nativity" signifies the fact of Our Lord's birth in Bethlehem, of the Blessed Virgin Mary—if the whole of the Christian year is concerned with the Incarnation, then the yearly remembrance of the Saviour's birth is properly called the Nativity. "The Word was made flesh" is the phrase used by St. John, and the sense of "the Word" is given in the opening lines of his Gospel—"The Word was with God, and the Word was God." This expression is not simple, but the Greek "Logos" (Word) has a far deeper meaning than its English equivalent. When we speak of "the Word of God" we usually mean the Holy Scriptures, or a part of them. We should, however, remember that St. John in Revelation 19 writes of Him Who is Faithful and True, and says, "His name is called The Word of God." Also in the first epistle of St. John He is named "the Word of Life".

"Logos" brings to mind the lessons of Genesis and the record of Creation. There we have the repeated "and God said . . ." The Divine Word brought about Creation in all its aspects, and the incarnate Word, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity brings about the new Creation—"If any man be in Christ he is a new creation" (2 Cor. 5). The Word is not a mere sound; it is effective because it is God Himself.

* * *

Rejoicing and thanksgiving over the New Creation is not, as our text shows, the response of man's gratitude for the precious cleansing Blood (this of course has its place). It is what goes on within the host of Heaven, and thus shows us the atmosphere of wonder, awe, and admiration which surrounded the Divine decision that man was not to be written off as a moral and spiritual failure, but because he was made in the image of God he had an eternal value in spite of sin. Those who were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world and predestinated unto the adoption of children (Ephesians 1) are "to the praise of the glory of His grace" (do.).

The graciousness of the eternal God, Whose absolute Will might properly have ordained the eternal death of all mankind, evoked the angels' song. The host of Heaven knew what purity and perfection are, for their's is the dwelling-place of light and truth and complete and joyous acceptance of God's will. They saw the Divine love overflow all other powers of Deity; and they witnessed God the Son undertake the redeeming work. We who were dead in trespasses and sins cannot praise God until we are quickened into new life and learn not only what we have gained, or better, what has been gained for us, but also what we have been delivered from.

* * *

We now draw near to the time at which Christians have commemorated the birth of Christ. We cannot of course assert that He was born on 25th December, and it may be quite true that in old heathen days 25th December was a festival of the sun. If in the wisdom of our fathers in the faith people were weaned away from sun worship to the worship of Him Who is "the Sun of Righteousness" (Malachi 4. 2) we cannot condemn the substitution of a remembrance of Christ's birth, because it is of the highest importance that we should always have in mind the fact that Our Lord's birth was genuine; a human birth with all the perfection of manhood. He had a birthday, and we cannot begin now to search for an alternative date to 25th December.

* * *

We must rightly condemn the custom of associating with the remembrance of the birth of Jesus an immense amount of completely non-Christian self-indulgence, an orgy of commercial cashing-in on the occasion, and an assumption that here is "everyman's mid-winter festival". The true Christian remembrance of Our Lord's birth should resemble in character the remembrance of His glorious resurrection—"let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. 5. 8).

We do not condemn innocent and domestic rejoicing, especially on the part of children. We cannot admire the excessive and prohibitory zeal of Sir Edmund Gosse's father who would not tolerate even a small plum-pudding in his house on 25th December (see Sir Edmund Gosse—"Father and Son"). We believe that a sense of humour, if nothing more, should keep us from such exaggeration of feeling. But we are bound to distinguish from the fit Christian joy in commemorating Christ's incarnation the unrestrained secularisation of occasions of spiritual thanksgiving. Christmas as big business is one thing, and Christmas as loving recall of the Father's goodwill is another.

* * *

Again we repeat that the need to uphold the reality of the Incarnation is pressing in these days. We have denials and distortions of the truth on every side. Lying spirits are around us, and it behoves the regenerate to pay highest honour to Him Who was "Born to raise the sons of earth;

Born to give them second birth."

The familiar Wesley hymn is truly scriptural and the truly scriptural is what we need. By realising the truth of Revelation we best thank God.

The feast of the Nativity, call it what we will, marks year by year "the taking of manhood into God". It answers ancient Docetism and Adoptianism: more urgently, it answers errors which deny the true union of God and man in Christ Jesus. We have such errors at hand—Jehovah's so-called Witnesses for example foster some old Judaising heresy that Our Lord is no more than a "great angel". Against this we should arm ourselves with renewed faith, and share with all the company of Heaven the joy of heartfelt praise—"Behold upon the mountains the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace! Keep thy solemn feasts!" (Na. 1. 15).

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1959.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"A WELL-WORN THEME" CHURCH AND BIBLE.

Several times we have discussed in these pages the relationship of the Church to the Bible. We point out here, as we have done before, that by "the Church" we do not mean "the Roman Catholic Church". We mean the original Church of Christ before the passage of time brought error, and before the influence of secular Rome, capital of the great empire, fastened upon the bishopric of the city, and before the Eastern and Western parts of the Church separated. The Church of the Apostles and fathers has undergone much change, and the world has penetrated it deeply. Indeed it was so almost from the beginning, for the New Testament contains warnings of false teachings and usurpations to be guarded against. Though the Church may have tolerated much God disapproves of, yet if there is constant recourse to His Word the possibility of correction is not to be denied. Hence we had the Reformation in the sixteenth century. We give no indiscriminate admiration to the reformers, for we are aware of their faults and of the mixed motives of their lay associates, yet we ask "how could it be otherwise?" Those men were brought up in the worst days of the mediæval Church. They lived their impressionable years when the official Church was carrying on as if there was a vacant throne in Heaven. Kings, princes, rulers, clerical and lay, were alike in their will to exploit everything to their own advantage. Sometimes we hear lamentation that in the sixteenth century the Church was plundered; we may ask where the Church got the lands and wealth which made it a tempting field for pillage. How many great men thought that they might atone for their crimes by bequeathing much ill-gotten gain to the Church? We fear that the Church was not unwilling to assure the remorseful or the terrified that such transfer of property would be an advantage to them as it would lighten their future sufferings.

The Reformers may not be entitled to unqualified admiration, but if we consider them and their aims and teaching we cannot fail to hear the authentic New Testament note. We mark how they sought reform by the Word of God. They considered God's Word to be the Rule of Faith and they made it so. We believe that the Church of their day would have officially agreed that the Word was the Rule of Faith, because Tradition occupied a subordinate place until the Council of Trent, which inaugurated the Counter-Reformation raised it up to an equality with Holy Scripture.

* * *

This has, we believe, close bearing on our subject. If the Church acknowledged that the Bible is the Rule of Faith then it must subordinate its own thinking and decisions to the judgment of God's Word. By that it has acknowledged the supremacy of the Bible—henceforth the Bible governs the Church, not the Church the Bible.

* * *

We return to the situation in the early Church, and of course we agree that the New Testament was written within the Church, and by members of the Church. It did not grow up outside the Church. But when we have said that, we cannot suggest that the inspiration of the Holy Spirit was under ecclesiastical control. Holy Scripture is "theopneustos" (2 Tim. 3. 16)—"God-breathed". There is a direct power and compulsion to bring holy men to write. We do not find that they are commissioned by the Church, by council or bishop, to write. They do so spontaneously as the Spirit leads.

* * *

But, someone will say, by what process were the particular writings in the New Testament selected out of the larger body of early Christian writings? This is indeed the important question. Was the selection made officially, or did the Holy Spirit who inspired the writers, make sure that these, and no other writings, would be included as the New Testament canon of Holy Scripture? We give the unhesitating answer that there was no official act of selection—that no bishop of Rome, or any person or council acting under his authority settled its Bible for the Church of Christ.

* * *

"The first duty of an enquirer in this field is to determine whether or not there existed at an early period in the history of the Christian Church a positively official and authorised collection of books that was acknowledged by the whole of Christendom, that was everywhere and in precisely the same manner constituted and certain, and that corresponded exactly to the New Testament now generally in use"—these are the words of a competent Bible scholar, C. R. Gregory ("Canon and Text of the New Testament"). We may note that the Synod of Laodicaea in 363 A.D., i.e. about 300 years after the New Testament books could have been written, ordered the reading of the canonical books only. Plainly there was a recognised group of Christian writings at that date. We may suppose that most of the larger Christian centres had copies of all the New Testament books, probably in a single volume. If one worked back from the date of the Synod of Laodicaea towards the close of the first century or start of the second century it would show that nearly all the earliest Christian writers were acquainted with most of the New Testament books and referred to them as exceptional and significant books, and were disposed to rank them with the Old Testament books which were accepted as part of the Christian's Scriptures.

* * *

By the middle of the second century a rather erratic Christian personality appeared—a man named Marcion, son of a bishop of Sinope on the shore of the Black Sea. Marcion had odd ideas, and disliked the Old Testament. He determined to select a New Testament for himself, and did so by choosing the Gospel of St. Luke and ten epistles of St. Paul. He was well aware that he was rejecting some writings his fellow-Christians accepted, and thus, in the middle of the second century he bears testimony to the books generally acknowledged among Christians. Marcion's efforts to get rid of certain books failed, so we may regard this as proof that the New Testament books by their own intrinsic merits had established themselves firmly. They had needed no ecclesiastical sanctions of an official kind.

* * *

A few years later, about 176 A.D., a bishop, Melito of Sardes, prepared a sort of Scripture Anthology from the Old Testament, so he had a special interest in the Word of God (he even travelled to Palestine to make researches). In his writings which are earlier than the compiling of the anthology he shows acquaintance with all the New Testament writings except James, Jude, and II and III John. We must remember that the fact that these are not quoted is no proof that Melito did not know them.

It can be accepted that in general the New Testament writings were current and recognised among Christians by the middle of the second century. Obviously their field of circulation was where the Church was greatest, and where they were composed, and where their language was read and spoken, i.e. in the East. From the East (with the possible exception of St. Mark's Gospel) they spread westward. In the City of Rome the Christian community was for long enough Greek speaking, and so was the Church in parts of Southern Gaul. The day of Latin as an ecclesiastical language was still far ahead. The Holy Spirit's work, by its very nature, was bound to claim a unique place, and to secure a unique authority.

If we say, "nevertheless, it was the Church which by composition, acceptance, and use, gave these writings currency," we must, as we said at the outset, be careful over what we mean by the Church. It won't do to assent to the view that Protestants can claim the Bible and Rome can claim the Church. We can allow no such division. The evangelical Christian must not abandon the Church which is "Christ's Body". He must meet the position squarely, as our Reformers did, by saying that in the passage of the centuries, in ages of barbarism and darkness, in the slow growth and expanding power of Papal claims, the Church came into bondage to the rudiments of the world. It so far suffered deterioration that it tended to refuse all reformation. The prison and the stake awaited those who appealed for reform through the application of God's Word, as witness John Hus. The means of renewal were to hand at long last in the sixteenth century—the printed text of the New Testament. All honour to the memory of Erasmus, Luther, Tyndale, Coverdale, Ximenes and a host of others who made it possible to have a good text of the Bible.

* * *

A Roman Catholic writer, the Rev. F. J. Ripley in a recent C.T.S. pamphlet says, "The one and only way in which any man can be sure that the books of the Bible are true and inspired is through the infallible authority of the Catholic Church." He says that only part of divine tradition, the revealed truth handed down from the Apostles, was put into writing. Much the same sort of view is forced on public attention by Legion of Mary and other Roman Catholic bookstalls. We see one from time to time in Dublin which maintains that the Roman Catholic Church is "the Mother of the Bible". But we must ask if the Jew is bound to have recourse to the Church to be sure that his Testament is true and inspired? We believe that the Hebrew Canon of Scripture was in being before Our Lord was born—how could Israel have verified it by going to an infallible authority which did not exist?

The Church is not older than God's Word, for the Old Testament existed before the Incarnation. Then let us ask, if it be true at all, why the Church should have committed to writing only part of revealed truth, and kept the rest (an indefinite amount) for very gradual disclosure? If truths necessary to salvation were deliberately withheld from view, and not written for all to hear or read, we must be uneasy. But we may thank God that in the New Testament His Holy Spirit has given us all truth necessary to salvation. The fact is that the necessary part of Christian tradition is written down for all in God's Word.

We cannot allow that there are two sources of Revelation if by Revelation we mean truth necessary to be believed in order to be saved.

* * *

It may not be without interest to readers to contrast Fr. Ripley's sentence—"because the Church is bound to safeguard truth she had a duty [in the 16th century] to ensure that versions of the Bible offered to the faithful were accurate," with the well-known facts about the edition of the Latin Vulgate Bible Pope Sixtus V produced in 1590, and which was intended to be the reliable version of the Vulgate, i.e. the authentic Bible as the Council of Trent declared. The Sixtine Vulgate was so full of blunders that it had to be replaced by a new edition called after Pope Clement VIII the Clementine Vulgate. It has been calculated that the two editions differ from each other in about two thousand places!

* * *

Let us be well assured that the Bible we have is the sufficient revelation of saving truth for all men.

THE SUPREMACY OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES

(Continued)

The Place of Tradition

We need to move carefully in such a crowd of jostling contestants. It is obvious that the Church of Rome attaches a peculiar value to the written records contained in what we call the Bible. This is one of the heritages from the past that emerge so strangely in that very complicated system. But that is a very different thing from saying that the Church of Rome gives to Holy Scripture supreme and undisputed authority. She places besides the written Word of God two co-ordinate authorities—tradition and the living speaking voice of the Church.

The precise relation of these three authorities has never been defined accurately. Newman made an attempt. He states in his Letter to the Duke of Norfolk that the Church attaches the quality of "Inspiration" to Scripture, and the quality of "Assistentia" to tradition. He is discreetly silent on the living, speaking voice of the Church. That, as we know, was a very sore point with him about the period of his letter. If we were to accept Newman's view it would seem as if Scripture occupied the supreme place. "Assistentia" is a term borrowed from the ancient Roman procedure by which the Emperor was supplied with "Assistentes" to enable him to construe rightly Roman law and give an equitable decision. On one interpretation of this rather unusual word, Newman's position might be closely approximated to the Protestant position. As far as I know, there has been no decision given on the cogency of Newman's view in relation to Roman Catholic defined dogma. On another interpretation there could be traced a close affinity to Modernism. The "assistentes" would represent the modern judgments not wholly displacing, but nevertheless rather forcibly adjusting Scripture declarations to modern needs or imagined needs.

Protestants trace this indecisiveness in many modern Roman Catholic writers. At times they appear wholly to rely on the most literal application of Scripture passages. "Hear the Church" means that the Church issues its commands with imperial decisiveness. At other times they appear to offer a wide latitude of choice. "All have sinned" means all but one descendant of Adam have sinned, or, if Maura Laverty, the Irish novelist, is to be credited, possibly all but two, since she is not quite sure about Saint Joseph.

* * *

Papal Infallibility

After long controversy extending over the hundreds of years the living, speaking voice of the Church is concentrated in the reigning Pope. Dollinger, like Tyrell, was ruthlessly flung to the wolves because he urged the claims of history against this concentration of authority. Protestants believe that the last movement which gave unquestioned authority to a single individual has destroyed for ever any value that might be hitherto reposed in the Scripture. The combination of Scripture and Tradition gave an undue importance to the speculations of earnest and eminent ecclesiastical writers. The concentration of authority in a single individual who can, as it were, at a nod, reverse the pious judgment of antiquity, places the whole community at the mercy of any strong conviction or caprice that may possess that individual's mind. It is idle, in their judgment, to urge that the Holy Spirit will control the whole process, because that begs the question at issue, which is whether this assumption of authority is of the Spirit of God or a foolish invention of man. The doctrine of Papal Infallibility removes the Scripture from its place of authority. It does so more effectively than the earlier theory of the co-ordinate place of Scripture and Tradition.

* * *

The Protestant Position

I can imagine that my Roman Catholic hearers are getting impatient. They are asking, "Well! What have you to put in place of the Church's dogma?" We answer in the much misunderstood words of Chillingworth, the exile returned from Rome, "The Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants." On what grounds do we give this unique supremacy to the Bible? This is a question that is often asked, and demands a careful answer.

In the first place, we agree with the Church of Rome that one God is the Author both of the Old and New Testaments. The expression is perhaps one that we would not have chosen ourselves. But as we understand the phrase, it seems to convey a very definite and important meaning. In the Bible we believe, and our Roman Catholic friends believe with us, we have a great message from God to man. Other sources may reveal God, but in this message God directly reveals Himself. He employs human agents to make clear to our limited intelligence His mind and will. So far there is agreement between Protestants and Roman Catholics.

* * *

Modernists and Romanists Agree

But the question arises, Is this revelation completed? Strange to say, Modernists and Roman Catholics agree in stating that there is no need to maintain that this question must be answered in the affirmative. The argument has frequently been presented that both the Old and New Testaments are products of tradition. The message from God has been handed down from father to son, and there may be traditional elements that have escaped record in the Bible as we have it. Tradition meets this difficulty.

Well, Protestants do not accept that. They point out that there was no such opinion in Old Testament times. True indeed, the scribes and Pharisees in our Lord's time imposed many interpretations on the Old Testament. But they did not claim anything more than that learned interpreters placed a definite meaning on some Old Testament passages. Our Lord very strongly condemned these forced interpretations. He never suggested that those who were guilty of these blunders had altered the actual text of Scripture by adding to it or taking from it. The illustration by which He showed that the scribes released men of their duty to their parents if they gave to the temple, shows that it was misreading and no adding to the Scripture that occasioned the evil.

* * *

Progressive and Completed Revelation

But it can be said, "The Bible, as the Jews had it, took a long time to develop. Why should we think that a process extending over something like two thousand years should suddenly cease?" One generous critic asked, "Why should the end of revelation synchronise with the death of St. John?" The answer that the Protestant gives is that such questions simply make a mock of historic development. The processes of history are conveniently marked by certain historic events. But the causes of this historical development lie much deeper.

One great historic event introduces for us the close of God's revelation to man. It is nothing less than the Incarnation of the Son of God. The Bible itself bears witness to this connection between God's revelation and the manifestation of our Lord in the flesh. Consistently, the period that has supervened upon this great event is spoken of as "the last days." Protestants maintain that all revelation had for its purpose the preparation of the minds of men for this stupendous event. The slow process was not a mere accident. It was a necessary development of the great purpose of redemption. When our Lord came and spake as never man spake, nothing remained to be done but to make clear to His disciples the full meaning of life, death, resurrection, and coming again of the Lord of Glory. The Old Testament points forward continually to this great and final manifestation of God's grace and power. The supremacy of Scripture is closely allied with the supremacy of the Son of God. Nothing of divine importance can be added to the supreme revelation of the Incarnate Lord. It is for us the final message of hope and life. It contains all that we need as a guide to life and as a guarantee of glory. Tradition may sometimes, and does sometimes, help us to understand its significance, but it cannot add to it. No modern human being can impose on us an obligation to accept his decisions unless we can support them with the authoritative message contained in the Bible. When we pick up that Book and read it, we have a definite and complete message concerning the will of God for man. To suggest otherwise is, in our judgment, to disparage the Incarnation.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 136.

mother's consent. The religious belief of the mother was a genuine one.

Mr. Luft submitted that there was ample evidence for the findings of Deemster Kneale that the mother's consent was not unreasonably withheld.

Deciding the religious persuasion of the child was a fundamental right of parenthood whether the child was being retained by the parents or not, said Mr. Luft.

—"Belfast Newsletter", 16th Sept., '59.

* * *

Modern Creeds Needed—Churchmen's Plea

A motion seeking the formation of the Apostles' Creed in modern language was carried at the meeting of the Synod of Clydesdale of the Church of Scotland in Glasgow yesterday.

It asked that the synod should approach the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland "to consider the formation of a creed for use by the Church setting forth the fullness of the Christian message to the world in modern language." It was carried by 56 votes to 38.

The Rev. Alan G. Hasson of Bonhill, Southchurch, Dunbartonshire, who submitted the motion, described the Apostles' Creed as "a very scrappy collection of works" which did not adequately convey the fullness of the Christian message. He said:

"The normal member of the congregation is not a theological expert and in no position to know the background of various creeds whose terminology is out of date. I am disgusted with the scrappiness of the statements, in the Apostles' Creed, which appear to have been tagged on as an afterthought by the group who composed it."

The Rev. Thomas Crosbie, opposing the motion, said: "Until we get a more united Church we are in no position to do anything that would savour of trying to make a modern creed."

The Rev. Keith McWilliams, clerk of the synod, supporting the objection, said the idea of endeavouring to supplant these creeds was utterly repugnant.

Mr. Hasson said he refused to accept the view that the Church was divided.

The synod agreed unanimously that the General Assembly should be urged to ask the Pope directly to intervene to end persecution of Protestant minorities in certain Roman Catholic countries, particularly Colombia and Spain. Asked if the Pope would receive the letter, Mr. Hasson, who put forward the motion, said there was a different spirit in Rome to-day. The new Pope was "open-hearted" and would be ready to hear evidence.

—"The Guardian", 14th October, '59.

[This is a matter which comes up periodically. No one Church has any right to revise the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene Creed, though free to replace them by others. The revision project has always been prominent among "modernists". The English Modern Churchmen's Union made a Creed—excellent in what it affirmed, but remarkable for what it omitted, i.e., the Gospel facts of Our Lord's Incarnate life. Beware of these "revisions"].

	PAGE		PAGE
Aid, Inter-Church	2, 39	Forgiveness	55
Australia	2, 11, 110	Fundamentalists	65
America, Latin	3, 11, 39, 50, 64, 132	Furniss, Fr.	83
Arabs	13	Fatima	96
Advent, Second	56	Fatherhood of God	102
Assurance, Christian	66
Asia, Christians of	85	G
Assumption, The	87	Gideon Bibles	3
Africa	107	Gibson, Rev. Wm.	9, 30, 42, 59
Aspects of Prayer	112	"God the Son"	15
		Gift,, Constantine's	20
B		Garratt, Rev. Jas.	58
Bible and Ourselves	14	General Assembly	74
Birth of Christ	54, 136	God, Spirit of	75
Belfast	56	"Godless Colleges "	79
Beatty, Chester	62	Galway, R.C. Bishop of	79
Brazil	65, 105	Guidance of Conscience	82
Balmaceda, Rev. Richard	106	God	90, 102
Bible Only, The	114, 122, 138	Germany, East	97
Bride Abducted	121	Giff, Rev. Canon W. L. M.	117
C		H
Chile	3	Hotel Bibles	3
Colombia	3	History and Bible	14
Crookshanks' "Methodism"	8	Hammond, Archdeacon	33, 69, 82, 140
Christian Science	15	Hammond, Archdeacon	33, 69, 82
Correspondence	17	Hezekiah	68
Church Unity	18, 28, 52	Hebrew Christians	111
Communism	28, 65	History, Social	130
Carson, Dr. J. C. L.	31
Carson, Rev. J. T.	32	I
"Cruel God, A"	38	Italy	3
Cock-fighting	44	Incarnation, The	6
Canon Law	50	Inquiry Centre, R.C.	38
Cuba	50	Inter-Church Aid	39
China	63	Israel, News from	45
Confession and Protestants	69	Intercession of Christ	55
Cullen, Cardinal	81	Isaiah	65
Coates, Rev. R. J.	92	Ireland, Church and State in	71
Canada	109	International Missionary Council	110
Chillingworth, Wm.	114	Irish in England	121
Christmas	136	Irish Political Tension	122, 133
D		J
Donation of Constantine	20	"J.B.S."	5, 98
D'Alton, Cardinal	29, 52	Jerusalem	13
Dodd, Dr. C. H.	36	John V	15
Dublin Harbour	37	"Jehovah's Witnesses "	15, 38, 54, 92
Deity, Christ's	40	Jews, Survival of	47
Devlin, Joseph, M.P.	42	Jews, The	62, 111, 128
Dublin Revival	59	Japan	63
Displaced Persons	74	John, Pope	97, 120
Duhr, Rev. Joseph, S.J.	86	Jesus, Sayings of	108
Divorce in Germany	97	Jordan, Mr. W. K.	130
Diognetus, Epistle to	129
		K
E		Kingsley, Rev. Chas.	23
Evangelical Radio	2	Kerry Revival	59
"Early Church History"	5	Kerry, Bishop of	73
England, Rome in	23, 121	Korea, South	107
Ecumenical Council	25, 28, 134	Kingship of Christ	123
England and Council	25, 27
East, Christians in	85
Ernst, Dr.	87
"Evangelical Magazine"	119
Evenett, Mr. H. O.	128

	L	PAGE	R	PAGE
Latin America	3, 39, 50, 64, 132		Refugees, Arab	13, 39
Lowe, Very Rev. Dr.	5		Roman Catholic Revolution	22
Lewis Revival	17		Reformation, The	23, 126
Lloyd, Canon Roger	20		Resurrection, The	35
Liberal Revolution	22		Rico, Rev. Jose M.	39
Levy, Professor H.	47		Revival, Ulster	8, 30, 42, 56
Law, Canon	50		Return of Christ	56
Londonderry	57		"Revivalism"	58
Lord's Prayer	104		"Reunion Essays" (Fr. Carson)	99
			Religion, Useless, Bishop Ryle on	105
			Reviews	117, 130
	M
Moral Rearmament	1		S
Mazierski, Rev. R.	1		Spain	1, 13
Montano, Rev. W.	3, 22		Statistics, R.C.	1, 3, 12, 64, 96, 121, 132
Merrill, Dr.	5		Southwell, Bishop of	14
McCabe, Joseph	7		Sylvester, Pope	20
Montanus	9		Scotland	25
Marriages, Mixed	37, 75		Soper, Dr. Donald	28
Micah	68		Schism	33
Masses Banned	73		Scott, Dr. Jas	49
Maynooth	81		Second Advent	56
Modernism	122		Sayings of Christ	64, 108
Manning, Cardinal	127		"Sunday Press", Dublin	64
			Spiritism	65
	N		Schools in Ireland	78
Newman, J. H., D.D.	23, 81		Scandinavia	119
Nelson, Rev. I.	31		"Strangers and Pilgrims"	129
"In Temere"	37
Nationalists, Ulster	49		T
Nash, Fr., S.J.	64		"Thou Art My Son"	6
"Non-Catholics"	71		Translation of N.T.	28
National University	80		Trent, Council of	'66, 127
			Trinity College, Dublin	79
	O		Trim, Co. Meath	117
Orr, Rev. Dr. J. E.	9, 31		Trevor-Roper, Mr. Hugh	130
Oriental Churches	25		Tisserant, Cardinal	134
Our Lady, Statue of	37
One Mediator	55		U
Our Lord and His Mother	86, 99		"Upon This Rock"	4
			Ulster Revival, 1859	8, 30, 42, 56, 130
	P		United States	1, 14, 26, 109
Protestants, Italian	3, 50		Unity, Church	18, 25, 52, 73, 134
Peru	4		Ulster Roman Catholics	49
Peter, St.	5		United States Bishop at Lambeth	72
Peake, Dr.	5		University Education in Ireland	78
Psalms II	6		Useless Religion	105
Palestine	13
Protestants, Spanish	13, 61		V
"Protestant"	15		Vicissitudes of Papacy	33
Pope and Unity	25		Virgin Mary Forgotten?	120
Paisley, Rev. I.	32
Papacy, The	33		W
Priest, Story of a	39, 106		World Refugee Year	2, 74
Philippines	61, 106, 120		Watkin, Mr. E. J.	23
Patrick, St.	61, 117		Wilson, Professor R. J. D.D.,	27, 51
Papyri	62		Week, Christian Aid	48, 74
I Peter 2. 11, A Note on	129		World Council of Churches	52, 74
Persecution in Colombia	132		Ward, Rev. H.	58
			World Anglicans	72
	Q		Worker Priests	84, 113
Queen's Colleges in Ireland	79		Women, Ordination of	119
Queen's University in Ireland	79		Y
			Yesterday, To-day, To-morrow	54

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1
QUARTER PAGE	10/-
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/-

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY
7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,
5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

"An Account of Archbishop James Usher"

By N. D. EMERSON

2/- Post Free, this office

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

LEVEL
ONE

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 1—LXIX.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-
deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	1
Facts and Impressions Concerning the Church in Russia	2
The Meaning of Protestantism	4
The Story of a Priest	5
Editor's Chair	6
An Early Puritan Bishop	8
Manifold Temptation	10

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

World Refugee Year

These two excerpts from "The Irish Times" offer matter for thought. We welcome the President's address; an address worthy of the occasion and the man, and we urge readers to do what they can to assist this world-wide appeal for a world-wide need.

The second (though earlier) cutting is a sad reflection on us here. We lived in peace, comfort and plenty all the years that people just as virtuous and blameless as ourselves were suffering the loss of every earthly thing—"bear one another's burdens" is a Gospel rubric which evidently does not apply in Buttevant, Co. Cork.

President Appeals for Refugees

The President, Mr. de Valera, in a broadcast speech from Radio Eireann last night on the World Refugee Year, said that in God's providence we in this country had been spared the miseries of the last war, and he asked people to give in thanksgiving and charity "whatever you can afford to aid those who have experienced these miseries to the full."

Mr. de Valera said that he was speaking on one of the saddest of present-day human problems—the plight of those who, during the last World War and the period of international tension and uncertainty that has followed it, had been compelled by force to leave their homes and countries. These refugees, in foreign lands and among foreign peoples, with family ties disrupted and without a home, wives separated from husbands, children from parents, exist almost on sufferance.

15,000,000 in Poverty

Some 40,000,000 human beings, nearly ten times the population of the whole of Ireland, had been involved in this terrible catastrophe. A great deal had been done by official and private organisations to lighten their sufferings and bring them relief, but there were still 15,000,000 in poverty and in exile, and at least 2,000,000 desperately in need of immediate and effective assistance.

The President said that the United Nations' Assembly considered the position last December and decided to make an all-out global effort to achieve a final resettlement and rehabilitation of these unhappy people. It was agreed to set aside one year, to be called the World Refugee year, during which all the nations would concentrate attention on this aim and purpose. The year began last June. Up to the present, 60 countries, including our own, were participants.

"I need not attempt to picture for you the intense suffering the refugees have had to endure," said Mr. de Valera. "Those who have read history or followed public events in, say, the last 20 years, must themselves realise what war, devastation, persecution, eviction and hunger mean to the individual and to the families affected. It is sufficient to say that the refugees have had experience of them all."

Millions Still In Camps

He asked his listeners to think of the millions still huddled promiscuously in the camps, the only home that the younger groups in them had ever known, and added: "Is there anyone who is not prepared to play his part in giving these displaced outcasts a normal life and restoring to them their dignity as human beings?"

He said the members of the Irish Red Cross Society had been asked to undertake the collection of subscriptions throughout the country. Their appeal was sponsored by the Government and by the Churches. He went on: "I am speaking to you as President, to add my word to the general appeal. I ask you to do your utmost to make the response proportionate to the need, and worthy of the reputation we have gained as a generous Christian nation."

—(9th November, '59).

Red Cross Branch Not To Collect

The Buttevant branch (Co. Cork) of the Irish Red Cross Society decided at its annual general meeting not to hold a collection in connection with the World Refugee Year on the grounds that the great Powers were the authors of the refugees' misfortunes and should provide fully for their rehabilitation.

The view was expressed that portion of the

—(Continued on p. 11.)

Principal E. L. Williams, M.A., presents . . .

FACTS AND IMPRESSIONS CONCERNING THE CHURCH IN RUSSIA

In "The Vigilant", Melbourne, Sept. '59.

After a brief visit during which we spent one week in each of the countries visited, no member of the delegation would claim to be an authority on the total situation in Russia, Czechoslovakia, and China. We readily recognise the limitations of our experience; but there are facts and impressions from what we saw and were told which we are glad to share.

Hospitality and Programme

In Russia we were received by representatives of the Russian Orthodox Church and the Union of Evangelical Christian Baptist Churches. Accommodation was provided in hotels, and we were accompanied at meals and in all our travels by two Orthodox Priests and an interpreter who was not a churchman. There were often other churchmen who were attached to the party. Hospitality was exceedingly generous, and our programme was conducted with marked efficiency.

We were asked what we wished to see, and our requests were met with the responses: "Your wish is our will"; "It will be arranged." So it was. Consequently, we visited many places of interest, but our primary concern was contact with Churches and Christians. A number of church services were attended, in both Moscow and Leningrad, and one day we went to Zagorsk, about fifty miles out of Moscow, where we attended a service. This is the locality of the ancient monastery of St. Sergius, and is now the centre of a theological seminary and academy. All was interspersed with a barrage of questions and answers.

Church Statistics

No exact statistics on the membership of the Russian Orthodox Church were given, but it is estimated that there are thirty million members. Other figures are more exact. In round figures there are twenty thousand local congregations or communities, thirty-three thousand clerics and priests, two thousand students, and fifty-five monasteries.

Outside the Orthodox Church, the largest denomination is that of the Union of Evangelical Christian Baptists. These are commonly known simply as Baptists. Their membership is five hundred and forty baptised believers, with a constituency of about three million. They are limited in the number of buildings allowed to them, there being only one in Moscow, where there is a membership of four thousand, five hundred.

In the Trans-Carpathian area there is a community of the Reformed Church stemming from Hungarian Calvinists. There are small numbers of Methodists and Seventh Day Adventists, and a considerable number of Lutherans in the Baltic States.

Church Attendances.

On Thursday in Moscow we attended the Baptist meeting for prayer and Bible study. Each member of the delegation brought a greeting. The language of the hymns was foreign, but the themes and tunes were well known to us: "Bless Be the Tie That Binds", "I Need Thee Every Hour", "What a Friend We have in Jesus", and finally, "God be With You Till We Meet Again", accompanied by waving of handkerchiefs. The building was packed beyond proper capacity, with fifteen hundred people standing in aisles and on stairways.

The following Sunday afternoon we attended a Baptist service in Leningrad. The building was similarly crowded with some fifteen hundred people. When we returned to Moscow on Tuesday, we unexpectedly attended a service at 6 p.m. for the communion of the Lord's Supper at the Baptist Church. They had not been able to accommodate all on the previous Sunday, and the building was packed again with its over-crowd of fifteen hundred people. It was interesting to note that one large loaf was used and broken into small pieces by the deacons during the service. Small individual cups were not used, but a small number of large community cups.

Large numbers were seen in the worship services of Orthodox Churches. Most notable were the seven thousand where we attended a service on Saturday evening in Moscow, and three thousand in a service on Sunday morning in Leningrad.

The age-old emphasis of the Orthodox Church is upon worship, which is conducted with elaborate ritual and liturgy. While we could not understand the language, it appeared to us that there was a simple, sincere, and fervent devotion. This devoutness appeared to us in the priests with whom we had close connection, and found marked expression when one of them said when we were involved in discussion about the Church: "My grandfather was a priest, my father was a priest; I love my Church and would die for it."

A disturbing fact about the worshipping communities was the great preponderance of older people. There were some young people, and notably some young men in uniforms. We were also interested to observe a baptismal service in Leningrad, when about twenty babes were brought by their parents for baptism according to the tradition of the Orthodox Church. We were told that in some churches there are one hundred and fifty to two hundred such baptisms each week. The priests said that great numbers of parents bring their children for baptism, and one of our host priests, who was from the Ukraine, said that practically all parents in the Ukraine bring their children for baptism.

We were impressed by the apparent strength of priests whom we met, and by the measure of youthful leadership we observed. The number of young men between eighteen and thirty offering for the priesthood is beyond the capacity of the training institutions, and competitive entrance examinations are held.

The Position of the Church

Church and State are quite separate. There is no established or State Church. It is clear, however, that the Church is under surveillance of the State, for there is a State Council for Orthodox Belief and also one for other religious beliefs. There is a likeness to the position of the early Church under the Caesars, in that each religious community must be registered.

All land belongs to the State. Church buildings on such land are reserved for the use of the Church with the permission of the State. A group of twenty believers may apply for a church building, and if permission is given by the State Council the Church may build at its own cost. Money is raised by the gifts of church members and by the sale of altar candles and oil, etc. The Church does not repudiate profit for a good cause. Candles costing one rouble (about 2/-) are sold for three roubles.

The Church is allowed to pursue its religious life, but must make no direct excursions into politics. The Church, as the Church, makes no pronouncements on issues outside of its own life. It is left for individual believers to try to bring their influence to bear in the total life of the community. Our impression would be that the Church cannot exercise a prophetic ministry in the sense of declaring the whole council of God in its radical application to the whole of life. When we make such a critical judgment we do well to ask at the same time to what extent any Church anywhere in the world would have complete freedom to pursue a completely prophetic ministry. However, our measure of freedom is something for which we should humbly give thanks.

The religious life of the Church in Russia is confined to worship, teaching, and preaching, within limits. These ministries may be exercised in the church buildings, and priests may also go to the homes of believers to teach, and go to homes to give counsel where they are invited. All are free to attend churches, and others may gather in homes of believers. It is significant to observe that the initiative must be taken by the people in applying for the erection of a church building, in opening their homes for teaching, and in inviting a priest to give counsel. Church publications may be distributed to worshippers or sent to subscribers through the post. The Church is there for those who want it. Those who are not baptised in infancy may not be baptised until eighteen years of age. Within these limitations the Church is free to pursue its religious life, and individuals are free to ally themselves with Christ and the Church.

People are not allowed to belittle believers and the priesthood. As we moved about in the general community on railway stations, in trains and shops, and on the street there appeared to be respect for the priests who were our companions. Atheistic propaganda is not allowed within the precincts of a church building.

This does not mean that Communism has given up its anti-religious philosophy and its propagation of atheism. As evidence we culled a notice from Moscow News of 4th July, published in English. It was headed, Science and Religion, and noted that in September the first issue of a magazine under the above title would appear. Part of the notice read: "It will carry articles subjecting religious ideologies to critical analysis, others devoted to the overcoming of religious prejudices, to the history and theory of scientific atheism, and to methods of carrying on atheistic propaganda, etc."

There are six million members of the Communist Party, and eleven million members of the Komsomol (Young Communists' League), which consists of those between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five years. No Christians are members of these organisations. Christians are not excluded by the organisations, but they do not choose to be included. It is perfectly clear that Christians, even if they accept the socialistic programme of Communism, recognise the basic contradiction between the philosophy of Communism and Christianity. They see that Christianity cannot be identified with Communism in its entirety in the same way as we see that it cannot be identified with Capitalism in its entirety.

The fact is clear that the Church exists in Russia. It is reasonable to assume that the State has discovered that religion does not easily and inevitably wither away. Indeed, maybe it is like a nail; the harder you hit it, the further you drive it in.

With all its faults and limitations, the Church has proved, and continues to prove, the religious philosophy expressed by Gamaliel: "If this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it" (Acts 5:38-39).

Our Christian faith commits us to bear witness to God in Christ under whatever system we have to live out our lives. By that same faith we are committed to reach out hands of fellowship to our brethren in all lands. This we have sought to do, and are confirmed in the conviction that this is what we ought to continue to do.

THE MEANING OF PROTESTANTISM

I. Protestantism must teach its own people and everybody else what it stands for.

We are not matching the efforts of the Roman Catholics in that respect, either in the press or on the air—or in the moving pictures, not even in our own churches. One part of the responsibility here lies with the several councils and federations of Protestant churches; yet, our various denominations belong to those councils and are responsible for initiating the necessary action. Each and every one of our churches is responsible for the instruction of his own household. There is no weapon so powerful as information, especially when that information embodies the sublime truth we believe ourselves to possess.

II. We must win more and more converts to the Christian faith.

Roman Catholicism depends for its growth almost entirely upon the cradle. That is why it is so implacably hostile to birth control. Protestants suffer from a diminishing birth rate. Yet, we are in theory intensely evangelical; we believe in a "gathered" church, a church made up of converts won out of the world. But the "old line" denominations are failing of their duty at that very point.

And just there the so-called "small sects" enter the picture again, only in a different role from that played in Europe of the XVIth and XVIIth centuries. They are winning converts; they are doing more than any others to make sure that Protestantism holds its own in the census reports. In that respect they are putting the "old line" denominations to shame.

Our Lord once said, "To him that hath shall be given." Surely there is no better illustration of that principle than would be found in a Protestant policy of triumph by evangelism. Incidentally, that is precisely what has been happening in the southern part of the United States for more than a century. Southern Baptists in particular, but Southern Methodists also in somewhat slighter degree, have simply won the south for Protestantism by evangelistic effort.

III. Protestant churches must accept their responsibility for the social betterment of humanity.

I need not tell you that all over the world the mind of mankind is in a ferment of discontent with life as it is, especially insofar as life is affected by questions of race, standards of living, and that type of social problem which might be called "delinquency", whether juvenile or adult. Up until now Protestants have done practically nothing about such problems except to preach the Gospel and that has been tremendously important, but millions of those who most need the Gospel never darken the door of a church. Civic authorities everywhere are not only alert but actively engaged in the endeavour to cope with social problems, especially within the large cities, but whatever the fine quality of their work they make no pretence of importing the power of the grace of God into social service. Only when a church attacks a social problem can that be done and with a few pathetically puny exceptions the only one attempting to do so is the Roman Catholic Church.

Lately a committee of Baptists interviewed the Registrar of the School of Social Service in Toronto about enrolling one of our ministers for training there and was greeted with praise because Baptists are awaking to a sense of their duties and opportunities. The committee was told that Roman Catholics by the score are being trained for social service, whereas hardly a Protestant worker can be found in training for service within a religious context.

Speaking of Baptists, there was a great man amongst us a few years ago who became famous for a saying about the primitive Christians. He said that they triumphed over the Roman Empire because they out-thought, out-lived, and out-died the pagans round about them. That, as I see it, is the only hope for the survival of Protestantism, and what an honorable survival that will be.

—(Dr. H. N. Parker, Divinity School, Hamilton, Ontario, in "The Sentinel", September, '59).

THE STORY OF A PRIEST

THE REVD. FR. JUAN E. ROLDAN

Fr. Juan Roldan is an instance of conversion in face of great difficulties. It is comparatively easy for a Roman Catholic priest to become and continue an evangelical Christian in the British Isles—we are acquainted with three Church of England clergymen who some years ago were in the priesthood in Italy. In England they can follow the path according to truth and conscience—Had they tried to be evangelical Christian pastors in Italy under the Lateran treaty and Concordat they would have found it well-nigh impossible. It is easy indeed to leave the ministry of the Church of Rome in the United States of America and to follow another religious or secular mode of life. Great numbers have done so, and in the free atmosphere of Anglo-Saxon democracy the adoption of a new way of life is open to all.

But it is a different matter in states where the Roman Catholic Church is in the ascendant and separation from it is accounted a crime. In Latin America or Spain the man who gives up a ministry he can no longer conscientiously uphold is in grave difficulties. His motives are misrepresented and his character blackened, and his prospects impeded.

Fr. Roldan belonged to Colombia, South America. One day he was visiting a colleague in a small town. During the time he was in the town an itinerant colporteur from the United States arrived and began distributing Christian literature and portions of Holy Scripture. Fr. Roldan's friend, the local priest, directed the village policeman to collect all the booklets, etc., handed round by the colporteur, including Bibles, and had them piled up in the square. When the policeman had more or less finished his task the priest set fire to the pile and warned the by-standers that if they did not destroy all such literature they would themselves burn forever. No doubt this is (or was) a commonplace threat calculated to frighten the simple and uneducated, but it had a deep effect on Fr. Roldan. It brought him to a decision. We may well suppose that his faith had been wavering for some time, and that it did not take a great deal to overthrow it. He was fifty years of age, and at fifty few men are likely to go into the wilderness. We have met middle-aged Roman Catholic clergymen who had quietly come round to convictions which made them liberal rather than Roman, but at their age they were not prepared to face a new world which had little welcome or use for them. In fact the problem of adaptation is a very serious one.

Fr. Roldan gave up his ministry as a priest and took to school-teaching (whether a former priest could do this to-day in Colombia we cannot tell). Later he married and reared a family. He was exemplary in conduct, and his Christian witness was widely respected.

After some thirty years in the evangelical faith Juan Roldan, aged 82, fell ill in 1945. Many efforts were made to secure a death-bed recantation though he was regularly ministered to by his own Protestant pastor. He died firmly holding to the evangelical faith though after he had lost consciousness his house was almost forcibly entered by the local mayor and some policemen and a priest who administered the last rites. A North American Presbyterian missionary was present at this but unable to intervene. He was able to say that Juan Roldan was not conscious of what was being done.

Later, the family and friends were not permitted to bury Roldan in the non-Roman Catholic burying ground. His remains were forcibly taken from them and interred with Roman Catholic rites.

This closing episode is unimportant but the history of Roldan shows that the Church never gave up its purpose to regain him alive or dead. The claim that he recanted before death was enough for the purpose of prestige and propaganda. Thus in South America and many Latin countries the real convert has need of a special measure of perseverance and an abiding confidence that God is with him.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

ROME STATISTICAL.

How many Christians are there in the world? How many Roman Catholics are there? How many Protestants?

These questions are more interesting than important. There must necessarily be a great difference between the number of nominal Christians and the number of real ones—the first figure may be vaguely computed by the statisticians: the second is known only to God.

The number of Protestants is also problematical. Are we to class as Protestants all non-Roman Catholics? Are we to say Protestants are professing Christians, who admit no allegiance to Rome? In this case we will be bound to include the Eastern Orthodox and other similar churches which in fact have never been Roman or Protestant; and this immediately shows our definition to be wrong.

Again, if we define Protestants as professing Christians who are separate from Rome we may be including people and creeds which have no place, and ought to have no place, in historic Protestantism. No real Protestant in the positive historic sense of the term, will accept being put in the same category as Christian Scientists, Seventh Day Adventists, 'Witnesses', Swedenborgians, Christadelphians, Unitarians, and such like.

How then shall we define Protestants? First, by affirmations, not denials. By affirming the ancient Creeds; by affirming that they are based on God's Word; by affirming God's Word as the Rule of Faith; by declaring the truths of the Gospel, i.e. evangelical witness. Secondly, by acceptance of the doctrines of the Reformed Confessions of Faith of the Reformation period. Thirdly (a long way after); by the negative position of repudiating the additions to the ancient Creeds, made by the late Middle Ages and defined by the Roman Council of Trent and later developments, and by rejecting the claims of the Bishops of Rome to authority over all souls and bodies. This is "Papal supremacy", which we disown. We also disown the dogma of Infallibility.

* * *

By this definition of Protestantism we exclude false developments of the Christian faith whether they be developments into contemporary Roman Catholicism, or developments into extravagances of thought and interpretation arising out of a Protestant environment. We want no vagaries of human speculation: no hallucinations masquerading as revelations (as, for example, in Swedenborg): no figments of human self-conceit or megalomania.

How shall we secure this, and avoid the natural reproach that these things, on the Protestant side, are the natural results of overthrowing the authority of the Church? We reply, that God's Word written, neither added to nor subtracted from, is the authentic divinely-sealed Christian tradition and we interpret it as it interprets itself, and as it was understood in the first age of the Church.

That primitive understanding our fathers recaptured at the time of the Reformation. They invented no new doctrines, and they created no new faith or religion. We are safe from human inventions if we keep to the Word.

* * *

We frankly admit our inability to estimate the number of responsible evangelical Protestants in the world to-day. Like the number of Christians generally, it must be less than the Census forms suggest.

* * *

Are we to be apprehensive over this? No. We regret it, but it causes no alarm, for there has never been any assurance that there must be an overwhelming evangelical Christian majority before the end of the age. The rise and fall of statistics in such an issue means nothing at all.

The Bible never tells us that majorities must be right. To be out of step on the parade ground is no doubt improper—there we must recognise that to be odd-men-out is a mistake. But the Kingdom of Heaven is not a parade ground, and in it a minority of one may be right, and the rest quite wrong.

* * *

We write this because it seems to us deeply misleading to say that, for instance, France has 50,000,000 inhabitants: of these 1,500,000 are Protestants, and therefore 48,500,000 are Roman Catholics; or to say that Great Britain has 50,000,000 inhabitants, and when you deduct from this figure the ascertained numbers of Dissenters, Roman Catholics and Jews etc., the result gives you the number of members of the Church of England.

To claim between four and five hundred millions of the world's inhabitants as Roman Catholics is a similar sort of claim, for it is based on no serious examination of statistics of real conviction.

* * *

World statistics in any subject are but estimates; and the rate of increase of population does not march parallel with the statistics for any religion. If China claims 600,000,000 Communists because the government of this number of people is Communist we see at once how unreliable such claims are. If it is claimed that South America is a Roman Catholic Continent because in older days it was owned by Spain and Portugal in their Roman Catholic heyday we can show that such a claim is well-nigh meaningless, because the Church itself does not even provide for the religious needs of that Continent.

How do we know that? We know it from the statements made from Roman Catholic sources, as well as from the information available from Protestant sources.

This is part of the largest problem of assessing the numerical strength of Rome in the twentieth century. The problem was recently discussed in a very informative article in "The Leader" Dublin, by the Revd. M. O'Carroll, C.S.Sp. Fr. O'Carroll has been objective and painstaking, and with full acknowledgment we beg to quote a little from him.

The total world population as given by the United Nations Organisation is 2800,000,000. But who can tell? North America and Europe may be fairly accurately estimated, but Africa and Asia cannot. The figure is, in spite of the query, the best we have.

In relation to this world figure Fr. O'Carroll quotes two Roman Catholic estimates of Roman Catholic adherents—one in 1955 of 480,000,000, and one in 1959 of 520,000,000. He asks "has there been an increase of 40,000,000 in four years?"

The Continent of Africa is examined. The 1955 figure for Roman Catholics in Africa was stated to be 21,000,000. The figure given in 1959 is 26,000,000. Fr. O'Carroll asks if the increase is really over 5,000,000 in four years—he adds that the previous figure for increase was given at some $\frac{3}{4}$ million per year, and wonders if it has suddenly jumped to over a million.

From our point of view we see no need to suggest that any such figures are deliberately misleading. We believe that the spirit of optimism plays its part, and also that significant increases in certain localities tend to be made continent-wide by multiplication. If the estimated total population in twenty five years has increased by x it is easy to assume that the Roman Catholic population has grown by x too. The natural growth of the family is a factor to be considered—taking it into account, we need not assume that increases are due to conversions from heathenism or Islam solely. The sad thing about Central Africa, South of Sudan and Sahara is the steady advance of Islam. We agree that Islam is better far than African fetishism or demon-worship, or paganism—but Islam is not the Gospel, and the challenge of Africa, pagan or Islamic remains.

We should never rest content and complacent in our domestic wellbeing and spiritual ease. We hope the days are long past in which it could be told to a young man anxious to evangelise the heathen that he had better stay at home and study the Bible. Such ignorant and contemptuous advice overlooked the fact that the study of the Bible must make plain the Christian's duty of going into all the world to preach the Gospel to all mankind.

Equally ignorant and equally fallacious was the statement to a would-be-missionary—"if God wants the conversion of the heathen He can do it without your assistance". No man has the right to employ that "if": God has told us, not what He wants, but what we are to do.

* * *

Fr. O'Carroll's article brings us to South America, and he says that the Latin American Council of Bishops reported fairly recently that less than 10% of Latin American women practice their religion, and little more than 3% of the men. By practising their religion we understand regular attendance at Mass and at least annual attendance at the confessional and receiving of Holy Communion.

The average percentage of practising Roman Catholics in South America and Central America is around 6%. It is claimed by statistics however, that in those lands there are over 150,000,000

Roman Catholics. Fr. O'Carroll asks "how can we know that the others are even baptised?" if only 6% practise their religion. Here again is the problem of statistics. They are quantitative, not qualitative; and it is apparently not possible to do more than to estimate the entire population of Central and South America and the Carribean, and after very minor deductions, to say that they are all Roman Catholics.

It should be added that Fr. O'Carroll has been reliably informed that despite general laxity and indifference parents usually make a point of having infants baptised. This being so, the Roman Catholic habit of reckoning all baptised as their's for ever will justify impressive statistics.

* * *

Reverting to France of which we wrote at the outset, Fr. O'Carroll recalls that the Archbishop of Paris, Cardinal Feltin, said that not more than 10% of his flock practised their religion, and made the bare minimum of observance—Mass on Sunday and Communion at Easter. Authors of a book on "France Pays de Mission" ask if it is not true that over 9,000,000 urban citizens of the industrial classes have not been baptised.

Proportionably this may be true of other nominally Roman Catholic European lands. We believe that Italy is far from being wholeheartedly Roman Catholic. In fact, it has (or is said to have) the largest Communist party in Western Europe. Belgium has a large percentage of indifference, and even Spain and Portugal where the Church is stronger than in most places, show very discouraging figures.

* * *

The situation of Roman Catholic peoples within the Iron Curtain is naturally unknown to us. Before the Hungarian rising of 1957 we regularly received a Government sponsored bulletin of the Roman Catholic Church in Hungary. Its tone was optimistic, and suggested that all was well and secure. This was propaganda. It no longer comes our way.

Probably Czechoslovakia is much the same. Where the Church is on suffrance large numbers will desert it. It cannot be an advantage to the temporal interests of any citizen to proclaim loyalty to any sort of Christianity. But we have no information on which to build even momentary conclusions.

What we learn from the article we have quoted is to distrust global statistics. We believe that the machinery does not exist, so far, to furnish us with accurate numbers of any world-wide creed. Still less can we be supplied with numbers for non-Christian religions.

Fr. O'Carroll gives us something to ponder over when he tells us that "Christians of all denominations are less than one third of the human race." His own co-religionists are less than one fifth of the world population—"world statistics are racing ahead of us". That sentence affects all of us, especially when we link it with an earlier one—"the global increase of Islam, probably the dominant statistical fact of the age." Thirty years ago it was commonplace to say that Islam, rivetted to an inflexible creed and an iron-clad social system could not be adapted to the modern world, and must progressively weaken. To-day Fr. O'Carroll reminds us that in the last forty years Roman Catholicism in the world increased by only eighty millions, while Islam added a hundred and fifty millions to their creed.

In face of this we return to the point he made earlier, that real Christians cannot be enumerated by statistics. That the people of God are known to Him alone is, we believe a plain truth of His revealed Word. The plans of the future are His. Christianity as a group of systems may rise or sink, but the faith of God's elect is imperishable, and is to be found within all systems bearing the Christian name.

AN EARLY PURITAN BISHOP

MYLES COVERDALE

By The Rev. C. Sydney Carter, M.A., DD., F.R.Hist.S.

Myles Coverdale was born near Middleham in the North Riding of Yorkshire in 1485, and at a suitable age he was sent to the Augustine's monastery at Cambridge, of which the celebrated Dr. Robert Barnes, later executed for "heresy", was Prior. He was admitted to Priest's Orders in 1514 and took the degree of B.C.L. at Cambridge in 1531 and later received the degree of D.D. at Tübingen in 1540. In 1535 he published his translation of the whole Bible on which he had been engaged for several years. It was published at Zürich and probably never received Henry VIII's sanction. Apparently from the reading of "Wycliffe's Wicket" Coverdale had embraced the view that the blessed Sacrament was only a remembrance of Christ's Body. About the same time he preached against the worshipping of images in the church and taught that confession of sins to a priest was not obligatory or really necessary. In 1537 two other editions of Coverdale's Bible were published by a bookseller in Southwark. In the same year Tyndale's translation of the Scriptures appeared as far as the end of Chronicles and Jonah. The rest of the Old Testament was supplied by Coverdale's separate translation, of which he published a new edition in Paris in 1538, and in London in 1539. Apparently after the execution of his friend Cromwell in 1540, Coverdale left England for Germany, where he resided first at Tübingen and later at Bergzabern in the duchy of Deuxponts, where he kept a school and had a pastoral charge on account of his knowledge of German. It was at this time that Coverdale married Elizabeth Macheson, a Scotswoman, who was a great comfort to him. Richard Hilles referred to Coverdale at this time in a letter to Henry Bullinger as "one who is very dear and honorably esteemed by all ministers of the Word. He is anxious for the Truth and inflamed with zeal for obeying the will of God." In dealing with the resurrection of the body, Coverdale quotes St. Paul to show that through God's grace and power it will be made immortal and incorruptible.

He carefully examines St. Augustine's and St. Jerome's teaching on the resurrection body, which he endorses. He declares that a glorified body will be spiritual and have the substance of flesh like Christ's. It will be one purged and cleansed from all frailty and vileness. He believes that the bodies of unbelievers will also rise again in accordance with Isaiah's prophecy in ch. lxxvi. 24, where we read of "the carcases of men who have transgressed against Me"—that "their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched".

About the year 1554 Coverdale wrote a very searching and faithful message to the Gospel adherents in England at this time. It was an exhortation on carrying Christ's Cross. He reminded his readers that affliction and persecution is no strange thing to God's children who are "citizens of heaven, and if they shrink not, but go on forward", all the power of their enemies will not overcome them. The Papists, he says, "are puffed up against poor Christ and His people. But when God hath tried His children and made them like His Christ, He will come with the blast of a trumpet and we shall be caught up in the clouds to meet Him in the air. Let us consider the shortness of this present time wherein we suffer and that the assaults of our enemies will in no point be able to prevail against our faith, and remember that no cross can come upon any of us without the consent of our heavenly Father."

He declares that the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation of Christ's real and carnal presence is a manifest lie, and unknown to the Catholic Church for 900 years after Christ's Ascension. "Away with their abominable doctrine that the sacrifice of the Mass is the principal means to apply Christ's death to the quick and dead."

On Coverdale's return to England in Edward VI's reign, he was appointed a King's Chaplain and joined Cranmer and other bishops on a commission against "Ana-baptists and other like sectaries", who did "not administer the sacraments according to the Prayer Book". In 1550 Coverdale issued a new edition of his Bible which was re-issued in 1553. On August 30th, 1551, he was consecrated as Bishop of Exeter, and put on the Commission for the reform of Ecclesiastical laws. On the death of Edward VI Coverdale was deprived of his bishopric and summoned to the Council at Richmond. But he had married the sister of the Chaplain to the King of Denmark, who was a great favourite of the King, and who personally interceded with Queen Mary for Coverdale's safety, so that in February 1558 an order was made by the Queen to release him. Coverdale retired to Denmark and was appointed as preacher to the exiles at Wesel, and later to his former charge at Bergzabern, on September 15th, 1555, where during his first exile he had been master of a school, and also in 1543 minister of a church. His writings were, of course, proscribed in England, with the works of other faithful Reformers like Cranmer and Latimer.

Coverdale, when in exile, published at full length the "Order of the Church in Denmark and many places in Germany for observance of the Lord's Supper, Baptism and Marriage". "The Sunday morning Communion starts at 7 or 8 o'clock and the chief Curate exhorts the congregation to call upon the Holy Spirit, and they all sing the Veni Creator Spiritus and a sermon follows, and then the priest pronounces the forgiveness of sins to the penitent. This is followed by a fairly long exhortation and the rehearsal of the Words of Institution and a thanksgiving psalm for this 'blessed sacrament' and then the communicants come with great reverence to the Lord's Table where they receive the elements kneeling. Then one of the ministers concludes the service with prayers of thanksgiving."

In 1558 Coverdale was at Geneva and joined in a letter with other exiles for peace and an amicable settlement on their return to England. Coverdale returned from this second Exile with definite Puritan scruples which he had imbibed while abroad. Thus he refused to wear the "Habits", which the cap and surplice were styled. On December 17th, 1558, when he assisted Bishops Barlow, Scory and Hodgkin at the consecration of Matthew Parker as Archbishop of Canterbury he was habited only in a black Geneva gown. He was recommended by Bishop Grindal to Secretary Cecil for the See of Llandaff. But he refused this preferment although he never renounced his episcopal status. As an illustration of his Puritan views at this time Coverdale, in conjunction with the Puritans Humphrey and Sampson, complained to Beza that "the surplice and cope are now retained, although the cope was never ordered or enforced for parish clergy at this time or later on. His Writings, which are published in the two volumes of the Parker Society's Works, are only partly original and partly translations, and were not published before 1535. One of the earliest and possibly the best—the "Old Faith"—is a translation of Bullinger's treatise. Many of his Writings were probably destroyed in Queen Mary's reign, but his translation of the Scriptures is original. His biographer well says that "whatever different opinions may prevail regarding Coverdale, when we consider his character in all its different bearings, and above all his labours in connection with the Scriptures in English, the name of Coverdale must always be mentioned with veneration and respect" (xix, Vol. 2). He died in February 1569 at the age of eighty-one.

—In "The Church Gazette", Oct. '59.

MANIFOLD TEMPTATION

If ever there was a period of trials, difficulties and frustrations, it is today in multiform. Temptations are nothing new. Ever since the creation of man, temptations were there, but often changed their form.

The scattered Jewish Christians had a very hard time, even in apostolic days, and to them St. Peter writes a note of comfort—ye Jewish believers and suffering saints, ye have lost everything for Christ's sake and sustain manifold suffering, wherefore remember not all is lost, there is an inheritance reserved for you in heaven, for you "who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time, wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations: that the trial of your faith . . . might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" I Peter i, 1-7.

They have lost their possessions for the faith in Christ, but their recompense is incomparable. The trial of their faith was much more precious than gold, though it may be tested as by fire, it will come right at the appearing of Jesus Christ, it will be pure and worthy of praise and honour and glory. Those who suffer for Christ's sake know something of the joy of His salvation. It is the hungry man that knows the value of a good meal. Those that are overfed have not got the capacity to enjoy anything no matter how good.

St. Peter reminds these suffering, struggling saints—ye are not alone, the maintenance of your faith does not depend on your little energy, ye are "Kept by the power of God." "Kept," what a wonderful word! A fact which we believers are prone to forget and overlook, that in our manifold testings we are not left alone to face them and solve our manifold problems; we are kept by the most mighty power of God, and therefore cannot go under. We are allowed to enter the manifold temptations that we may gain overcoming experience. "He was tempted in all points as we are," and overcame. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" I Cor. x. 13. Our link with the power of God is faith, full confidence in God that in spite of our weakness He will not let us down. The objective is salvation that will finally "be revealed in the last time."

Ever since the prophetic message began to reveal the coming of the Messiah, Jews believed that the term "the last days" meant the days of King Messiah. St. Peter had only to mention to these Jewish believers "the last time" and they perfectly understood the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. And though this was and continues to be the great source of hope and joy of believers, nevertheless there is the present to be taken into consideration. "Though now for a season." At best or at worst the present is only a short season, "yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry," writes St. Paul to the Hebrew Christians, Heb. x. 37. For a little while if need be, and what a great need! Possibly some of us do not appreciate that there is a need for our faith to be tested, and yet the Word of God is clear, "we must through much testing enter into the Kingdom of God" Acts xiv. 22. "Shall testing separate us from the love of Christ?" "Nay, we are more than overcomers through Him that loveth us."

"Ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations." That the temptations of the saints are manifold, we need only look at Heb. xi to realise the truth of the statement. Why God allows His saints to be severely tested, it is permitted in the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10, though we cannot see now, we shall know at the last time the wonderful wisdom of God. It is by no means easy to understand the working of providence. Thus, for instance, some workers are engaged in a most wonderful enterprise for God, revival is imminent, and they are about to witness a mighty outpouring of the Spirit of God, and suddenly the whole movement is arrested and brought to a complete standstill! Why? Others plough a lonely furrow for years, and see nothing but toil and sweat, full of frustration and no results. Why? Some traverse a smooth path, seldom, if ever, are called upon to face difficulties, whilst other saints of God endure bitter opposition and have to fight their way! Why? Some promising young life suddenly cut down; others are called upon to endure pain or physical disabilities that cause anxiety to loved ones, loneliness and watchfulness are only some of the manifold testings that are difficult to understand, but in it all "Kept by the power of God." Kept in adversity or our faith would fail, kept in prosperity lest the frailty of the flesh would get the credit. But viewing it all in the light of the Holy Spirit, what are the sufferings of the present time to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us. "Kept by the power of God" all the way, and ultimately, when God's refining process will be completed, we shall share in the glory that shall be revealed at His appearing.

—In "Immanuel's Witness", Dec., '59.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 2.

money being spent by the same world Powers in preparation for the next war could be diverted for the purpose. Ireland had her own problems and her recent experience of refugees was none too happy.

The Very Rev. T. F. Canon Murphy, P.P., chairman, presided, and the treasurer, Mr. Richard Nagle, reported a satisfactory financial position.

—(7th November, '59).

* * *

AUSTRALIA

Roman Catholic Drive for Converts

We have already drawn attention to the growth and development of the Roman Catholic Church in Australia as outlined by Prof. Webb in his lectures at the Melbourne University on the Church and the State. We now draw attention to the creation of an Apostolate for the conversion of non-Roman Catholics.

According to the "Catholic Weekly", of Sydney, and the Roman Catholic Tribune, of Melbourne, this campaign was launched in Sydney by a series of paid advertisement in the "Sydney Sun-Herald".

They claim that a million Australians will read over the weekend and learn the truth about the Roman Catholic Church. They are jubilant about the results and claim that they averaged 80 enquiries a day from the advertisement the first three days.

There is little doubt that this campaign will serve as a challenge to the Protestant community and create a demand for similar action to be taken by Protestant leaders and Church organisations.

Already a meeting has been held at the headquarters of the Victorian Protestant Federation which was attended by representatives of Protestant organisations from all States, excepting Western Australia. Twelve organisations were represented and there was formed an Australian Protestant Council, to take effective action to meet this and other challenges from the Roman Catholic Church.

Among the subjects discussed were Immigration, Government Grants to Denominational Schools, Mixed Marriages, and the publishing and wide circulation of Protestant literature.

One important decision was the need to institute a Reformation Sunday, to be held throughout Australia on the last Sunday in October.

Effective action can only be achieved through the leaders of the Protestant churches and the churches themselves becoming the channels for literature of a positive nature being prepared and distributed to the Protestant community. The urgent need is for such literature being made available.

—("The Vigilant", Melbourne, 14th August, '59).

[We are familiar in these islands with similar projects: newspapers carry advertisements inviting Protestants, etc., to write for information about Roman Catholicism, and enquiries are answered by supplies of lessons on Roman Catholic teaching.

In addition, a fair amount of visiting of Protestants is carried on by Roman Catholic organisations. In Dublin this is a common experience. Further, in Dublin and elsewhere, lectures specially for "non-Catholics" are given; gatherings are held in prominent hotels, and Sunday excursions are organised for "non-Catholics" to convents where they see the Service of Mass, are entertained to lunch and tea, and are given explanatory talks. The Protestant should take the initiative with these visitors and instruct them. They are usually quite confused in their thinking, and some plain reminders of the teaching of Holy Scripture are useful].

* * *

GERMAN PROTESTANTISM

Germany's Population 60 Per Cent. Protestant

A recent dispatch from Hanover, Germany, states:

Sixty per cent. of the total population in East and West Germany are Protestants, 35 per cent. Roman Catholics, and five per cent. belong to other religious groups or profess to no creed, according to Dr. Paul Zieger, head of the statistical office of the Evangelical Church in Germany (EKID).

In West Germany, the population of Protestants, Roman Catholics, and religiously unaffiliated is 51, 45 and four per cent. respectively, according to the latest census in 1950. In the Soviet Zone the figures are Protestants 82 per cent., R.C.'s 11 per cent. and unaffiliated 7 per cent.

Addressing a meeting of journalists, Dr. Zieger said there has been a slight shift in West Germany in favour of Protestants in recent years due to the large-scale influx of refugees from the Soviet Zone, of whom about 77 per cent. are Protestants.

He disclosed that every fourth marriage concluded in West Germany is a mixed marriage between Protestant and Roman Catholic partners, with 75 per cent. of the children from such marriages taking the faith of the mother.

—("The Sentinel", Toronto, Sept., '59).

* * *

Union With Rome?

A Roman Catholic journal tells us that in June of this year a discussion, which lasted for three days, was held between Roman Catholic and Rhineland Protestant Church theologians. The subject discussed was "The Coming Council and Christian Unity". This is only one example of the great change which has taken place since the end of the war. At the root of the change was the coming of the Nazis, and the atrocities they committed. The result was a great mixing of the population. Millions of refugees were driven over the eastern boundaries of Germany, while four million Roman Catholics have settled down in areas which not so long ago were predominantly Protestant. This mix-up of people, says this Roman Catholic writer, has helped to break down prejudices and "inherited hostility". The result is not one but many meetings, all of them dealing with this question of Christian disunion.

A Help to Unity

"One result of this closer contact is that old-style polemics are going out of fashion. German Catholic writers are no longer content to point out the dogmatic and moral defects of Luther and the Reformers, but attempt a much more positive appreciation, and admit, too, the large share of blame which Catholics must bear for the Reformation, and their consequent duty of atoning for it. As far as Catholic writers are concerned, atonement exists in the heroic patience which they must exercise in trying to understand and appreciate, the bewildering meanderings of many of the Protestant theologians, and resisting the temptation to write off all Protestants as obstinate heretics with whom discussion is useless. There are many indications that discussion is far from useless."

—("The Bulwark", Edinburgh, Nov., '59).

[We have often said here that no discussion of union with Rome ought to be carried on unless fundamental issues of truth are in the forefront. We want no bargaining on the Protestant side; and Rome, it is clear, will not compromise on her claims. Unity is not a matter of organisation, Orders, or Liturgy; it is a matter of truth. We can never surrender that].

* * *

Vatican drops Proposed Talks

"The Times" correspondent in Rome reported that the Vatican had washed its hands of two projected meetings, one with Eastern Orthodox theologians in Vienna, and another with Protestant scholars at Assisi. Unofficial reports suggest that the proposed discussions have been abandoned because of "unwarranted hopes and mistaken interpretations of what the organizers of the two meetings had in mind". It was early in September last that the Vatican gave official news of the project, stating that ten theologians from each side would take part. Evangelicals of all denominations will learn of the abandonment without regret, for it is apparent to all who have eyes to see that however much the Papacy may desire to promote unity, it is prepared to concede nothing that is vital. Reunion with Rome, as things are, could mean nothing short of complete surrender to Papal claims, both doctrinal and ecclesiastical. It is, perhaps, a good thing that the Vatican makes no attempt to conceal that fact. What is surprising is that some leaders in the Reformed Churches turn a blind eye to it. —"The Christian", 30th Oct. '59.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3, 16).

THE widespread distribution of the Word of God is the main work of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which makes free grants of Scriptures, especially considering the needs of those who are unable to buy Scriptures, and to such liberal supplies are sent out free of cost. Many a needy missionary and other worker has had cause to praise God that by this means he has been enabled to fulfil our Lord's command to make disciples of all nations and to preach the Gospel, by giving the Word which is able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Founded 1831

(For the Circulation of Protestant and Uncorrupted Versions of the Word of God)

7 Bury Place, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.1.

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,

3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 2—LXIX.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification", "Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d. Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev. A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos. Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	13
Joy	16
Editor's Chair	18
Spain and Protestant Marriages	21

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

The Reformed Church in Ireland

What is the mission of the Reformed Church in Ireland to-day? Surely it is to seek and save the lost! The tragedy of the Church is that too often it is seeking to save itself, to maintain its existence and to hold on to what it has. In seeking to save its life, it may lose it. The Church must reach out. It must carry its Gospel outside its beautiful walls into the highways and byways.

The whole spiritual situation in Ireland could be changed if men and women, with a burden on their souls to reach others, would go forth to adventure for Christ, as the early Christians did. The Christian Church in India is doing it and it is a thrill to hear how with their literature campaigns and by other means the Church there, though only a very small fraction of the total population, is going out boldly and proclaiming the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Recently there returned to Ireland Father Patrick Peyton, the Rosary priest, who is travelling throughout the world organising a campaign for the worship of the Rosary. He had just concluded a crusade in the Diocese of Brugge, Belgium. He left behind him 60,000 men who were dedicated to making a door-to-door pilgrimage to reach 360,000 families.

Though one does not agree with the object of the crusade nothing but respect can be given to a body of men so sincere and enthusiastic concerning their faith and the propagation of it.

If 60,000 members of the Reformed faith in Ireland had the same enthusiasm to go out to take their faith to the people around about them, and were to commence a door-to-door pilgrimage, what an impact that would have upon the community.

Here is a challenge to the Reformed Church in Ireland.

—(The Revd. Rupert Gibson in "The Christian Irishman", October, '59).

* * *

Reception of T.C.D. Group Criticised

Criticism of a reception to be given to a group from Trinity College, Dublin, by the Lord Mayor of Cork when they visit the city on Friday, was voiced at a meeting of Cork Corporation.

The Lord Mayor, Senator Mrs. Dowdall, told the meeting: "I have no apology to offer to the members of the Corporation or to any outside persons for what I do."

The party is coming to Cork on a campaign to raise funds for the college library.

The question was raised by Mr. D. P. Kelliher, who said he felt it was an inopportune time for the Corporation to give a civic reception to an outside university, while the local university was starving.

Oldest University

When the Lord Mayor ruled out discussion she said that as Lord Mayor, she intended, with God's help, "to carry out her duties, using her own judgement and ability."

"A group of distinguished persons from the oldest Irish university is coming to this city on Friday and it will be my proud privilege to receive them in the City Hall. That is not a civic reception by the Corporation," said Senator Dowdall.

"As Lord Mayor, I understand that I am not obliged to consult with members of the Corporation or any persons outside on whom I may receive."

—("Irish Press", 16th July, '59).

* * *

India Still Needs Missionaries

In view of ideas which are entertained in some quarters, at home and elsewhere, it is all to the good that an Indian Church leader has declared that his country and others still need missionaries from the West. Bishop Manikam of the Lutheran Church, is quoted in the "C.M.S. News-Letter" as saying: "A new myth of to-day is that since the Younger Churches have come into existence, the task of winning the non-Christian world to Christ had better be left to them". After thanking God for the reality of the Church in Asian and African lands, he goes on to remind Western Christians how relatively small these Churches are, and of their burden of illiteracy. "With these handicaps," Bishop Manikam continues, "these Churches of Asia and Africa have not yet out-thought or out-lived the non-Christian faiths. Stubborn problems that defy solution still remain; the iron curtain of Islam, the impenetrability of Buddhism, and the impregnable fortress of Higher Hinduism. To talk therefore glibly that these Churches in Asia and Africa had better evangelize their nations without the help of their partners from abroad is not realistic thinking."

—"The Christian", 9th Oct. '59.

* * *

Italy.—Baptist Pastor Imprisoned

It was reported last weekend that an Italian Baptist minister of the name of Donato Crotarolo, has been sentenced to fifteen days' imprisonment for "contempt" of the Roman Catholic religion. He was said to have put up posters during Holy Week in the village of San Benedetto dei Marsi to which the parish priest took objection. The posters were said to have contained comments on Roman Catholic rites and dogma "in the light of Protestant doctrine and principles." In his defence Signor Crotarolo told the court that his aim in putting up the posters was to defend his religion from the priest, who constantly attacked it publicly from the pulpit. The presiding judge asked the priest if one of the reasons why he denied the Sacrament to the mother of the future wife of the pastor was because he was a Protestant. The priest agreed. The pastor's counsel argued that the charge was inconsistent with the Italian Constitution, which proclaims that "all religious confessions are equally free before the law."

Whether the matter will be carried further is not yet known. It is one thing for a country to have religious equality written into its Constitution; it is quite another thing to secure recognition of that principle in areas where a fanatical priesthood can intimidate the civil power.

—"The Protestant World," Sydney, Oct. '59.

* * *

Teachers in France battle Clericals.

That a school situation similar to that in many parts of Canada exists in France is clear from the following article in The Churchman, New York, August issue:

The anticlerical French National Teachers Union met in Paris recently and prepared for battle. The Union's annual convention came at a time when partisans of state aid to Roman Catholic schools are striving more aggressively than at any time in the last eight years to get assistance from the government.

Speakers declared that no compromise was possible with "the clericals". The union represents teachers in public grade schools who seek to maintain the French republican tradition of strict state neutrality in religious matters. The union has always opposed using public funds to help Roman Catholic schools.

Two Systems not similar

Denis Forestier, secretary general of the union, attacked those who say the two school systems are on the same level and should be treated in the same manner. He said the public system was open to all, while the private one was "reserved for certain persons".

Public schools need money and teachers, Mr. Forestier said. He said that 14,000 new teachers were needed for next fall, but that not more than 6,000 would be available.

Premier Michel Debré has promised Roman Catholic partisans that the Government will examine the school problem.

—"The Sentinel", Toronto, Oct. '59.

* * *

Why Spain is not welcome in NATO

Despite Spain's membership in the United Nations and in the Organization for European Economic Co-operation, opposition to including Franco's regime in NATO continues. It is based on a strict interpretation of the preamble to the NATO treaty, which enunciates the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law. Because of the hostile treatment accorded evangelicals in Spain, Norway and Denmark are actively opposed to Spain's entry. Benjamin Welles, writing from Madrid to the "New York Times" recently, listed the Protestant handicaps in connection with getting married, educating children and burying the dead. Since most Protestant converts were baptised in infancy in the Roman Catholic Church, special dispensations are required for them to marry outside the church, which concession is almost impossible for them to obtain. The cost of private education requires that Protestant children be educated as Roman Catholics or remain unschooled. Protestants are classified with paupers, atheists and lunatics in that they may not be buried in consecrated ground. While a Mohammedan was promoted in 1935 to the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Spanish army, careers as officers are ruled out for Protestants. The masses of the people have been taught that evangelicals are subversives. The Madrid Theological Seminary remains closed. Protestant Bibles cannot be printed or imported. Petitions to the government to permit the opening of Protestant chapels are ignored. At least thirty chapels have been closed in recent years. Former presidential speech-writer Emmet John Hughes says in an article in Esquire that the Roman Catholic Church, the army, and the Falange co-operate in running the country. Hughes quotes a Spaniard as saying that American military and economic aid is a bulwark of the Franco regime, and all Spain is in a sense a dependent of the Pentagon a sense of purpose on the part of America to preserve some freedom for the Spanish people might, he says, do much good. Why can't we do as much as Norway and Denmark?

—"Christian Century."

* * *

What is a Protestant?

A Protestant may be described as (1) one who makes a protestation or declaration of this belief, or opinion, or resolution, or (2) one who protests or makes a declaration against some belief, or opinion or action. We emphasize this because too many people associate the term "Protestant" absolutely with the negative conception. The positive force of the word is too much ignored and forgotten. It is, in fact, its primary signification.

We can make a protestation with respect to anything that we feel strongly about. It is only because such a protestation is seldom made except in opposition to what we believe to be error that the word Protestant grew to have a negative sense attached to it, so that it was supposed that if we protested we must be protesting against something.

Yet our ordinary forms of speech bear testimony to the contrary, and show that we are wrong in thus confining the meaning of the term. After a long day's journey we might say, "I protest that I am glad to rest", and here we would not be denying anything, but only stating something emphatically. Or, when an accused prisoner states, "I protest my innocence", he only affirms and declares in the most positive way that he did not commit the crime.

Thus in 1641 John Pym persuaded the Parliament of England to "enter into a protestantism", not against anything, but "for the defence of their privileges and the performance of their duties to God and the King, which they were obliged to as good Christians and good subjects", and a committee was ordered "speedily to withdraw and prepare such protestation." The "Protestation" was drawn up, and those who signed it bound themselves thereby "to defend the doctrine of the Church of England, and His Majesty's royal person, and the powers and privileges of Parliament, and the lawful rights and liberties of the subject." All these things were positive acts to be performed, not negations.

The German theologians and partisans of Reform from whom the name Protestant comes, used the word in its positive sense. Their protestation was not a string of negatives, but a declaration of their faith, positive and negative. From them the word and its meaning passed into England, and so the Protestant Faith in England meant the Faith of the Church of England, as in Germany it meant the Faith of the Confession of Augsburg. It signified a Faith cleansed of the corruptions of mediaeval and modern Roman Church. Thus all the 17th Century divines unhesitatingly speak of themselves as Protestants. Archbishop Laud, for example, solemnly protested "that he was innocent of all practice, for any alteration to Popery or any blemishing the true Protestant Religion established in the Church of England."

And so to-day a true Protestant is not one who merely protests against the errors and policies of the Church of Rome, but more particularly stands for, and bears witness to the Faith "once delivered to the Saints."

—"The Sentinel," Toronto, Sept., '59.

* * *

Crim Struggle—Bishops in East Germany Spurn Red Ceremonies

East Berlin—Lutheran Bishop Otto Dibelius, Germany's ranking Protestant churchman who argues that a Christian can ignore Communist laws, preached a sermon unhindered in East Berlin November 1, despite the fact that East Berlin Mayor Waldemar Schmidt told him earlier that his anti-Communist views had "removed the basis for further (clerical) activity in Democratic (East) Berlin."

An AP dispatch from Berlin recently stated: Evangelical bishops from Communist-ruled East Germany have strongly condemned Communist ceremonies intended to replace orthodox Christian religious practices.

The bishops met here last month under the chairmanship of Bishop Otto Dibelius, a long time foe of communism whose diocese straddles East and West Berlin.

A memorandum called "Aids of Pastors" was worked out at the meeting. It has been distributed to the 5,000 Evangelical ministers in East Germany for their guidance in dealing with Communist ceremonies.

Difficult Conditions

It outlines circumstances under which Christians may have a church marriage or baptism even after undergoing a Communist ceremony. In the past, many pastors have refused to do this.

—(Continued on p. 22.)

JOY.

The word "joy" is not in common use to-day. We are more likely to hear the word "enjoyment." Perhaps it is just as well, for we can reasonably restrict "joy" to the sphere of spiritual things and leave "enjoyment" to the world.

What does "joy" mean? It suggests a sort of enthusiastic happiness expressed as the result of something good. Enjoyment belongs mainly to the realm of pleasure—nowadays a secular mood; though we do not forget that we can genuinely "enjoy" God. Nevertheless we think the distinction we make is fair: to-day's use of language gives the impression that enjoyment belongs to our senses rather than to the soul and personality. Joy, on the other hand, describes the emotion and experience of spiritual rapture, and of being, even momentarily, lifted above the condition of sin and misery and frustration normal to us into a state of liberation and union with God, a state of pure grace and intimate communion.

Apart from this we must also recognise the joy that recurs in every remembrance of our deliverance from sin and death by the sacrifice of Christ on our behalf. That indeed is the joy no man can take from us, though we are aware how easily "enjoyment" may be withdrawn from us by the vicissitudes of life.

"To enjoy" is a subjective experience, but to rejoice is the positive and objective spirit of thanksgiving as well as the spirit of unburdened happiness shared by Christians.

* * *

The Bible is a book of joy. We have not counted the number of times "joy" or "rejoicing" occurs, but "joy" is found over a hundred times in the Old Testament (not always the one Hebrew Word), and over fifty in the New Testament. The frequency, is significant, for "joy" is the outcome of God's love and forgiveness and beneficence. Sinful man may enjoy the temporal blessings of life—redeemed man will find joy in the realisation that he has passed from death unto life.

* * *

The Psalms are full of joy because they were composed by men who know what they owed to God. They rejoiced in fellowship with God, and they rejoiced in His service, obedience brought results which self will could never imagine or experience, and those results raised up joy in their hearts. No one can read the Psalms and appreciate their variety in theme, authorship, and period and say that they describe illusory conditions of mind. They are neither escapism nor phantasy, but are marked by real gratitude to God for substantial benefits of the spirit. In them the life of man is not glamourised nor romanticised—realism is the consistent feature of God's Word everywhere, and thus the joy they speak of is recognition of true experiences of God's gracious acts.

Here are some instances:—

"Let all those that put their trust in Thee... shout for joy" Ps. 5, 11.

"Make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob... to the rock of our salvation..."

"Before the Lord the King" 81, 1: 95, 1: 98, 6.

These speak to us of faith, that quality which always needs joy to make it the ground of happiness here. They speak also of the blessedness of those who have Jehovah as their God—unlike the heathens of then or now who are alike in this, that they make Gods for themselves, whether idols of stone and wood, or idols of thought and technics.

* * *

Here are some others from the Psalms—

"They that sow in tears shall reap in joy" 126, 5. God's compensations are transforming things. They are sometimes in the outward circumstances of life, but often they are given to us by way of a changed ideal of life, and a new attitude and new appreciation of the ultimate values in the soul's development.

"In Thy presence is fulness of joy" 16, 11. The presence of God is a possible experience of all of us now if we draw near to Him in faith, penitence, and love. For the Christian, God in Christ is very near, even if for the Jew, the nearest presence was the Shekinah glory of the Temple. But beyond the Psalmist's faith is the Christian's knowledge that one day we shall be with Him where He is—"I come again, and will receive you unto Myself that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14, 3)—then indeed will be the fulness of joy.

* * *

Next after the Psalms we may regard the Prophet Isaiah as the leading Old Testament revelation of joy, though of course the emphasis on joy is not restricted to any group of books. We select from Isaiah a sentence which is a parable—

"The Ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy" 35, 10.

These words may fit the experience of return from earthly captivity: from enforced captivity among the heathen to restoration to their own land. But they fit far better the deliverance of those who are "by Christ redeemed, in Christ restored," and now know that "their citizenship is in Heaven." Everlasting life is surely the best ground for everlasting joy, for everlasting life is the outcome of the everlasting love of the Father towards us.

An earlier place in Isaiah is in form a little parable—

"With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" 12, 3.

To bring one's cattle and flocks to a well gone dry must have been a bitter disappointment in an Eastern land, and to search day after day for water for man and beast was an anxious task and no doubt an age-long one. What joy the herdsman felt when he found a well full of water we may easily imagine—it meant life and health and hope.

When the imagery is applied to the life of the soul of man the wells of salvation point to God the author of all good, and to Christ who secured our highest good by the sacrifice of Himself. On Calvary the Fountain to wash away all sin was opened and its inexhaustible power is with us now. The well at Sychar (John 4) is a Gospel commentary on the words of Isaiah, an exposition and application given by the Redeemer Himself.

"The weak shall increase their joy in the Lord" 29, 19.

Our world probably despises weakness, or holds it in good-natured contempt. It must not be thought that meekness in the Bible is a state of amiable and helpless incompetence. It is a state of spiritual strength — of submissiveness towards God, and not of subservience towards men. Are we not told that Moses was the meekest of men? Yet Moses in anger smashed the golden calf, and challenged a whole nation. When he did so no one defied him. We need the meekness of Moses to-day.

Obedience to God as a rule of life, and the surrender of our wills to His cannot fail to act upon our personalities for their improvement and development. The casual way of life which knows no discipline apart from social conformity does not develop a worthwhile personality in anyone. How can it? God's will provides us with a pattern and rule. It tells us what is wisest to think, and most profitable to do. It is not a policy for immediate advantages, but is a long-term building-up of strong moral and spiritual fibre. Heightened spiritual and mental awareness and sensitivity result from deliberate and consistent doing by God's will, and increased inward joy is experienced—the peace of God which is part of our joy is the fruit of right-doing.

* * *

There is perhaps little need to say how much is added to all this when we turn to the Christian experiences in the promises of the New Testament. In the age of the Gospel we accept the assurance of Our Lord "These things have I spoken unto you that My joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full" John 15, 11.

Though He is spoken of as the man of Sorrows, He Himself was acquainted with joy as well as with grief. His sorrows like His joy, were for us, and He endured them "for the joy that was set before Him." Heb. 12, 2. That joy was the fact that His death was triumphant, and "He has seen of the travail of His soul and is satisfied." Is. 53. The ransomed of the Lord are His abiding joy, and they have but to wait and persevere until the call is heard "Enter into the joy of Thy Lord" Matt. 25, 21.

* * *

As Christian joy is the joy of deliverance from sin and death; the joy of the freedom of the redeemed personality; the joy of union with God; the joy of knowing His love, it is not a matter of surprise that Our Lord's Apostles should write of it — St. Peter says of Christ "Whom having not seen ye love . . . on whom believing ye rejoice with joy unspeakable."

* * *

St. Paul prayed for the Roman Christians "the God of hope fill you with all joy."

St. Jude prayed that God would present His people "before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy."

* * *

It is often said that the greatest words in the Gospel are words of one syllable—grace, hope, faith, love, the Cross, God, life, peace, (anyway in English: we know that in Greek they are mostly two syllables)—to them we add "joy." They are pure words, as great as they are pure. They refer to the basic and essential principles of our religion, and for us the outcome of them all is joy.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

WHAT IS AN IRISHMAN?

The question which heads this article calls for no facetious reply: it is asked in a serious mood, and it is a question which has much relevance to the present and future interest of the country.

Elsewhere in our pages is a report of a speech by the Headmaster of the Royal School, Raphoe, Co. Donegal. The Royal Schools are we remark in passing, old foundations dating from the seventeenth century. They are all in Ulster counties and presumably came into being to educate the sons of the Protestant settlers who came here as a result of the Plantation of Ulster by James VI and I. The school in Raphoe and the school in Cavan are in Ulster counties which do not form part of the political unit of Northern Ireland. The Headmaster makes two points, 1. that a separatist policy in education based on religious distinctions is harmful, and 2. that the equation "Irish-Catholic" which is widely accepted to-day does an injustice to Irish Protestants. Linked with these is the tendency to disapprove of the republican spirit which is supposed to have been brought into Irish life by non-Gaelic influences, i.e. by the Protestants Theobald Wolfe Tone in the eighteenth century, and Thomas Davis in the nineteenth century.

We are not of course quoting the Headmaster's words, but underlining in our own way the problem he has put to his hearers clearly and effectively.

* * *

No doubt a great number of Irish Protestants (probably the big majority) repudiate Republicanism, and always have done so. The partition of Ireland and the existence of Northern Ireland as independent of the Twenty-Six Counties of Eire is due to the firm rejection of Republicanism by the Protestant majority in the Northern Counties. The more the Gaelic-Catholic idea is popularised, the greater the justification of partition.

Hitherto then, Republicanism has had no appeal to Irish Protestants. But if the notion spreads that liberal Republican views are "non-Catholic" in origin and therefore unseemly and unsuitable for Irish Roman Catholics, they will be left to Protestants!

* * *

Some readers may remember how promptly many vociferous citizens advocated "corporatism" in the heyday of Fascism, Nazism, etc. They were quick to decry democratic Republicanism, and eager to see a Roman Catholic corporative state in place of it. Many still, we suppose, look to the political systems of the Iberian peninsula to provide a model for us here in Ireland. In face of that we are bound to say that democratic Republicanism is a healthier and more equitable thing. No system which divides the citizens of a country into first-class and second-class is sane or enlightened. Such a policy is a symptom not of spiritual well-being or confidence, but of deep spiritual malaise.

Whatever local colour they may take, British democratic ideals are still the very best man has developed—where the world abandons them they are replaced by methods which are manifestly worse. The truth of this may be seen not only beyond the Iron Curtain but in many places on this side of it. Neither Communism nor any Totalitarianism can avoid being a police state. They must rule by fear, by administrative decrees, by arbitrary powers. Their rulers maintain their authority by treating political deviations as criminal and capital offences.

* * *

However, the people here who want significant changes in the structure of Irish political society are not numerous and the good practical sense of the majority, and their fair-mindedness will always safeguard the rights of all citizens. But we must not conceal from ourselves that every emphasis upon a "Catholic-Gaelic" outlook must discourage co-operation, understanding, and goodwill between Eire and Northern Ireland. There is a unity of Ireland which ought to exist quite apart from any controversial issues of political unity: it gets little chance or attention as a rule. The unity of neighbours, the unity of cultural interests, the unity of sports and athletics, the unity of commonsense which accepts the political division and spends no time in lamenting over it but gets on with improving the lot of the ordinary people—here are fields of activity in which all responsible men can go ahead. If we all let our frustrations dominate our lives and thoughts we would accomplish nothing. When we reduce our frustrations (or what we condition ourselves to regard as frustrations) to their true proportions we will be happier and wiser and more equal to our immediate tasks.

* * *

Some years ago we wrote on this subject, and recollect that we said that the truest patriot was the man who did most practical good. We gave the instance we think, of a Protestant clergyman who at the turn of the century did a great deal of work to advance the cause of co-operative creameries, North and South. We think that his patriotism was not less real, even if he hadn't a gun, than any other man's. We withhold no due respect from the memory of the dead, but we maintain that there are many ways in which true patriotism is expressed, and all should be held in esteem. If the Protestant contribution to Ireland is minimised or ignored, and if the good British institutions we have inherited are lightly regarded, and irresponsibly abandoned, the country will not advance in goodwill, intelligence, or manhood.

* * *

If religion is to be the overruling factor in everything, and religion is conceived in a narrow conventional and sectarian sense, this surely is a very retrograde step. The true spirit of Christianity is not narrow or conventional, and the love of God, "Whose mercy is over all His works" is not sectarian. The people of Ireland should try to live up to the highest ideals of the Christian faith, and not be content with just "getting by." This is the need of all denominations, and experience has long shown us that it is fatally easy to "Compound for sins we are inclined to" "By damning those we have no mind to."

It is easier to hate than to love. It is easier to brood over wrongs in the past than to take frank and free opportunities of the present. It is harder to address the public as "fellow-Irishman" than to say "fellow-Catholics" or "fellow-Protestants"—harder still to say "fellow-men," and ignore all smaller distinctions.

* * *

What impulses drive us to decry the liberal democratic principles of some patriots on the ground that they are mere romantic Nationalism, and to put forward a backward-looking Gaelic political ideal? We are inclined to think that the factor which influences the mind is the menace of atheistic Communism. It is felt that liberal nationalism does not give enough strength of resistance to the infiltration of communistic thought. The liberal idea, active in the eighteenth century revolution and early introduced into Ireland is suspect because it is not impervious or impenetrable. It is feared that it will not resist the advance to socialism which both Marx and Lenin described as a stage on the way to communism. Yet it is plain that the European countries which have been manoeuvred into "people's republics" i.e. communistic-control, are just those which had no proper experience of liberal democracy. Further, no country which is Protestant by tradition has surrendered to Communism. From this it seems that liberal democracies, if Protestant, are more successful in withstanding revolutionary and atheistic propaganda.

* * *

Can a "Gaelic-Catholic" state turn its back on Europe, and resist the inflow of opinions it dislikes? Broadcasting and Television will be the media of outside opinions, while the constant movement back and forth from Ireland to Great Britain and America of thousands of younger people must introduce us to foreign views of life. Do the people of Ireland want Gaelicisation? The general indifference to the old language in spite of it having been taught universally in our schools for over thirty years may be some indication of tepid interest, if not of apathy.

We must recognise that people are going to have what they want, rather than what some pressure-group says they are to have—that is Freedom. We don't want the language to be lost, but we see no prospect of a general use of it. We don't want the individuality of Ireland to be swallowed up in a cosmopolitan society—red or black—and so we believe that Freedom is the safeguard. We want no assumption that genuine Irishmen must be Roman Catholics not Protestants. The realism which lives in the twentieth century and says that Sandy Row is as Irish as the Claddagh, and Stormont as Leinster House, and Queen's University, Belfast as University College, Cork is what we want.

Whether we carry the Missal or the metrical Psalter or the Book of Common Prayer to Church on Sunday ought not to be the sole criterion of citizenship and nationality.

Separate Education.

Two hundred years ago there was little or no primary education as we understand it in Ireland (or elsewhere). Roman Catholic teachers could not legally carry on schools, and Protestant schools were not numerous. No doubt Roman Catholic pupils could attend the Protestant schools even if they had to be taught the Church Catechism. At the same time there were the famous "hedge schools" conducted by men of varied attainments and abilities. These semi-open air schools were not unduly severe on a people which traditionally spent much of their lives in the open. By the end of the eighteenth century schools were becoming numerous, and disabilities on religious grounds had largely gone.

Early in the nineteenth century the "Kildare Place Society" schools were formed everywhere, being the fruits of a genuine effort to extend primary education. They had government support like the older "Charter Schools" which were in disrepute not only as proselytising places but as ill-managed and ineffective.

It was inconceivable that merely secular schools could exist then, so in the Kildare Place Schools religious instruction by means of simple Bible reading was the rule.

As the Roman Catholic part of the population became more active after its release from the repressive legislation of the previous century and was in pursuit of complete political emancipation, it was natural to look with suspicion on a system of education mainly directed by Protestants (though plenty of Roman Catholics were on the committee). Charges of using the schools and public funds for Protestant propaganda were made. These charges were probably exaggerated but they were sufficient to undermine the Irish Government's confidence in the Kildare Place Society, and plans were made for a government system of primary education. This was established in the 1830's, and so there came into being "the Commissioners of National Education" who were empowered to make grants to pay teachers in schools which interested persons might open in any parish. This system, originally designed to be undenominational, soon took on a sectarian aspect. There were Roman Catholic schools and Presbyterian schools, and after an interval, Church of Ireland schools. This interval had been filled in by the activities of "The Church Education Society" which maintained schools in which all pupils were given the same religious instruction. This society could not compete with the national schools, and gradually faded into insignificance as its schools accepted the national system.

* * *

What was not intended at the outset soon became the outstanding feature of the Irish National schools—religious separatism and strict denominational character. No other method had any chance of success. Ireland to-day, North and South, is a land of denominationist schools. In Northern Ireland there are "state" schools, but they are not attended to any extent by Roman Catholic pupils. Roman Catholics have their own schools in which teachers are paid by the State, and the managers receive very large grants from State funds for building purposes. In Eire one does not think of "State" schools at all. Every primary school is a church school of one denomination or another, and there are no grievances.

* * *

But when we go a little deeper into the effect of this denominational system we can see that it is essentially separatist. It keeps apart in their impressionable years the members of the Roman Catholic religion and the Protestants. As a consequence familiarity and companionship are avoided and segregation becomes a social factor in the life of the people which is rarely overcome. Further results are tension and distrust.

Of course in practice we have long accommodated ourselves to these conditions. What can fairly be said to justify them? The answer many would give is that there is a Protestant way of life and there is a Roman Catholic way of life and the two do not mix. Each side must safeguard its traditions in faith and its own loyalties. These are important facts, and they must not be ignored or undervalued. Roman Catholic authorities (not only in Ireland) claim control of education. In their principles there must be no such thing as "secular" education. Protestants may not be as rigid, but in Ireland they naturally want more freedom in educational ideals and practice.

* * *

We think the problems become more serious when religious distinctions are maintained up to and during the processes of university education. Yet in this we see odd inconsistency. Each year the University of Dublin (T.C.D.) is singled out by the Roman Catholic hierarchy and condemned as an institution unfit for Roman Catholic students. It is Protestant, and so it is sinful to go there (unless special leave for special reasons is given). But no such public prohibition exists in regard to Queen's University in Belfast though it is just as Protestant as T.C.D.

Does it not seem to be deplorable that the young men and women of Ireland should be separated even at the level of professional education? What this does is to foster the idea that there is a solid Roman Catholic Nation, Gaelic in race and tradition, and that there has been intruded into that solid nation an alien element which cannot be absorbed and so must be endured. The Protestant (even the Protestant Mac or O) is separated from his fellow-countrymen by his creed and its cultural effects.

Here we have the real problem of Ireland. The distrusts are perpetuated and unity (we are not referring to political unity which is less important than Southern politicians and agitators say) is carefully avoided.

Cordial recognition and acceptance of the political division of the country is nevertheless the necessary step towards renewed sympathy between South and North. But we fear we must wait long to see this if the attitude persists that we are a Gaelic-Catholic people which refuses to admit the sterling worth of the political democratic and social institutions developed by Anglo-Saxon civilisation and shared by us.

What Ireland needs is more mental and spiritual maturity, fewer leading strings, and an awakening to the fact of the "One World" of the twentieth century.

SPAIN AND PROTESTANT MARRIAGES

(Rev. W. Montano)

A recent communication received from a well-informed party furnishes authentic documentation regarding the maltreatment and vexation Protestants are subjected to in matters of Marriage:

The marriage of evangelical believers in Spain has been a grave problem for a number of years. Only two types of marriage are recognized by the government—Catholic and civil. The latter is performed before a civil judge. Protestant ceremonies are not recognized by the authorities.

Although a new decree was issued in October, 1956, stating that civil marriages would be permitted to persons who could submit documents proving they did not profess the Catholic religion, the evangelicals soon realized that the judges demanded "impossible proofs" of what they term "apostasy."

This decree placed the obligation of "proof of apostasy" on the parties to an evangelical marriage, if one or both had been formerly baptized in the Roman Catholic Church. The position arising has been extremely intolerable in many cases where reasonable "proofs" have not been accepted by the judges in charge of the Civil Register. These vexations became definitely more grievous following a decree published in the "Boletín oficial del Estado" (Official State Bulletin) on the 11th of December, 1958. Previously Article 42 of the recently informed Civil Code had again insisted on the "proof" that the parties do not profess the Roman Catholic religion, but the new decrees places a monstrous power of investigation in the hands of all officials in charge of the Civil Register. These will include not only professional judges, but also all justices of the peace and municipal judges in every town, village, or hamlet of Spain, many of whom are next to illiterate.

The clause of the Ministry of Justice of November 14, 1958, reads as follows:

"The official in charge of the register will hear statements by both parties, separately and secretly, in order to assure himself that no obstacles exist which might impede the celebration of the marriage ceremony."

This means that fanatical persons, or others quite unfitted for such a delicate mission, have the right to scrutinize the religious conscience of a man and of his future wife, behind closed doors and separately, in the absence of a third party.

Even through this decree refers to those who, having been baptized in the Roman Church or converted to it later from heresy or schism, wish to contract a civil marriage, it will practically include those who have never been baptized in the Roman Catholic Church, because it is almost impossible to prove the negative fact of not having been baptized as a Catholic.

Thus it results that almost every evangelical believer will have to pass the inquisition of the conscience to prove his or her non-Catholicity before the public officials.

Renewed Discrimination

The foregoing refers to the marriage situation in Spain. However, there are other areas in which Protestants have suffered at the hands of their Roman Catholic oppressors. Not long ago the Evangelical Alliance publicized the following facts about renewed discrimination during the past year.

Local governments, which had permitted a number of new church buildings to be constructed to accommodate growing Protestant communities, subsequently prohibited their use. Six churches were closed in one year, the largest being, the Baptist church of Calle Verdi in Barcelona. This church with a seating capacity of over six hundred, was usually filled when first opened, but an order from Madrid prohibited its further use.

In addition, the third Baptist church of Madrid has been closed, as well as the Methodist church of Pueblo Nuevo, the Baptist church of Turo de la Peira, and the Baptist churches in Malaga and Seville. These added to over twenty others previously closed, leave scores of Protestants churchless. Meetings in private homes are prohibited.

The United Evangelical Seminary in Madrid is still closed after three years. The Spanish Bible Society of Madrid, which had its Bibles and New Testaments confiscated three years ago, to-day has no legal right to import, print or distribute the Scriptures. Protestants moreover have no legal right to print their own papers and books. All Spanish Protestant schools are prohibited.

By the end of 1959 probably a hundred Protestant couples will have wanted to get married. As previously indicated, it is almost impossible to prove apostasy to a biased official who, at his own whim, may reject all evidence. The only recourse of the Protestant couple seeking marriage is court action at an average cost of something between $100 and $175 (£35 to £61). A number of couples would take such action but cannot afford to do so.

Families applying to government-sponsored housing developments in Spain usually must produce a marriage certificate as evidence of approval from the local Catholic church. This restriction automatically keeps Protestants out of these new developments. This is but one of the many economic pressures brought to bear on Spanish Protestants.

In our day it is hardly possible to believe that these conditions exist in a country that calls itself not only civilized but Christian. Let it never be forgotten that this is the heritage of the Roman Catholic Church, the end result of the dread Inquisition of a country that knew no Reformation. —(Reprinted from "Christian Heritage", New York, in the Churchman's Magazine).

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 16.

During the last two years the Communists have developed a name-giving ceremony to replace baptism, a youth dedication as a substitute for confirmation, a marriage form of their own, and even a socialist funeral.

"All these socialist celebrations," the bishops noted, "may be held in a very festive and impressive style. But the decisive thing for a Christian remains that they are godless and designed as a substitute for our church celebrations. However much it may be said that they are neutral social occasions, for us the words of our Saviour are valid: No man can serve two masters."

About 85 per cent of the 17,000,000 people in East Germany are considered members of the Evangelical churches. They and their pastors have given the Communists considerable difficulty.

Pastors in Jail

A number of pastors, for example, have preferred to go to jail rather than permit socialist funerals.

The new memorandum makes their duty clearer. They are not to take part in socialist funerals, but nothing is said about forbidding them altogether. They may permit other persons besides themselves to speak at a religious ceremony, and they may hold a special religious ceremony in addition to the socialist funeral if relatives ask for it.

According to the bishops, a pastor should refuse to marry a couple if he learns they are ready to participate in a socialist wedding. After such a ceremony, however he may perform a Christian marriage—for example, when they baptize their first child. The bishops feel that the couple in this case should make it quite clear that they earnestly want the Christian ceremony.

Baptism Regulations

Babies who have had a socialist name-giving may be baptized, the bishops say, but it must be clearly explained to the parents and godparents what their duties are in bringing up the child as a Christian. And the child should not have the same set of godparents for both occasions.

It now will be possible for a boy or girl to be confirmed even if he or she has gone through the Communist youth ceremony. The usual age for this is 14 to 16. Young people are under particularly heavy pressure, for the sake of their future schooling and careers, to follow the authorities in this matter.

The bishops insist, however, that the two ceremonies are mutually exclusive. This seems to mean that a candidate for confirmation must renounce any promises he has made to the Communists as part of the youth dedication.

—("The Sentinel", Toronto, December, '59).

"Church is Losing Latin America"

A Chilean priest-educator has said that the Catholic Church is losing Latin America and with it "practically one-half of the Catholics in the world."

Rev. Ronzugu Vekemans, Director of the School of Sociology of the Catholic Pontifical University of Chile, said in Ave Maria, a national Catholic weekly, that the major problem was "just plain secularism."

Fr. Vekemans said only 40,000 priests served 180,000,000 Latin American Catholics, an average of one-per-4,550, compared with 849 in North America and 926 in Europe.

A Vacuum

"Since there are so few priests and so few strong Catholic organisations in Latin America," Father Vekemans said, "masses of people just escaped any Church influence. There is, then, a real 'vacuum' and that is where the Protestants are pouring."

Fr. Vekemans said Latin America could not save itself and "a big movement of the Catholic countries all over the world is the only solution."

"We have to see Latin America as a real mission territory," he said.

—("Evening Press", Dublin, 7th Jan. '60).

[Last month we wrote on this topic and it is interesting to note, in a Roman Catholic paper, confirmatory opinion].

* * *

The Philippine Islands, E. Asia—Still a Mission

The Roman Catholic Church "still considers the Philippines a mission field," after some five hundred years of missionary endeavour. With all the advantages of all the agencies of government, she still has accomplished very little. In the islands she can count only about 163 Philipino priests, while foreign priests number only about fifteen hundred. The Philipinos themselves, however, consider themselves as standing on their own feet, which is always a good thing to do. To Ezekiel God Himself says: "Stand upon thy feet and I will speak unto thee." The Roman Church in the Philippines seems to be a static one, while the Evangelicals in the islands consider themselves as no longer a mission station of the Protestant Churches. For it certainly looks as if the Philipinos were learning to stand upon their own feet. The Evangelicals there no longer consider themselves as a mission station of the Protestant Churches. For fifty years they have been in the islands and in that time have built about three thousand Churches, served by about two thousand Philipino ministers, and there is plenty of room for expansion as well. Indeed a very healthy sign is that the Philippine Church is itself becoming a Church with a mission. Its resources are slender, but it has already sent out missionaries to Africa and Asia, and even to America.

—("The Bulwark", Edinburgh, Dec. '59).

* * *

Protestant Schoolmaster Speaks Out

Speaking of denominational education in his report at the annual Speech Day of Raphoe Royal School, Co. Donegal, the headmaster, Mr. H. R. Cathcart, said he felt that what he had to say was important, but he said it with a certain amount of trepidation, knowing that what one said on the topic was liable to serious misinterpretation.

"I am conscious," he said, "that I speak from the school where Isaac Butt one of the foremost protagonists of the present type of denominational education system, had his schooling."

Mr. Cathcart went on: "When successive Ministers for Education speak of the excellence of our educational system, it must be its denominational aspect they have in mind. We have, indeed, a precious constitutional right to educate our children in schools of our own denominations. We of the minority denominations ought to cherish that right."

"Many are the eulogies sung in praise of the denominational system of education; little is ever said of the price we pay for it as a people. The children of the various denominations are brought up in isolation from one another during their most formative years. Many misunderstandings and prejudices are formed now which in the daily contact of an undenominational system would quickly vanish."

"Irish children are brought up as members of their denominations first, and as Irishmen secondly. They are more conscious of what divides them from their countrymen than of what they have in common—a common nationality."

Suffering by Isolation

"In the Twenty-six Counties, where the Protestant minority is very much a minority, it suffers as a consequence of this isolation, which is built up in our denominational system of education. Its positive contribution to national life, yesterday and to-day, is ignored or unknown. Very many Roman Catholics have never so much as met a Protestant, and the educational system is a contributory factor."

"It is not surprising that Roman Catholics have tended to develop a national exclusiveness. The exclusiveness finds daily expression. Two instances spring to mind. In a recent television broadcast, Miss Siobhan McKenna, the actress, remarked in an aside, 'I am Irish, so, of course, I am a Catholic.'

"We Protestants feel we are no less Irish, even if we do not share her denomination."

"Then, again, in this Olympic year, it is well to remember that Ronnie Delany declared after his wonderful win in Melbourne, that he was glad to have won for 'Catholic Ireland.'

Irish History

"The issue is much wider than these remarks would indicate. This exclusiveness which the Roman Catholic majority feels has expressed itself in a new interpretation of Irish history. Professor Michael Tierney, President of University College, Dublin, is perhaps its leading spokesman. Catholicism is, for him, the force which has welded the Irish people together.

"Recognising the important rôle which Irish Protestants have played in the development of Irish nationalism, he is able to reject that nationalism as a foreign product. Irish nationalism, Dr. Tierney says, is a historical and political doctrine which has 'evolved under the teaching of a series of thinkers, almost all of whom have been of foreign or non-Irish descent.'

"So in the prevailing mood of disillusionment with nationalism which exists in Catholic university circles, one great contribution of Protestant Irishmen to the present State is regarded as something to be condemned. Ironically, we are solely credited with a body of doctrines which in these very days lead Irishmen to actions which all sane men must condemn.

Vital Components

"Catholicism and Gaelicism are the vital components of the modern Irish State and people, according to Dr. Tierney. One suspects that the conclusion to be drawn from this is that the only true Irishman is the Gaelic-speaking Roman Catholic.

"As a corollary Protestant English-speaking Irishman cannot be true Irishmen. I am concerned with how this is going to work out when a new approach is taken to the teaching of Irish history in the schools of the Twenty-six Counties

"Many of all creeds and classes are dissatisfied with the present interpretation of Irish history taught in schools. It is negative. By concentrating on the political side, our school textbooks give a very one-sided view of the development of Ireland. A great emphasis on social history is necessary.

Constructive Sense

"Instead of the old negative view of invaders being taken, we must view each successive invasion as contributing towards the ultimate development of Ireland to-day in a constructive sense. Each group of invaders and settlers contributed something positive and this is only realised when social history is given due consideration.

"We must be brought to see that we are a bastard nation like all nations in Western Europe are. We are a fusion of peoples, with varying traditions and cultures. The fusion of many invaders and settlers has made modern Ireland. It is utterly false to propound any conception of a pure Irish race and culture; no such things exist."

—("Irish Times", 12th January, '60).

* * *

Anti-Semitism

A queer comment: This excerpt is from "The Sunday Times" of 10th January, 1960.

"A leading member of the Jewish community in Britain has declared that the miraculous survival of the Jews, in spite of all the persecutions and vicissitudes of a tragic history, must be connected with the unfolding of God's plan for the ultimate destiny of man.

Thus minority-consciousness breeds a martyr-complex. The statement is either meaningless or arrogant; American Indians, Australian aborigines and for that matter African elephants might all with reason make the same claim."

[We take issue with the writer quoted, Mr. John West, and beg to say that the people of God's own choice, ("thee only have I chosen"), the race of Abraham Isaac and Jacob ought not to be likened to "African elephants." The Providence of God and the destiny of Israel are not phantoms of the prophetic mind, nor groundless and self-deluding folk-lore. The Christian studying God's Word, and the history of the Jewish people sees remarkable age-long fulfilment. Such comments as the above betray ignorance of the teaching of the Bible and deny meaning to history. The better-informed and maturer minds do not lay Holy scripture aside like this].

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	—	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	0	4
The Confessional	—	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing
"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3, 16).

THE widespread distribution of the Word of God is the main work of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which makes free grants of Scriptures, especially considering the needs of those who are unable to buy Scriptures, and to such liberal supplies are sent out free of cost. Many a needy missionary and other worker has had cause to praise God that by this means he has been enabled to fulfil our Lord's command to make disciples of all nations and to preach the Gospel, by giving the Word which is able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Founded 1831

(For the Circulation of Protestant and Uncorrupted Versions of the Word of God)

7 Bury Place, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.1.

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 3—LXIX.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

Page

Passing Events	25
William Shaw Kerr	26
Holiness	27
Editor's Chair	30
The Evolution of the Mass	33

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Search for Sodom & Gomorrah—Diving operations in Dead Sea

Because of bad weather and the failure of some equipment to arrive on time, diving work on the shores of the Dead Sea in preparation for a search for the lost cities of Sodom and Gomorrah has had to be postponed until tomorrow.

The leader of the expedition is Mr. Allen Vincent-Barwood, an assistant professor in education at the American University of Beirut, who was trained as a "frogman" in the Royal Canadian Navy ten years ago, and who has since developed his underwater technique in the lakes of Ethiopia and on the shores of the Eastern Mediterranean. He is accompanied by Mr. Melville Rizzie, of the United States Operations Mission to Jordan, who also acts as adviser to the Jordanian Bureau of Tourism.

The idea of searching for Sodom and Gomorrah grew out of a chance encounter in Amman three months ago. Vincent-Barwood and Rizzie were discussing plans to go diving in the Dead Sea when they were joined by the director of the Tourism Bureau, Mr. Asem Taji. Mr. Taji remarked that bedouin living near the southern shores of the Dead Sea west of the ruined fortress of Kerak had long talked of seeing trees and buildings under the surface of the inland sea.

Seen from the Air

Most of these reports came from the days before the formation of Israel, when there was traffic by boat across the water (since 1948, the border between Israel and Jordan has run down the middle of the Dead Sea, so that there is no longer any traffic between the eastern and western shores). More recently, airline and Air Force pilots had also reported seeing what looked like walls under the surface.

Mr. Taji seems to be a man of action, for within a couple of hours of this meeting Vincent-Barwood and Rizzie were flying south from Amman in King Hussein's personal plane, piloted by Colonel Ibrahim Othman of the Jordan Air Force (who is also Director of Civil Aviation in Jordan) to see for themselves in the area south of the peninsula called Al Lisan (the Tongue) near the southern end of the Dead Sea.

They flew well below sea level, for between the high plateau of Trans-jordan to the east and the escarpment that rises to Hebron and Jerusalem to the west, the Dead Sea lies at the bottom of a great cleft nearly 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. Its northern waters are said to be more than another thousand feet deep, but in the south, where according to local tradition there used to be practicable fords, its depth is estimated at only sixty feet—another encouraging factor for prospective explorers.

Straight Lines

The reconnaissance produced no spectacular results, but just enough to spur the party into planning a diving expedition as soon as it could be arranged. They made out what seemed to be two straight lines under the water, perhaps sixty feet long, whose very straightness at least suggested that they had no natural origin. Until they can make their underwater exploration they are not claiming any more than this.

Whatever secrets the Dead Sea may or may not hold, there is good reason to suppose that the ruins of many ancient settlements lie close at hand, for long before the beginning of the Christian era the western caravan route from Arabia up to Damascus ran close by the shore of the Dead Sea, to fall eventually under the control of the Nabataean stronghold of Petra, lying midway between the southern end of the Dead Sea and the head of the Gulf of Aqaba.

The Nabataean kingdom was annexed by Traian in A.D. 105, but as a province of the Roman Empire the area enjoyed a high level of prosperity for the next five centuries until, after the Arab conquest, it gradually reverted to nomadism as the trade routes shifted north to the Euphrates Valley and west to the Red Sea and Alexandria.

Buoyancy Problem

The expedition will spend the first day or two in experimental diving, for underwater exploration in the Dead Sea presents technical problems of which no one has any previous experience. The density of the water is 30 per cent greater than that of the Mediterranean, which means that at a depth of 60ft. a diver's lungs will be holding three times as much air as they do at the surface, instead of twice as much at the same depth in normal sea water.

The extreme buoyancy of the water, which allows a swimmer to float on the surface of the Dead Sea without any exertion, means that the divers will have to carry something like 35lb. of lead weights to help them down to a depth of 60ft. (3½lb. would be enough in the Mediterranean); this in turn necessitates a special system for releasing the weights in case of emergency, for if a diver found himself in trouble at 60ft. and jettisoned his 35lb. of weights he would shoot to the surface so swiftly that his lungs would burst as the pressure on them rapidly diminished.

—("The Guardian", 30th Dec. '59).

* * *

Vatican Prepares Liturgy Reforms

The Vatican is working on a reform and a possible shortening of the breviary which priests recite every day.

Possible slight changes in wording in a few verses of the Mass are also under study. The modifications are part of a general reform of the liturgy which was started by the late Pope Pius XII with his reforms of the Holy Week and Easter Vigil and the introduction of afternoon Mass.

The general tendency of the reforms is to restore religious services to their original significance. Vatican sources made no prediction on when the reform of the breviary would be announced, but said the Sacred Congregation of Rites had been working on it for some time.

Principal Changes

The sources said that some of the main changes were contemplated in the "Lessons of the Saints" contained in the second nocturn. The nocturns are part of the Matins, the opening section of the Divine Office.

Some of those lessons attribute to a saint miracles which have been found to be legendary and not backed up by recent historical research, the sources said. The need for a revision of those lessons was agreed on at the last Ecumenical Council in 1869/70

The sources said the breviary might also be somewhat shortened, for instance, by combining the three nocturns into two or one. The private reading of the breviary now takes an estimated one hour and a half.

The sources said Catholic publishers have been warned of the expected changes so that they will not print larger editions than necessary of the old breviary.

Even when the reform is announced, however, the Vatican was expected to allow aged priests to continue to use the old version of the breviary if they preferred. The same permission was given when Pius XII ordered a new translation of the Psalms contained in the breviary.

—("Irish Press", 30th December, '59).

[Readers will note with interest that it is now admitted that many alleged miracles of saints which are recounted in the lessons of the Roman Breviary are "legendary." Years ago if a Protestant writer said this he was condemned for bigotry. We welcome the proposed revision because it is in the interests of truth].

—(Continued on p. 35.)

WILLIAM SHAW KERR

In the beginning of February, William Shaw Kerr was removed from the church on earth to receive "a crown of glory that fadeth not away." He had lived eighty-six years, more than sixty years having been spent in the ministry of the Church of Ireland.

Dr Kerr was a native of Co. Wicklow. His mother was a native of Drumcliffe, Co. Sligo, and Dr. Kerr always had an affection for that Western parish, famed nowadays as the burial place of the great poet William Butler Yeats.

Apart from its modern interest as the poet's resting place under the shadow of Ben Bulbin, Drumcliffe lying between Lough Gill and Sligo Bay was beloved by the Revd. Thomas Connellan, founder of this magazine, who spent some of his early years in the priesthood in that district. But far beyond these comparatively recent things, the great Celtic Cross in Drumcliffe church-yard speaks of ancient Christian Ireland. Antiquities are plentiful in that country-side, and primitive Christian traditions are well remembered. We are not wildly astray in tracing some of Dr. Kerr's lifelong interest in the history of Celtic Christianity to early family environment.

* * *

After a good academic course in the University of Dublin Dr. Kerr was ordained in 1897; having won the first Theological Exhibition, which secured for him the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He also won the Elrington Theological Prize, a post-graduate distinction of real merit. He was a curate-assistant in Lurgan and Belfast, and then in 1901 became rector of Ballywalter, Co. Down. There he was near ancient and mediaeval sites connected with Irish Christianity—Bangor, Movilla, Greyabbey. He took due scholarly note of these matters, and long after, in 1932, he published his "The Independence of the Celtic Church in Ireland." This is worth careful attention, for it is full of factual information drawn from the sources. Admittedly it has a controversial note here and there, for Dr. Kerr was a firm Protestant, and valued every genuine indication of early Ireland's freedom from papal control.

* * *

Dr. Kerr's work as a clergyman never was subordinated to his historical studies. He was a most capable and devoted pastor, and in later years had a large share of church administration as Archdeacon of Dromore (when rector of Banbridge) and as Dean and Vicar of Belfast. In these important and busy positions he displayed practical, up-to-date, and well-informed qualities of heart and head. His literary interests never overshadowed his duties. They were the occupations of his spare time.

It was a great joy to his friends and admirers and to well-wishers of the Church that he was elected Bishop of Down and Dromore in 1945. We regretted that he had not become a bishop in the Church of Ireland earlier, but we had the benefit of his episcopal counsel and oversight for ten years, until his retirement.

* * *

Dr. Kerr was a man of candour and goodwill. He engaged in controversy because he believed that the reformed Church must defend its principles and rights, and not let attack on it go by default. He believed in his Church's right to claim continuity with the Christian past, to exercise a true ministry and to give its people the Sacraments of the Gospel. His last literary work was the encyclopaedic "Handbook on the Papacy." His long years of enquiry into papal claims and reflections on the New Testament ensured that the phenomenon of the Papacy in Christendom was thoroughly examined. This work will continue to be consulted for many years.

Interest in religious toleration made the bishop protest against the assumption of a professor in Queen's University, Belfast, that the Church of Ireland in the seventeenth century was guilty of unprovoked aggressiveness and persecution of innocent dissenters. He was able to show (from the autobiographies of Robert Blair and others) that persecution and intolerance were vices of the age, and not of one particular Communion.

Again, a similar cause led to his writing the life of George Walker, "Walker of Derry," the governor of the city during the famous siege. If Walker defended Derry, Kerr defended Walker against the suggestions that he was only the man in charge of the rations, and not vested with military authority.

It may be said of course that these are all outworn and unprofitable issues. But if history is studied at all, it ought to be as reliable as possible. The bishop wanted people to know the past, and to know it correctly.

* * *

The bishop was always a reader of "The Catholic," and occasionally wrote to give an opinion or to ask a question. He was always on the side of honest argument. In personal conversation he was amiable and gracious, friendly and sympathetic. Those who were acquainted with him will always retain very happy memories of him as a distinguished churchman, a firm Protestant, a humble Christian. Those also who recall his weekly column in the "Church of Ireland Gazette" in past years will remember the nimble wit with which he castigated humbug and exposed pretence.

HOLINESS

Holiness is a great New Testament word. We emphasise its New Testament position for we think that a new idea of Holiness entered into life when the Holy One of God became man for our salvation. In the Old Testament we find Holiness often associated with ceremonial; in the New Testament the condition is inward and spiritual. If in the Old Testament we find that Holiness is a certain standing in the sight of Jehovah, in the New we find its meaning in a new relationship to the Father through His Son.

* * *

New Testament commentators tell us that the English word "Holiness" serves as the translation of several Greek words which are thought to have distinct shades of meaning. We must of course find the meaning not simply by turning the word up in the lexicon, but by examining it in its context. This is an obvious rule of translation, and if it were generally observed would save us from some remarkable interpretations of Holy Scripture. We ought not to assume that each distinct Greek word must convey a precise and separate theological significance. For example, in some places in the New Testament we find the word "hagiasmos." This is thought to be an active noun which points out the process of becoming "holy" rather than the state of "Holiness," i.e., consecration with a view to sanctity. We may give it this meaning in the following instances—I Thess. 4, 3.—"This is the will of God, your sanctification" (A.V.): "This is the will of God—your growing holy" (Berkeley version).

2 Thess. 2, 13—"... God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the spirit..." (A.V.): "... God chose you for salvation by the spirit's sanctifying work..." (Berkeley version).

Heb. 12, 14—"... holiness without which no man shall see the Lord" (A.V.): "... holiness without which no one shall see the Lord" (Berkeley version).

1 Peter 1, 2—"... through sanctification of the spirit unto obedience..." (A.V.): "... consecrated by the spirit to be obedient..." (Berkeley version).

In these verses we can see that the word means a process, or step towards an end beyond itself. Yet if we look at the same word in 1 Thess. 4, 4—"Everyone should know how to process his vessel in sanctification and honour" (A.V.): "... in purity and honour..." (Berkeley version).

1 Tim. 2, 15—"... if they continue in faith and charity and holiness..." (A.V.): "... in faith and love and consecration" (Berkeley version). In these two instances we perceive a rather different sense, for the "process" is no longer suggested, and the end or realisation is attained.

From this example we think we are justified in refusing to make hard distinctions in the use of Greek words. We believe we ought to hesitate to say that a word means one thing and that only. The sacred writers used the vernacular Greek of the Holy Land according to current practice, and not as classical scholars.

* * *

A second word "hagiotēs" occurs, and the meaning appears to be "the idea of Holiness," the abstract thought. This is a philosophical use of the word, and as such we do not expect to find much employment of it in such practical writings as the books of the New Testament. We find it twice.

2 Cor. 1, 12—"... in simplicity and godly sincerity..." (A.V., simplicity being the translation of "hagiotēs"): "... devout motives and godly sincerity..." (Berkeley version), "... in holiness and with pure motives..." (Weymouth), "... with holiness and godly sincerity..." (S.R.V.).

Heb. 12, 10—"... He for our profit that we might be partakers of His holiness" (A.V.): "... that we may share in His holiness" (Berkeley version): "... that we may become sharers in His holy character" (Weymouth).

* * *

"Hagiosune" is defined as the state which results from "hagiasmos", i.e., the fruit or result of sanctification. This is the final condition (apart from glorification) of redeemed men.

Rom. 1, 4—"According to the Spirit of Holiness..." (A.V.): "Spirit of Holiness..." (Berkeley version): "His spirit of holiness" (Weymouth).

2 Cor. 7, 1—"Perfecting Holiness in the fear of God" (A.V.). This appears to mean attaining to, or reaching up to, the final state of Holiness. "Complete our dedication by reverence of God"—this is the Berkeley version, and does not impress us as a good or intelligible translation. "Attain to holiness through the fear of God" is Weymouth and is sensible and understandable, like the A.V.

* * *

"Hosiotēs" is a different sort of word, and is translated "piety" or "holiness." It is found a number of times in the Greek Old Testament, and is found in just two places in the New Testament.

Lk. 1, 75,—the hymn of Zecharias "In holiness and righteousness before Him..." (A.V.). The Berkeley version is the same, and Weymouth translates "in holiness and uprightness..." The S.R.V. is as A.V. here.

Eph. 4, 24—"... the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (A.V.): "... created in the righteousness and holiness of the truth" (Weymouth: a very different sense is conveyed by this translation): "... The new nature that is created in God's likeness in genuine righteousness and holiness" (Berkeley version): "... after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness" (S.R.V.)

The word seems to refer, like "hagiosune," to the resultant state which is the outcome of the pursuit of holiness ("hagiasmos").

* * *

These words show us the different aspects of "Holiness" as a Christian objective and as a Christian attainment.

We may emphasise its imperative character, and God's demand:

"Be ye holy, for I am holy." 1 Pet. 1, 16.

"Not called unto uncleanness, but unto holiness." 1 Thess. 4, 7.

"Meet for the Master's use." 2 Tim. 2, 21.

The call is both imperative and exacting, but we are never to think that God makes demands upon us without giving the necessary assistance to meet them—"My Grace is sufficient for thee" is a pledge to all of us as well as to St. Paul to whom it was first given.

There is also a true state of Holiness which is our standing in Christ—William Bright truly spoke—

"Look, Father, look on His anointed face,
"And only look on us as found in Him."

So also did J. G. Deck—

"Ascended now, in glory bright,
"Still one with us Thou art;
"Nor life, nor death, nor depth, nor height
"Thy saints and Thee can part."

What greater glory and honour can the people of God possess or contemplate than their real sharing in the Holiness of Christ, imputed to them, and then conferred upon them?

* * *

Lest, to the outside world, this should seem to be totally unreal, and merely a figment, we repeat that God has given us effective means of Holiness. We may premise the grace which brings repentance, and the ministry of the Spirit; and we must add, the Precious Blood, the instrument of deliverance. Those who seek forgiveness must remember the purpose of Holy Scripture to reveal to us our actual state and its incompatibility with Godliness and eternal life. Holy Scripture speaks to us more realistically and faithfully than self about our condition—"the wages of sin is death," and who is without sin by nature? But Holy Scripture displays the love of the Father for His children, and the redemption provided for us.

Let us remember also that prayer is a great assistance to all who seek amendment of life here, and life beyond the grave hereafter. People who think that prayer and communion with God—Israel, even when thoughts of eternal life were faint, found in prayer a practical means to Holiness and to the life of God in the soul.

We may consider too the example of Our Lord when He was among us on earth. He "went about doing good," and so ought we to do. He loved His enemies and forgave them, and so ought we to do. He put the Father's will first. That is what we must do. He prayed, and He served, for He came "not to be ministered unto, but to minister," as well as "to give His life a ransom for many."

* * *

But, someone will ask, "what is Holiness?" Why has there so far been no definition? We say that Holiness is separation—from what? From "the filth of the flesh" (2. Cor. 7, 1.); from "uncleanness" (1 Thess. 4, 7.); surrendering oneself to righteousness (Rom. 6, 19.). Holiness is on the positive side "separation unto God" in will and work. It means offering ourselves willingly to God's service, and pursuing the Godward path of duty in a spirit of kindness and humility. It means direction and purpose of life, and acceptance with God in the very condition God lays down, i.e., being "in Christ."

Holiness is not Pharisaic or sanctimonious. As humility is a necessary ingredient it can never be marked by any condescension from supposed superiority—"in honour preferring one another" is the way of God's Word.

Self-righteousness has no place in Holiness, for the Christian acclaims Him Whose title is "The Lord OUR Righteousness." This is not a title only: it is a fact of our redemption. There may be pretended holiness—perhaps less common now than heretofore, for to-day there are few earthly advantages in being, or seeming to be, a Christian. But of course pretended holiness is no more admirable than any other pretended thing. The pity is that many people who accept with equanimity the pretences of secular life, and will not condemn, say, the honest lawyer because there have been dishonest ones, are ready to condemn all Holiness and all Christians because there are some bogus ones. The explanation of this unreasonableness is that it excuses them from bearing the responsibilities of the Christian faith—thus here as elsewhere "wisdom is justified of her children."

* * *

We end with the plain text of Holy Scripture quoted—"Without Holiness no man shall see God": how can we meet this? "He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in HIM." 2 Cor. 5, 21.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

WHY BE A PROTESTANT?

Lately we were asked this question by a young man. His mood was quite serious. He had heard carefully prepared statements in justification of a number of Roman Catholic doctrines which Protestants reject, and was inclined to be impressed by them. He was also discovering that there are some presentations of the Protestant cause which are prejudiced and partisan. In a mood of reaction from ignorant Protestantism he was not inclined to turn to well-informed Protestantism, but rather he inclined to lend a sympathetic ear to Rome.

* * *

We cannot too often urge that the propaganda of our cause, the holy cause of truth, ought to be accurate; and it ought to be Christian in spirit and courteous in expression. To be indifferent to accuracy and good manners ill becomes professing Christians. Wrong attitudes may repel thoughtful Protestants, and will certainly not attract thoughtful Roman Catholics.

* * *

To speak "the truth in love" is a Christian duty; and to declare our faith and indicate our stand with reasonableness and good taste is obligatory on all of us. When a young Protestant is led to ask the question above we may wonder what chain of thought led him to the point of perplexity. It is not at all like the drift into secularism or agnosticism. These may be furthered by extremes of biblical criticism or "modernism." A leaning to Rome must reject both, for Rome has long prohibited "modernistic" ideas ("Lamentabile," and "Pascendi Gregis," Pius X), and has always taught the integrity and inspiration of Holy Scripture. We are at one with Rome here, in a certain sense, but it must be constantly kept in mind that when the Protestant declares that Holy Scripture is "the Rule of Faith," Rome adds "Tradition" as an equally reliable and necessary source of doctrine. The man who is told that Rome uncompromisingly upholds God's Word ought to be alert enough and instructed enough to know that Rome cannot be content with God's Word, but must add human traditions in order to arrive at what it calls "Catholic Truth." The traditions are not less human for being called "divine traditions."

* * *

If that Church accepts Holy Scripture as the Word of God, this is a fair enquiry to make—Why do you not allow Holy Scripture to have its proper and controlling influence in your Creed? Why do you commonly regard it as but the raw material of doctrine, which must be processed by development before it can give the dogmas necessary to salvation?

* * *

We believe in our Lord Jesus Christ as the Incarnate Word, the Redeemer and the Mediator: Rome believes this too. But it cannot be content to recognise the Mediatorship of our Lord without supplementing it or augmenting it by the mediation of the saints and especially by the mediation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of Our Lord.

Our Lord Himself invited us to come to Him, and to ask in His Name. Never did He suggest any other channel of grace or intercession or mediation. We, Protestants, are bound to say "Why must you go beyond the faith of Scripture and the Ancient Church and build up a claim that Our Lord's Mother is "Co-Mediatrix" of the whole race? We ask this without any will to belittle the current faith of Roman Catholicism. We wish only to treat a serious matter in a serious way and to underline our difficulties in consenting to these new views of Christianity. We believe that the old Christianity is better and truer.

* * *

Why, we ask, is it now possible to put forward as a reasonable opinion the view that in the Holy Communion the communicants receive not only the flesh of Christ but the flesh of the Blessed Virgin? We know that this is still only an opinion (held, perhaps by very few), but it is something which can develop into an opinion which it would be rash to deny, and this is a long step towards a dogma. To the Protestant this is one of the fruits of the theory of transubstantiation, involving the change of the bread and wine into the material flesh and blood of Our Lord. As a result of that theory it can be said that as Our Lord received His material Body from the Blessed Virgin, her flesh must be there as well as His.

* * *

Acknowledging that in early centuries certain great bishops were designated "patriarchal" sees, we do not deny that the Bishop of Rome was called "patriarch of the West." But this is quite different from assenting to the far later (in fact, modern) belief in the Papal infallibility. The Protestant, reverting to older and sounder views, agrees with Pope Adrian VI (A.D. 1516), that "many popes have been heretical." We do not say this in order to be "anti-Roman," but in order to be as right in our beliefs as possible, and in order to preserve the purity of the Christian religion. For us Christianity is not something given to the world as an acorn, which will not display its fulness and real significance until it has developed into a full-grown oak-tree. Rather, for us, Christianity is "the faith once for all delivered to the saints" as St. Jude puts it. How could we bring ourselves to agree that the faith of the apostles as testified to by their words written in the New Testament is not sufficient for us? or that it was defective or incomplete?

It may be answered that the apostles and every generation of Christians since their day believed everything that modern Roman Catholicism teaches, including the dogma of 1950 "with an implicit faith." We can however set no store by "an implicit faith," for the phrase is but a convenient way out of the difficulty created by the known facts of apostolic faith and primitive Christianity.

To say that we believe "implicitly" in anything appears to mean that we believe wholeheartedly and without reservations—can it really be made to mean "if modern dogmas had been formulated in the first century, first-century-Christians would have believed them." This we find hard to accept. It is an assumption which can never be supported by facts. The Christian faith is not the outcome of deductive reasoning upon various a priori data —it is the revelation of God's purposes in a Person—His only Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the scriptures written for our learning.

* * *

While there are very many truths upon which we and the Roman Catholic faith are agreed, we repeat that we tend to grasp many truths in different ways. We allow the teaching of God's Word to become our doctrine, while the Roman Catholic faith, so it seems to us, subordinates God's Word to a system of scholastic reasoning. The end of this is that what is called "the living voice of the Church" is all that matters—the Bible has served its purpose, and the present is set free from the past—hence Cardinal Manning, less than a century ago, was able to say that the appeal to history is a heresy. Just as King Louis XIV of France is said to have declared "I am the State," so, a hundred years later, Pope Pius IX is supposed to have said "I am Tradition." The Creed of his predecessor, Pope Pius IV stated that Scripture and Tradition are equally sources of Christian truth—now we must add to that creed the third source—"the living voice of the Church," and it may effectively replace the other two. That, it seems to us, is the deduction to be drawn from the claim of Pío Nono "I am Tradition." Papal Infallibility is a great obstacle in the path of Protestants. As a dogma it was never needed—General Councils, even Roman General Councils could have given the world the new dogmas as demand for them arose. The decree of Infallibility, pronounced as the armies of Italy closed in upon the city of Rome, last remnant of the Temporal Power, was the Church's rejoinder to the Italian State.

* * *

Let us return to our Protestant young man. What needs to be said to him? We may reply that he needs to be taken through a complete course of evangelical religion, and taught the history of the Reformation. This of course would be highly desirable, but the truth is that few young men to-day are prepared to investigate patiently the case for Protestantism, and the intellectual and spiritual issues which abundantly justify our rejection of Rome as a system. Also there is the young Roman Catholic lady who is the usual cause of the whole situation—she may not be too patient either! So, we must limit our discussions. First of all we must firmly say that the differences between us are neither trifles nor figments. We may agree on certain facts: but our respective interpretations of the facts carry us far apart. We disagree not as to the facts, but as to their meaning, and this is no negligible thing.

* * *

1. We can discuss the claim that priestly power can transform radically the elements of bread and wine in the Eucharist so that they cease absolutely to be in their substance bread and wine, and become the flesh and blood of Christ (all appearance to the contrary notwithstanding). May not the possibility or impossibility of this call for serious and well-informed discussion? Must the words used by Our Lord at the Last Supper—"This is My Body" be given such a literal interpretation as to compel us to recognise that there and then the bread ceased to be bread and became flesh? Why should we not then come to the same view of the phrase "I am the Door"? or "I am the Way"? or "I am the True Vine"? We read the great sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel and note how Our Lord emphasises that He is "the Bread from heaven." We say, does this not confirm us in a literal interpretation? But then we go on to the end of this same chapter and read His Words—"What gives life is the Spirit: flesh is of no avail at all. The words I have uttered to you are spirit and life" (Moffatt). "Only the spirit gives life: the flesh is of no avail: and the words I have been speaking to you are spirit and life" (Knox). "The Spirit is the life-giver; the flesh does not benefit at all. The messages I bring you are spirit and life" (Berkeley version). "It is the Spirit which gives life. The flesh confers no benefit whatever. The words I have spoken to you are Spirit and are Life" (Weymouth). Here we have four different modern translations, Moffatt a liberal Protestant, Knox a Roman Catholic Monsignor, the Berkeley version a conservative Protestant one, and Weymouth a sound classical scholar, and they all agree in showing (as do A.V., R.V., and S.R.V.) that the Words of Christ positively exclude a mere literal interpretation in John, 6. If that is so we cannot be safe in assuming a strict literal view of "This is My Body."

* * *

2. We can discuss what is the sacrifice (i.e. what is the victim immolated) in the Eucharist or Mass. We note that this is something separate from the Communion of the faithful. The purpose of the rite is not Communion so much as the offering of the Sacrifice. What is it? The Roman Catholic Church teaches—"It is a dogmatic truth that Christ, under the appearances of bread and wine, is the proper sacrificial gift offered in the Sacrifice of the Mass . . . The consecration is the external sign under which Christ is offered to the Father upon the altar under the appearances of bread and wine." ("Live the Mass" Joseph Kramp, S.J., Catechetical Guild, St. Paul, Minnesota, 1953).

In this book we read also that the Bread and Wine "are physically changed into the Body and Blood of Christ, and in this state are offered to God."

"The question why the Mass is a sacrifice at all is not answered by replying that it represents in some manner the death of Christ, but rather by pointing out that Christ, Who issues from the sacrificial conversion [i.e. from the transubstantiation], is offered to God."

"The Mass renews the sacrifice of the cross because Christ . . . is offered again. The act of offering Christ is renewed, but not in the manner in which He was offered on Calvary." These quotations from the Jesuit-Father Kramp's book do not refer to notions entertained unofficially in the later Middle Ages, but to the present official doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. That Church has no other doctrine of the Mass. Is it not strange that many an ill-informed Anglican writer stupidly attempts to deny that this is Roman Catholic doctrine? A couple of years ago we pointed this out in the case of the versatile Gregory Dix, who in his little book on Anglican Orders tried to argue that the powers claimed for the priesthood in Rome and in the Church of England are identical, though he did modify this dubious position a little by referring to the Mass as offering Christ in an unbloody manner. But as this is plainly no part of Anglican doctrine Dix tried to minimise its significance in Roman doctrine. Thus his readers, insufficiently taught in these matters are led astray.

* * *

These subjects may be discussed, we believe, with the New Testament as the necessary equipment, and we believe also that we all need clear convictions, based on sound information, about the true nature of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. These points we make were vital factors in the Reformation and they must be kept before us as vital factors in the Christian Church to-day.

* * *

Long ago it might have been possible to set aside the beliefs held about the Blessed Virgin Mary as being mainly matters of private choice and devotion, but now they are official, not private and personal. Now they have been brought forward as major aspects of Christian truth. So we may discuss

3. Mariology is the modern word used to systematise what the Roman Catholic faith holds as true about Our Lord's Mother. Mariology is now an integral part of Theology and of Christology. The measure of its importance is seen when we recall that since 1870 when Papal Infallibility was decreed, the only infallible pronouncement was in 1950, and it declared that faith in the Blessed Virgin's bodily assumption into Heaven is a truth necessary to salvation. Sixteen years before 1870 Pope Pius IX had declared the dogma of her Immaculate Conception.

The Blessed Virgin seems now to be the Hearer of prayer, the Mediatrix between the sinner and the Saviour, the one through whom all divine graces flow to us, and the active participant in redemption of the human race. Needless to say we will find in discussing these questions that the New Testament is the Sine qua Non. There is no substitute for it. The Protestant young man must be encouraged to examine the system of Mariology, and see if by clear and honest thought he can harmonise it with the Gospel. We do not see how a Protestant can reconcile it, for he has not grown up in the spiritual and devotional atmosphere of the Roman Catholic religion, and what seems natural and almost instinctive to a Roman Catholic must be a growing difficulty to a Protestant. The more he studies it objectively, the harder it becomes.

* * *

One more matter may be put forward for discussion under the circumstances we have outlined.

4. The doctrine of Purgatory. Here again some simple-minded Anglicans have made common ground with Rome by expanding their own dim and confused thoughts of the nature of the Intermediate State, and at the same time by abating and reducing the Roman Catholic doctrine of Purgatory. This is very unfair. We must go to Rome's official teachings and official practices in order to have a just appreciation of its doctrine. If we set out clearly the meaning of indulgenced prayers and altars, and the theology of Masses for deceased souls, and the treasury of merit, and then expound to our young man the teaching of Our Lord, and His Apostles, he may readily see, we think, that there really are very respectable reasons for being a Protestant. In fact, a sound intellectual case may still be made for our Reformed Faith.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MASS.

An address by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D., in "The Case for Protestantism" series, and reprinted from "Evangelical Action," Australia.

(1)

It is sometimes asked of Protestants: If, as you say, the sacrifice of the Mass has no authority, how do you account for the fact that so many learned and earnest men accept it as a Divine institution? That is a fair question, and thoughtful Protestants feel compelled to return an answer.

Where there are serious differences of judgment the only useful procedure in discussing them is to make an appeal to facts. Facts that are admitted on both sides are the greatest value. But, in addition, facts can be arrayed concerning which there may be differences of interpretation. The investigator must himself judge as to the value of the inference. Protestants believe that the doctrine of the Mass arose very gradually in the Church, that it has not the weight of apostolic testimony behind it, and its later forms depart from the institution of our Lord in many important particulars. They say that the acceptance of the practice can be explained by the gradual decay of Scripture learning which proved so disturbing from the ninth to the sixteenth century. Of course this contention is very stoutly resisted by many learned and earnest men. It is wise, therefore, to examine the evidence carefully, relying as far as possible on admitted facts.

(2)

The Origin of the Term

Protestants point out, first of all, that the name Mass did not emerge until almost the fifth century. Most scholars are now prepared to admit that the word signified "dismissal" or "release." In this matter most modern commentators would follow the opinion of Florus Diaconus, who writes "Nothing else is meant than dismissal, i.e., release, which the celebration being over, the Deacon then announces when the people are dismissed from the solemn observance. Whence the Canons speak also of the Mass of the Catechumens, when after the reading of the Gospel, the sacred mysteries begin to be celebrated, at which it is lawful for no one to be present unless regenerated in the font of baptism. For then, at the cry of the Deacon, the said Catechumens were sent away—that is, were dismissed and put out. The Mass (missa, dismissal) of the Catechumens, therefore, took place before the celebration of the Sacrament; the Mass (dismissal) of the faithful takes place after the consecration and Communion" (quoted in Scudamore Notitia Eucharistica, p. 2). Scudamore rejects the attempt to derive the word from the Hebrew "Missah," and we think it is equally impossible to trace it to the Hebrew word "mincahah," as Bellarmine attempted to do. At least, Protestants can point out that the derivation from the Latin words "Ite, missa est" won favour from such eminent authorities as Durantus, Cardinal Bona, and Le Brun. So we are justified in saying that the name is comparatively late in origin and derived from a phrase in the Latin service books which bears no reference whatever to the idea of sacrifice.

(3)

The Roman Catholic Ideas

Still it is more important to deal with the ideas that have been allowed to cluster round the title. The Council of Trent assists us to obtain a full definition of the term Mass, as it is now used in Roman Catholic circles. The Council passed many Canons relating to this subject. Perhaps Canon III, Session XXII, gives us a clear picture. It reads: "If any one saith, that the Sacrifice of the Mass is only a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; or that it is a bare commemoration of the sacrifice consummated on the Cross, but not a propitiatory sacrifice; or that it profits him only who receives: and that it ought not to be offered for the living and the dead for sins, pains, satisfactions and other necessities; let him be anathema."

It is worth noting that the Council, probably mindful of the early use of the word Mass, introduces a qualifying clause into the title. It does not speak simply of the Mass. It prefers the longer term, "The sacrifice of the Mass." That is all to the good, as it helps to narrow the issue, as the history of the Reformation period clearly indicates that it has been narrowed.

The real issue is here stated with very great precision! Protestants are challenged on four points: They assert that any sacrifice in holy communion is only a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. They also assert that the holy communion, which was later and erroneously called the Mass, is a commemoration of the sacrifice consummated on the Cross, and it not a propitiatory sacrifice. They assert it profits him only who receives; and that it cannot be offered for the living and the dead for sins. These are very important differences and they loomed very large in the discussions of eminent divines of both sections in the period of the Reformation.

(4)

The Growth of these Ideas

It is only possible, however, in the course of this broadcast to endeavour to make good the contention of Protestants that the theory of the sacrifice of the Mass was of very slow growth. The name became a commonplace about the seventh century, but the development of the later idea that it indicated a propitiatory sacrifice is very much later. The word originally meant no more than a public service. Hefele, no prejudiced authority writes, "We see from this that at that time (he is referring to a religious conference at Burgundy held at about 500 A.D.), the formula "missa est" or "missa fit" was used also at the close of the sittings of the Courts."

We learn still further through Sirmond, in his learned notes on the letters of Avitus, that the expression "ite, missa est" was in ancient times, and partly in the Middle Ages, used not merely at the holy sacrifice, but also at other religious services; and for this reason also Matins were called "Missae Vespertinae" (History of Church Councils, 451 to 680, p. 57). He gives as an authority for the latter statement the Council of Agde held 506 A.D. There were 355 bishops present and 34 subscribed. The celebrated Caesarius, Archbishop of Arles, heads the list of subscribers. We can see from this that in the earliest eras of the Church even the title Mass did not carry with it the implications attached to it by the Council of Trent.

It is a facile method of approach and a definitely dangerous one to say, "Ah! here is the name Mass and, therefore, here also is the fully formulated doctrine which I have learned to attach to the name." Unfortunately, not many people read Hefele, and they look with suspicion on any statement that attaches to the word a meaning other than its common signification at the present time. But Bishop Hefele knew what he was saying. The value of this wide usage to Protestants is that it paves the way for the declaration so strenuously opposed by others that the idea of the sacrifice of the Mass is comparatively modern.

(5)

The first step in this evolution consisted in the gradual restriction of the word to the one service of the Church which is called sometimes the Eucharist and sometimes the Holy Communion. The original reason for this restriction is that the Holy Communion concluded the worship of the people. In very early times the sacred feast was held at night. At a later date it followed the service of the Catechumens. "After the sermon," writes Augustine, "the dismissal of the Catechumens takes place, the faithful remain" (Serm. XLIX). When the Mass came to be associated solely with the service of Holy Communion the question was raised as to the relation of this service to the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ offered on the Cross of Calvary. For a very long time the connection was regarded as commemorative and not truly and properly a sacrifice for the sins of men.

Dr. Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, pointed out that Peter the Lombard wrote, "But if it is inquired of what sort that conversion may be, whether formal or substantial, or of some other kind, I do not take upon me to define" (A Defence of the Exposition of the Doctrine of the Church of England—Gibson's Preservative from Popery, Vol. XII, p. 208). Aquinas submitted this matter to the decision of the Council of Lateran in 1215, but followed Peter the Lombard in regarding the sacrifice of the Mass, as a figure of the great sacrifice of Calvary. Lombard wrote, "That which is offered and consecrated of the priest is called a sacrifice and oblation, because it is a memory and representation of the true sacrifice and holy oblation made in the altar of the Cross" (Lib. IV, Dist. 12, p. 745, Colon, 1619). This is sufficient to show that very eminent writers in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were not yet prepared to enunciate in full the doctrine of the Mass as the Council of Trent expressed it. The Jesuit Suarez advises that the scholastics are to be corrected who assert that this doctrine concerning transubstantiation is not very old, and numbers Scotus and Gabriel Biel in that category (III, Pt.d Th., vol. 3, disp. 550, par 1, p.593). The evolution of the doctrine, Protestants maintain on this evidence, was slow and did not reach maturity until the sixteenth century.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 26.

Churches' world council in contact with Rome —Dr. Fisher tells of exchanges

("The Guardian" 17-2-1960)

A deep concern for those emigrating from the mother country to other parts of the Commonwealth and, as well, for the pastoral care of immigrants coming into this country, formed the theme of a moving debate at the Church Assembly at Westminster, presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Bishop of Coventry (Dr. Bardsley) said that since the war the Church's work in this sphere had revived on the most astonishing scale. "It is indeed a heroic work which the Church is accomplishing with an administrative staff of only six." Last year 4,500 families who were emigrating had been helped and in recent years members of that small head-quarter's staff had personally helped and seen off at the port no fewer than 12,585 emigrants. Dr. Bardsley said it was a labour of love which was carried on day and night.

The Bishop of Warrington (Right Rev. C. R. Claxton) said it was a splendid thing that 85 families a week were being assisted by the Church of England Council for Commonwealth Settlement but he would very much like to see a similar system operating in Africa, in Malaya, and in the West Indies regarding people coming from overseas to live in England.

All speakers in the debate stressed the need for additional Government help. A report from the council to the Church Assembly asking for a grant of not more than £5,000 a year was approved.

Contacts with Rome

Summing up a debate about co-operation of the Churches throughout the world, the Archbishop of Canterbury said there had been an "astonishing development for good—though not always very obvious." One outward sign of this co-operation was Inter-Church Aid for Refugees.

Earlier Dr. Fisher had answered a comment by Mr. Ivor Bulmer-Thomas (London) that the great mass of Roman Catholics were outside this field of co-operation. The Archbishop replied that the Roman Catholics "were not totally out." A very intimate relation, even if it was not formal, was developing with highly placed representatives of the Church of Rome. Anglicans, Orthodox, and Protestants were being brought together. Things they had previously regarded as insoluble were gradually being found to be capable of solution.

The Bishop of Manchester (Dr. Greer) hoped that even though other Christians took the opposite opinion "the Church would highlight the view that the use of nuclear weapons was immoral in all circumstances."

Anti-Semitism

The House of Laity unanimously endorsed a motion by Mr. Malcolm McQueen (London) . . . "that this House deplores the recent outbreaks of anti-Semitism in various countries, including our own, and calls on all men of goodwill to resist by every means in their power all forms of racial bitterness and hatred." Mr. McQueen further urged churchpeople to do everything possible to foster friendly relationships between Christians and Jews.

He said they could not minimise the ugliness of the situation. There had been over a thousand incidents in 250 cities and the desecration of 34 cemeteries. Sometimes he had wondered if there was an organisation behind it—although there appeared to be no evidence for that.

[What the Archbishop of Canterbury had in mind in his reference to Rome we cannot tell. If, however, the "things previously regarded as insoluble" now "being found capable of solution" mean that the Roman Catholic Church is tending towards a more scriptural view of the christian faith, we rejoice. If they don't mean this, we ought to ask if they mean at least a more tolerant view of other Christians].

* * *

Greater Giving to the Church Overseas— Bishop's call at Assembly

("The Guardian" 18-2-1960)

Almost a session of the Church Assembly at Westminster was devoted to the work of the Church overseas and the insistent call for greater giving of manpower and money.

The Bishop of Liverpool (Dr. Clifford Martin) said the situation facing the Church overseas was totally different from what it was ten years ago. New winds of change were blowing and their velocity would undoubtedly increase in the days to come. This week the Prime Minister had said that the most striking of all the impressions he had formed was the strength of African national consciousness. The same thing was true, Dr. Martin said, in the life of the Church.

In Africa the Church showed a clear desire to be free from Western domination. It wanted to discard all that seemed "foreign." It was the duty of the Mother Church to try to help the Church in Africa to become truly indigenous. "With the Cross firmly planted in the soil of Africa, with the Government of the Church there committed to her own people"—then indeed the Church in Africa might win millions of hitherto uncommitted Africans to the service of Christ.

The Church had also to consider the effect of rapid industrialisation—instanced by India's steel mills and Hongkong's weaving factories. Not long ago in the Southern Sudan he had driven through a primeval forest and, suddenly turning a corner, his car came into a place that looked just like Oldham or Rochdale. The ancient religions of Buddhism, Hinduism, and Islam had become very militant. Far more people were being won for Islam in Africa than were being converted to Christianity.

Technicians Needed

Dr. Martin described the situation regarding overseas Church work as one of "unparalleled opportunity and dramatic urgency." Africans desperately needed training for the task of shouldering their own responsibilities. Expenditure by parishes here in England on overseas missions had sunk from 8.6 per cent in 1920 to 3.1 per cent in 1956. It was essential, at least, to double the present giving to the Church overseas, and that would mean that Church people in this country ought to raise another one and a quarter million a year.

The Archdeacon of Blackburn (the Ven. A. S. Picton) stressed the valuable missionary work of the Misions to Seamen, and the Archdeacon of Bradford (the Ven. H. L. Higgs) said that the adolescents of England had three millions a day in their pockets to spend—we should teach them to give. The Bishop of Manchester (Dr. William Greer) told the Assembly that if only the whole Church (with the emphasis on the word whole) was behind the effort "we shall get what we want and more."

Dr. Martin appealed for a whole-hearted lead in this country to respond to the call to evangelise the world on a scale never before attempted. To do that they had to break down the task into manageable proportions. The need for daily prayer came first of all, then for priests, teachers, doctors, nurses, and technicians to offer themselves. Many hundreds of new missionaries were needed.

What he had said of Africa was also true of Asia. The social changes sweeping across the world revealed national independence all over the place, rapid industrialisation, advancing educational standards and the decrease of illiteracy, large population movements—especially in the Chinese dispersion—all these factors pointed to the need for a bold and far-reaching programme.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND
AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William, Bedell	—	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3, 16).

THE widespread distribution of the Word of God is the main work of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which makes free grants of Scriptures, especially considering the needs of those who are unable to buy Scriptures, and to such liberal supplies are sent out free of cost. Many a needy missionary and other worker has had cause to praise God that by this means he has been enabled to fulfil our Lord's command to make disciples of all nations and to preach the Gospel, by giving the Word which is able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Founded 1831

(For the Circulation of Protestant and Uncorrupted Versions of the Word of God)

7 Bury Place, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.1.

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 4—LXIX.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by
THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	37
Resurrection	37
The Meaning of Protestantism	39
Editor's Chair	42
A Riddle from the Dead Sea	44
Republic of Haiti	46

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

The New Scientific Ideology

(From the Very Rev. Dr. T. M. Johnstone)

Sir, — Scientists and scientifically minded people are certainly wonderful folk, and where they express themselves through channels like the TV Brains Trust, etc., are certainly well worth listening to. Where and how otherwise would one ever have such a golden opportunity of hearing such excellent and informative talkers as Bronowski, Huxley, Marghanita Laskie or Bertrand Russell?

Yet, while listening, invariably with pleasure and approval to their talks and discussions, on their own subjects, I would not be prepared on all matters, and especially those of the Christian faith, to take any of them as my guide, philosopher and friend.

Dr. Bertrand Russell, for example, when catechised on Friday evening about Christ's Sonship by the Asian Club came off with the opinion that he wasn't aware that Jesus ever claimed such Divine relationship. A young lady member of the club, an Indian, I think, dissented from his opinion. She presumably had in mind such statements of Jesus as "I and my Father are one" and "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

Dr. Glyn Daniel, lecturer in archaeology and anthropology in St. John's College, Cambridge, paid tribute, when speaking in Belfast the other evening to Archbishop Ussher whose extraordinary tables decided that the date of man's creation and that of the world was 4,004 B.C. Dr.

Daniel stated that the existence of man on earth was a matter of 6,000 years. It would only be possible, he added, when nuclear physics had given us "carbon 14" that we would be able to provide accurate pre-history dates.

All credit, then, to James Ussher, who without the aid of "carbon 14," made from the information set forth in Genesis, such a workable, believable schedule as he did.

But, Sir Julian Huxley, a star in the scientific galaxy, has now somewhat ruthlessly out-Heroded all his scientifically minded ideologic brethren by declaring publicly before the representatives of 27 countries at Chicago, that the world's religions were all destined to disappear. We would no longer be able to repose in the arms of a divinized Father. The God for whom he is apparently the baptist herald will be an evolutionary figure evolved, I would gather from such human manifestations as have created the H-bomb and other "kindly" creations of scientific brains.

These scientific brethren, from their ivory towers, are going to pull down, if they can, yes, and destroy, the whole fabric of our Christian faith. The new god previewed by Dr. Huxley may look all right to him. He would certainly not be my cup of tea, nor I imagine of the world's untold millions.—THOS. M. JOHNSTONE, Ex-Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

[This letter is from "The Northern Whig" Belfast, 7/12/'59. We think it expresses a valuable point of view].

* * *

Christian Unity Discussions—"Progress" during Year

New York, December 27.

During 1959 it has become obvious that Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Eastern

—(Continued on p. 47.)

RESURRECTION.

There is no case for Christianity if we set aside the fact of Resurrection. The Gospel is the testimony to a future risen life for the people of God just as Our Lord is the Witness to that life by the fact of His own triumph over death.

It is of course possible to claim that there is a Christianity which survives the denial of the Resurrection—but what sort of Christianity? Whose definition of Christianity? Is it really entitled to be called Christianity? We can suggest that this sort of Christianity will be defended as (a) affirming a great deal that Jesus taught, and (b) acknowledging Him as one of man's greatest teachers.

We may never undervalue the importance and urgency of the actual teaching of Our Lord: but how are we to demonstrate its truth and substantiate its claims if the Teacher Himself has not some compelling right to be heard? We are under no duty to listen to Socrates; but we are under an obligation to listen to the Christ—"This is My beloved Son, hear Him."

The words of Our Lord are very striking and give us the point-of-view of an unusual personality—does it follow that His words are bound to be true? May not the poetry and pathos of the Christian story be placed among the other great and beautiful epics of the human race—expressive of our dreams but not of the realities of life?

* * *

Take away the Resurrection and you take from Christianity its rights, for without the Empty Tomb and the Risen Lord Who has the Keys of Hell and of Death Christianity can never have come from God. It can only have arisen from the hearts of men. We know, of course, how it can be argued that what rises from man's deepest longings and loftiest hopes must come from God. But that is not the sense of things we have in mind when we say that the Resurrection bears witness to Christianity as an immediate mighty act of God. It is, so to speak, an invasion of the best in the natural order by the divine initiative. It is the Word becoming flesh, and the Incarnation purposed the Resurrection just as the Resurrection reveals that the Incarnation of the Word had taken place.

The Annunciation to the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Virgin Birth were in their time private events—the public demonstration that they had in fact taken place may be found in the fact that Our Lord could not be kept prisoner of death. Easter Day is the church's day of triumphant faith, and the Cross like death itself "is swallowed up in victory."

* * *

There is an old adage that "coming events cast their shadows before"—this homely phrase is a bit of ancient wisdom and must contain some intimation of truth even if we can offer no explanation. Are we not then justified in describing in this way the happenings in the Gospels which demonstrate Our Lord's power over physical as well as spiritual death? We read of the daughter of Jairus, and mark that the Lord said that she slept. Are we to say that the cry of her family that she was now dead was mistaken? Ought we not to read Our Lord's Words in the light of His great comprehensive claim about the Father—"He is not the God of the dead but of the living, for all live unto Him"? The girl in the human sense of the words had died, and the One Who is "the Resurrection and the Life" restored her.

* * *

The son of the Widow of Nain is another instance. In this account the body was on the way to burial, and Our Lord had pity on the mourners and gave the young man life. It seems to have been a spontaneous act, and "a sign, a wonder and a mighty work." If Our Lord Who did this, experienced a death voluntarily endured, we are entitled to say that He died in full awareness that on the third day He would rise again.

* * *

Chief among the foreshadowings is the raising of Lazarus. In his case the body had reached the tomb, and was already there for many hours before Our Lord reached Bethany. He knew of the illness of Lazarus, yet made no haste to go to his assistance—indeed the narrative implies that He loitered, and some such thought may have been in the mind of Martha when she said to Him that if He had been in Bethany sooner Lazarus would be alive and well.

Yet the episode has profound meaning as heralding the vital revelation about death and the life beyond. Lazarus had to die and be laid in his tomb (though we need not assume that the normal natural decomposition referred to by Martha had begun). All things were under Our Lord's control, and ocular demonstration that He is Lord of life was needed so that His followers might not sink into despair when death befel Him.

* * *

We read these passages, and also the story of Our Lord and the disciples at Emmaus on the first Easter evening, and we mark the insistence that what happened had to happen. Christ must suffer, and enter into His glory. He must be "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1.).

* * *

On these grounds, and not on the intrinsic excellence of His teaching, however great nor on the unique qualities of His human personality however remarkable, we base His right to be heard.

Men have a duty to obey Our Lord and to follow His words. He is our Redeemer, so we belong to Him—"Ye are not your own: ye were bought with a price." The price?

"Redeemed, not with corruptible things, but with Precious Blood."

The Easter season is not then a date in the calendar, or a liturgical observance, or a survival of ancient spring-time festivity. Easter is the reminder of the duty of all men to follow Christ because "He is alive for evermore, and has the keys of Hell and of Death."

THE MEANING OF PROTESTANTISM

A small book (159 pages, price 2/6) is to hand with the above title. The author is James Nichols, described as a Presbyterian Minister, and professor of the history of Christianity in the University of Chicago.

Several commendations are quoted in this edition (1959. Original edition, 1947)—a Methodist publication says "well-written and very readable," and "Brethren Life and Thought" says "a widely acclaimed book by this fine church historian." We observe, that from the contents of the book we cannot suppose that this commendation comes from a publication of the people we know as "Brethren." We think it must belong to some other denomination.

* * *

Part I is a series of chapters on the history of Christianity, and part 2 discusses "Protestant principles." Such a book in a popular series, attractively produced and written, is bound to be widely read, and may do good. Some aspects of it are well handled, but we shall show that other aspects are likely to do harm (a) by reducing the Biblical content of historic Protestantism, and (b) by giving Roman Catholic readers the impression that Protestants need no longer hold to the basic truths set out in the ancient Creeds and restated in the Articles of Religion and in the Augsburg and Westminster Confessions. It is a little surprising, for instance to read that some Unitarians "are evangelical in the tradition of Martineau." James Martineau (who was once a Presbyterian Minister in Dublin) was a great philosopher and a good man, but it seems an abuse of the word evangelical to apply it to him in any easily recognisable sense. We doubt if he would have claimed the word for himself.

* * *

We note some general matters which strike us as interesting. We see (p. 13) that 90% of American Church members are within 20 denominations, and over 80% are within 13 of them. The significance of this is that the great majority of the 200 sects in U.S.A. have only a tiny membership compared with the great substantial communions of evangelical Protestantism. Orthodox Protestantism, therefore, holds the loyalty of most Protestants.

Dr Nichols points out (as we have often done) that the divisions of Protestantism are often hastily considered by Roman Catholics to be as separated from each other as they are from us. This is a natural mistake but a serious one. Members of evangelical churches, say Church of Ireland, and Irish Presbyterian, are in all important spiritual respects far more at one than either could be with Roman Catholicism. What separates us is in no sense fundamental: what unites us is far more real and weighty than any of our distinctions.

"Flexibility" and "variety" are two terms used, and the religious temperaments of Protestantism are defined—"mystical, ethical, rationalist, Biblicist, sacramental." It is not possible, perhaps, to harmonise all these, and in one denomination they may cohabit very uneasily, so we think: but there is no denying that to-day they represent the diversities of the Protestant temperament. We think Dr. Nichols has given a useful contrast (p. 15) in the words "Protestantism exhibits a comprehensive and catholic life in contrast to the narrow and doctrinaire character the Council of Trent imposed on modern Romanism," while a curious and evocative force is in the sentence "the minor and suppressed strains of the Reformation have come to be those most characteristic of modern Protestantism." We think this last must refer to the inward and non-dogmatic elements of the 16th century reform—the lines of thought which in later days led to Quakerism and to liberal theologies as well.

* * *

We note that Dr. Nichols is able to recognise "a common ground for evangelicals and Orthodox which does not exist between evangelicals and Romanists." This may not find immediate acceptance, but it is really true, for behind the extraordinary pageantry of Orthodox worship religious ideas and truths are held in a sense which is not dogmatic nor legalistic. As is well-known the only creed of Orthodoxy is the Nicene Creed, and beliefs which are held in common with Rome are held in a non-Roman fashion.

"Orthodoxy did not degrade, materialise, and commercialise the sacraments as did the Roman church in the middle ages."

"Evangelicals and Orthodox Catholics can carry on a discussion. There is no discussion with Rome, only submission or rejection"—This is well said, and true.

* * *

Dr. Nichols gives space to some useful remarks on the effect of the Reformation on Roman Catholicism—"Roman Catholics admit that their communion is at its best in Protestant countries, Germany, England, Holland, the United States, or where, as in France, the majority of the nation have declared their emancipation. For the sake of vigorous and spiritual Romanism, the Protestant church remains to-day as necessary as at the Reformation."

* * *

A valuable section over which we must resist temptation to delay is the account of the major churches which are reformed—Lutheran, Anglican, Presbyterian. The Roman Catholic Church as it emerged from the Age of the Reformation is also carefully described. Then in the account of the post-Reformation history of Protestantism we have useful information, especially about the modern expansion of evangelical Christianity. Readers of Dr. K. Latourette's books, either large or small, will be familiar with this—"the Protestant movement was one of the greatest geographical expansions of Christian history." Evidence of this is the existence everywhere of "the younger Churches." In Africa, India, Brazil, Indonesia etc., they are flourishing.

In the realm of Christian thought Dr. Nichols points out new developments. We like the following—"two generations ago our believing forefathers were utterly scandalised at the worldly ideas which came out of Lutheran German institutions and professors. To-day the shoe is on the other foot, and the Continentals are hard put to it to discover anything specifically Christian in the humanitarian idealism of liberal American Protestants."

* * *

The second part of Dr. Nichols's book is a survey of present-day Protestant teaching. The treatment is objective enough in general and contains much with which all orthodox Protestants (i.e. evangelicals) will agree. We quote the following as an example of a point in which all will agree—"The Reformation rests simply on the figure of Christ as accessible to all men in the Gospel, a Christ who needs no recommendations, no credentials, who can be trusted by the power of the Spirit to evoke recognition and the love of free men

... this is the direct access of the believers to God without patented ecclesiastical intermediaries, but it is no subjective mysticism. This is a faith in the sufficient force of revelation in history, Jesus Christ, unique, indispensable, self-authenticating."

* * *

But, unless Jesus Christ is the projection of man's highest ideals and the creation of his sublimest dreams, we need a factual background, a place and foundation in history. This is given to us in Holy Scripture, and Holy Scripture, is given to us by God its Author. Dissolve the fact of Revelation in a written word, and you have nothing left but a tradition, and, for some, a living voice. The evangelical Protestant may not drop the Written Word and rely on tradition and the living voice, because he knows that the Written Word is the check on expanding tradition and the popular sentiment of which the living voice is often the expression.

We say this because Dr. Nichols thought fit to write "of Jesus' life history, of what he did, and where and in what sequence, we know considerably less than we once thought we did when we believed it possible to extract a chronology and an itinerary from the Gospels." Put thus, the impression may be given that failure to create a travel-diary for Our Lord has reduced our knowledge of Him. But the failure to organise the narrative of the Gospels in chronological order does not make the Gospels less true: whatever they tell us must be part of the genuine information about Our Lord.

We regret that the writer should suggest that in many ways the contents of our Lord's mind were shaped by the ideas of His time about culture and religion. It seems to us far wiser to hold that Our Lord restated the religious ideas of Israel—how much of His thought and teaching can be assigned to any other source?

There is a further sentence in Dr. Nichols's discussion of Our Lord which we must condemn as having no real ground in genuine New Testament scholarship—"We have sufficient records of the teaching and human relations of Jesus, even though no specific saying can be certainly claimed as precisely his." If not His, then whose? The Gospels have the Words of Our Lord: if this is doubtful, we are in the realm of romance and religious fiction. We think it right to say that the Gospels wish us and intend us to believe that Our Lord did say what they attribute to Him.

Dr. Nichols's suggestion that "no specific saying of Our Lord can be certainly claimed as His" is one of those gratuitous observations which rest on no firm and demonstrated foundation of learning. It is the kind of thing professional scholars feel they must say, otherwise their more radical colleagues will think they are dropping behind in the academic race!

How can Dr. Nichols say "we have sufficient records of the teaching of Jesus to establish a highly distinctive and unforgettable personality" if he is truthfully reflecting the position reached by New Testament scholarship that "no specific saying of Our Lord can be certainly claimed as His"? The two statements do not harmonise, and it is not enough to say that New Testament writings reflect His influence. The New Testament positively asserts that we have the very Words of Christ. If not, all is dissipated into the clouds of idealising and romanticising portraiture.

How can the authenticity of the Gospel sayings be undermined? Only by a merely subjective approach, for as far as we know there is no demand for this on grounds of pure scholarship.

Dr. Nichols will agree that "the large part of the religious and ethical teachings of the first three Gospels is surely His in substance"—we ask "Does this fairly display the conviction of Protestants, or does it just tell us what Dr. Nichols thinks? "His in substance"—why can't he admit that the parables, for example have the clear note of decisive personality and direct speech?

* * *

"Perhaps Jesus himself did not fully realise that he was the Messiah"—our only information on this question comes from the Gospels, and we believe that they show that Jesus said He was the Christ. "The full implication and the precise outcome of his role were possibly not known to Him"—are we to follow Dr. Nichols and as a consequence discard all that the Gospels tell us about "the Son of Man" and how "He must suffer many things" etc.? Is the Gospel imputation of conscious Messiahship to Jesus false? Isn't it all a question of evidence and of interpretation of given material? Let us remember that every kind of crazy conjecture or figment of human ingenuity has been put forward solemnly in the name of New Testament scholarship during the last hundred years—What permanence have they had? Look at the back numbers of any theological journal in the past fifty years, and you will find much to amuse and much to cause reflection on the standards of evidence among scholars.

* * *

Is the "meaning of Protestantism" fairly demonstrated if we are told that "of the manner of appearance of the risen Christ we have only one first-hand account, that of Paul"? Does not John say in the first verses of his first epistle that he and others had close contact with Our Lord, and are we to deny that his words can apply to post-Resurrection days? Does not John in the Gospel tell us about Our Lord during the forty days? Does St. Paul in fact say that he saw, as we would understand the word saw? Is it right to settle the question by referring to "psychological mechanisms"? Surely a professor of history ought to do better than employ a meaningless phrase like that!

Worse follows when we read "The materialistic elaborations of the resurrection story—doubting Thomas fingering the wounds, and the various occasions on which the risen Christ consumed food—are surely to be attributed to this natural and charming habit of the folk-mind." By what standard does Dr. Nichols judge the post-Resurrection narratives to be untrue? Does he think that it is not possible for an event to be true if it is unique? Is this a fair statement of the meaning of Protestantism? Let it be plainly said that a Protestant is not necessarily a man who denies the Creeds of Christendom.

* * *

What of the birth of Our Lord? Dr. Nichols feels justified in using the phrase "a current idiom of pagan mythology." This was used to emphasise the qualities in Our Lord which distinguish Him from those who are merely good men. The Virgin Birth is thus drawn from pagan mythology, and not from the prophet Isaiah.

The curious thing is that Dr. Nichols can at times expound Protestantism with much acceptance of its Biblical bases in the truth of justification by faith. Many things are extremely well-said, though they do not undo the misleading nature of other statements such as we have pointed out.

The book would be much more valuable if the writer had kept to the objective treatment of his subject and not intruded his personal interpretations. Genuine Protestantism does acknowledge that spiritual experience is one of the many factors which support the veracity of the New Testament. We are not likely to win the world by our scepticisms, and as Dr. Nichols writes so much that is sound, and expresses it with so much effectiveness, we are bound to regret deeply the defects we have indicated.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department, and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

JUSTIFICATION.

We often find that nowadays many Protestants have but hazy ideas of Justification, and that those who ought to teach them the truths of Holy Scripture are reluctant to do so. Why this should be may seem puzzling, but one explanation, at least, is that the notion obtains that if you emphasise Justification by Faith you are shutting out all dependence on Sacraments, Orders, Good Works, etc. We say with all modesty that this notion is based on ignorance of the real meaning of Justification. We know that many eminent persons have professed to find difficulties in Justification by Faith only. We believe that these difficulties are self-created. The doctrine itself presents no insuperable obstacles, though it may be an impediment in the way to too hasty discussions of Reunion with Rome. But the convenience or inconvenience of the doctrine cannot be taken into serious account, for the search for truth is not a search for expedients. We must take a firm stand on basic Christianity, and we must affirm that Christianity is not what the Apostolic faith has developed into, but what the Apostolic faith is. If this is kept clear in the mind we are protected from the delusive assumption that Justification by Faith was unheard of from the age of the Apostles till the age of the Reformation. We have heard this asserted; but if the Reformation was a time of recovery of original Christianity we are on solid ground in saying that Justification by Faith is part of original Christianity.

* * *

We are, consequently, entitled to judge the Christianity of the period between the Apostolic Age and the Age of the Reformation by its recognition or non-recognition of Justification by Faith. It seems to us quite irrational and unhistorical to judge Justification by Faith by the standards of patristic or mediaeval teaching: that may fit into Roman Catholic interpretations of Christian doctrine, but it is in plain contradiction of the principles upon which the Reformed Churches are based.

The Churches of the Anglican Communion, like the Churches of the Lutheran Communion, adhere to original Christianity in this belief, so it is misleading to suggest that there is not Anglican witness to this truth.

We go a little farther, and say that if the Anglican reformers had not been satisfied that Justification by Faith is basic in Christianity, they would not have affirmed it, no matter what Luther said or did. When they agree with Luther or Calvin it is because Luther and Calvin agree with Apostolic Christianity.

* * *

We are aware that certain modern Anglican writers have tried to eliminate Justification by Faith from the range of Anglican teaching. This can only be done by ignoring the "Articles of Religion," or by denying that they have any place in relation to the definition of Anglican teaching. Such a denial is, to all reasonable men, mere perversity. Whether we like them or not, candour requires us to acknowledge that what every clergyman must affirm at ordination, and at subsequent institutions, is an inescapable declaration of the Faith of the Communion he voluntarily adheres to.

* * *

We have then the fact of Justification by Faith as apostolic doctrine. We have the further fact of its re-emphasis at the Reformation. Is there any reason why we should apologise for it, or try to explain it away, unless that it has become a Protestant "magna carta" of spiritual liberty? What is wrong with spiritual liberty in any case? Is it not a good New Testament principle—i.e. the liberty wherewith Christ has set us free (Gal. 5, 1.)? It may be admitted that this doctrine hinders the exercise of certain ecclesiastical controls; and we know that the conservatism of the ecclesiastical mind tends to make it difficult to trust the larger liberties of the Gospel. We must however make our practice fit the truths and realities of our faith, otherwise we subordinate our faith to the rules made by men, and when we do that we in fact "do despite to the Spirit of Grace."

* * *

In the New Testament we find the supreme expression of Justification by Faith in the epistle to the Romans. In older days we said "in the New Testament"; now it is more usual to say "in Paul," or "in John," or "in Matthew" etc. In this modern usage we have obviously lost the coherence of the New Testament as a "Testament," or as a "Canon" recognised by ancient Christianity. This breaking up of the New Testament into its parts enables certain writers to discuss a doctrine in St. Paul's writings as though it were an aberration rather than a central truth of our faith. It ought to be understood that in whatever words it is expressed, the doctrine of Justification by Faith is a foundation doctrine of New Testament Christianity.

* * *

How can it be otherwise?

"It is God that justifieth" (Rom. 8. 33): and if that is the truth, how can man set out to revise that statement? The Greek verb apparently means "to do, or achieve something": in this case, "to make righteous"; to reckon man from a new angle (in recognition and acceptance of Christ's sacrifice of Himself on man's behalf).

"The free gift came of many trespasses unto righteousness" (Rom. 5. 16). Here the free gift rules out all consideration of man's personal achievements in meritorious work.

We are "justified freely by His grace" (Rom. 3. 24). If words mean anything we either humbly and thankfully agree with this, or else say it is a falsehood. Should any Christian object to this realistic way of putting it?

It is easy to hum and haw, and to demur, and hesitate, and beset the whole matter by self-induced difficulties instead of thankfully and spontaneously accepting the generosity of God. Does God say to us "your sins may sometime, somehow, and somewhere, be forgiven"? No, He says to us "your sins are forgiven," and if He did not say that, then He and not we, would be making the Cross of Christ of no effect.

Is this presumptuous? No, for it is simple acceptance of what God our Father declares. Presumption and pride are found in assertions of human merit: humility and surrender are found in grateful acknowledgment of the endless efficacy of the Cross.

* * *

"Be it known unto you, brethren, that through this Man is proclaimed unto you remission of sins; and by Him everyone that believeth is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law"—these are the words of St. Paul at Antioch in Pisidia—they are equally true in Rome or Dublin or London or Peking. Forgiveness is universal—"everyone that believeth," being led thereto by the prevenient grace of God is forgiven.

* * *

Justification is shown to the world by active Christian faith, living, and testimony. Justification does not deny that the good tree is shown by its fruits—see Jas. 2. 21, and 22 and 24.

* * *

Justification by Faith saves; and justifies from all things; and gives peace with God (i.e. reconciliation through recognition of the Cross); and washes; and sanctifies; and by it we are glorified.

Charles Simeon the eminent Cambridge Christian teacher says on this point, if the justification of the sinner is not by faith, then let him point out what merits of his own are necessary to eke out the shortcomings of His Saviour. This is the plain way to put it, and why not put it plainly?

Karl von Hase the Lutheran historian quotes a popular saying of the German peasants of his day, that everyman has to turn Lutheran on his deathbed, i.e., everyman must cast all upon the Saviour and not rely on self. Is this not the truth? Why should not Irishmen and Englishmen and Scottishmen and all sorts of men the world over say it as well as Lutherans? It is as much the bedrock principle of Christianity as the Empty Tomb.

A RIDDLE FROM THE DEAD SEA

"The Riddle of the Scrolls," H. E. Del Medico, translated by H. Garner, published by Burke, London, 1958 (tr. from original edition in French, Paris, 1957).

This is still another book on the Dead Sea Scrolls, but it is different from many which have had wide currency. Confidence in the capabilities of the author is warranted by the information given to us that the author had the benefit of advice from Professor H. H. Rowley, who also read the proofs. No one in these islands is better fitted, we believe, to give guidance in the many problems surrounding the Scrolls than Professor Rowley.

It seems necessary to say at the outset that the earlier publications on the Dead Sea Scrolls are reduced in value and importance by the fact that they were based on a very limited range of information; and since the first discoveries many more manuscripts have been found in other caves, and many further caves may still remain to be explored.

Another defect is that the first manuscripts to come to light were eagerly seized upon to give evidence of Christian origins or to confirm existing texts of Holy Scripture. While the Biblical manuscripts found in the Qumran caves are of very great value (though the problem of dating them remains), the non-Biblical manuscripts are of such varied character that a very long period of study and assessment must be needed before a reliable account of them can be given to the public. Some early publications come from writers who were by no means equal to the task they undertook. It was possibly easy enough to write a vivid account of the dealings with the first manuscripts found in the first caves. We know of the Bedouin nomads selling the finds to a dealer who then sold some to a bishop of one of the Eastern Churches who sold a manuscript in New York.

We know how an archaeologist of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and his son, a general in the Israeli army and also an eminent scholar, secured some of the Scrolls for preservation in Israel. All this is the most interesting history of a few of the Scrolls: we are less well-informed about the discovery and adventures of many other scrolls from the shores of the Dead Sea.

* * *

A "paper-back" published in America on the subject of the Scrolls by a Dr. Powell Davies was a hasty production which seemed to impute to orthodox Christian scholars a desire to conceal the significance of the discoveries from the public. This author assumed that serious scholars in this new and unanticipated field of study ought to have outdistanced him in jumping to conclusions in the least possible time! He thought he had spotted the meaning of the Scrolls, but the meaning he extracted from them was the meaning he wanted, i.e. an attack on Christian origins as set out in the New Testament.

* * *

Another American "paper-back" (or anyway a "paper-back" by an American) made less display of Hebrew learning, and made a literary approach. The author wrote of "the explosive possibilities" of the subject, and said that he had seemed to note "on the Christian side, a certain reluctance to recognise that the characteristic doctrine of Christianity must have been developed gradually and naturally, in the course of a couple of hundred years, out of a dissident branch of Judaism." His guide was a scholar "not committed to any religion," so we have here an instance of the queer notion that only unbelievers can be relied on! We may note that in this quotation it appears to be the basic assumption on which the whole thing rests, that "the dissident branch of Judaism" must have been up to two hundred years before the Gospel. But if it is shown that the date of this Jewish sect (if it did exist) is either contemporary with Our Lord or even later than the founding of Christianity, then the thing demonstrated is not the scholarship of the unbeliever but his credulity! The fact is that the man who wants to explode Christianity cannot have the true integrity and impartiality of the patient scholar.

To look at Jesus "in the perspective supplied by the Scrolls" is supposed to solve the problem (or "the riddle") of the New Testament. Tribute is paid to the work of Christian scholars, but "one feels a certain nervousness, a reluctance to take hold of the subject and to place it in historical perspective"—here the suggestion seems to be that Christians are afraid of the conclusions: what conclusions? Whose conclusions? Has anyone the right to say that Christian scholars are afraid of truth? Has the truth of these profound matters been reached? Has the necessary exhaustive research been completed? It is scarcely more than ten or twelve years since the first scrolls were available for study.

* * *

As we have said, the criticism directed against Christian scholars is that they have not jumped to conclusions which non-Christian persons would like them to jump to. Men who are long habituated to genuine research on sound lines must be patient. There is no room for impetuosity in such fields.

We turn now to H. E. Del Medico's book. It consists of introductory matter occupying nearly half the volume, and then gives an account of the non-biblical texts from Cave I at Qumran. As there are 426 pages it can be seen that the information is fairly ample.

* * *

The usual idea has been that the cave at Qumran was the library of a Jewish sect, hidden away in the desolate cliffs around the Dead Sea. Del Medico holds that the manuscripts cannot be earlier than the first century, A.D. (i.e. contemporary with the writing of the New Testament), and that the cave was not a library, but a "Geniza," that is, a depository for unusable sacred writings; copies of Scripture which were "impure" for various reasons among which is the number of scribal or copyists' errors above a fixed minimum.

Many writers of popular books on the Scrolls (as well as more serious works) attributed the so-called "library" to an Essene Community at Qumran. Del Medico refers to this as "a hypothetic monastic environment." He says "nothing published up to the present time (1957) has allowed me to modify my first impression." He believes that "many new details have confirmed my opinion that the Scrolls do not form a homogeneous whole, a library, but a heap of various writings and fragments which rabbinic authority consigned to Genizoth (plural of Geniza) because it was necessary for some reason to withdraw them from circulation."

* * *

He says that the Biblical MSS. are not as old as was hoped, and he questions the claim of the American Semitic scholar, Dr. Albright that "the scrolls are the greatest manuscript find of modern times." Also, and this is very important to remember when we read popular books and articles, he adds that "the study of the Scrolls will be the work of decades to come."

* * *

To-day a much larger number of MSS. is available than ten years ago when the excited rush into print began. There is a text of Jeremiah which he thinks is probably of the late second century B.C. It is closer to the Septuagint Greek translation of the Old Testament than to the classic Hebrew text. This may serve to indicate one of the problems of the Old Testament—what Hebrew text underlies the Greek translations?

Further, instead of the contents of one cave being all we have, up to date we have manuscripts from no less than eleven! No wonder Del Medico speaks of the decades needed for study.

* * *

One discovery of unusual character is a copper roll which was found in 1952. Three sheets of copper are rivetted to form a strip eight feet long. It was at first thought to set out the rules and admonitions of the Essene Sect (the writer thinks them "hypothetical" as we have seen). But when opened out in 1956 it was revealed that it was a list of hiding places of the Temple treasure and an inventory (the estimated value of the treasure is stated as £30,000,000). Soon this was called "a romance of the imagination." As the Romans plundered the Temple its treasures did not escape, and in any case the intrinsic as distinct from the sacred value of the objects was not great—certainly no more than a fraction of £30,000,000.

What then was the point of this exaggerated inventory? Del Medico says it was not an Essene roll, but one belonging to a lodge of Zadokites, that is a lodge claiming to be the representatives of the true priesthood of the Temple (followers of Zadok—1 Chron. 29, 22; 2 Chron. 31, 10) who held that the Temple treasure was theirs as they alone had the right to be priests (Ezekiel 48, 11). The copper roll was a fictitious inventory of their riches which was used in Zadokite ceremonies of the second century A.D.

We are, needless to say, unable to discuss the probability of this, but we think that it is just as plausible a conjecture as any we have seen. The interpreters of the Scrolls may say, if they will, that there were Essenes, or Ebionites, or Zadokites involved; but their different comments and theories only serve to show the folly of hasty conclusions and dogmatism. They also show the biased dispositions of the men who have used their impressionistic and secondhand information to cast a slur upon Christian scholars.

Del Medico deserves to be seriously studied, and the dates assigned for one reason or another to the scrolls (really guesswork) are brought in question by this prudent comment "In 1948, when only one cave with manuscripts was known in the Judaean desert, it was allowable to be mistaken by a few centuries. To-day it ought to be possible to renounce intenable theories and to look at the problem in a different light."

Whatever else we learn from him we may be sure of the truth of this lesson, that the real place in time and literary history to which to assign the Scrolls will not be settled for each manuscript for many years to come. We may also learn that to cash in on a new discovery with publications of a subjective character may be good propaganda, but it is not scholarship. Lastly, though chiefly, we ought to learn that God's Revelation in the Incarnate and in the Written Word is not easily explained away, even with the help of unbelievers.

REPUBLIC OF HAITI CENTRAL AMERICA (CARIBBEAN)

Just how the Roman Catholic Church can influence decisions of governments headed by adherents of the church, was demonstrated in the quick suspension of an order, August 21, by the Government of Haiti, U.S. dependency, for the arrest of Most Rev. Francois Poirier, Roman Catholic archbishop of Port au Prince, the Capital. The arrest order had been issued the previous day after the Archbishop, a French citizen, had criticised the expulsion of two French priests by the Government, "for reasons of internal security".

The cancelling of the order came, mark you, after the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano printed a warning that Haitian officials could incur automatic excommunication from the Roman Catholic Church if the archbishop was arrested. The justice department said the order was withdrawn on instruction "from higher authorities", and it was assumed the suspension of the arrest order came from President Duvalier, who is a Roman Catholic, and gave the order in the first place.

We are not concerned with whether the two priests involved were guilty of the charges laid against them, but with the fact that, though the President seemed satisfied that their activities were not in the national interest and merited their expulsion, he immediately succumbed to the threat of excommunication in a Vatican paper published 3,000 miles away and suspended the arrest order. This, as we see it, raises the vital question that is imminent today, particularly in the United States, as to the possibility of Roman Catholics in high office being influenced by their church in making certain decisions.

As a matter of fact it is this weapon of the loss of sacraments or excommunication that enables in the ultimate the Roman Church to whip rebellious adherents back into line and to ensure that politicians of the faith be careful not to encroach upon any special privileges the Church has secured in the community or the nation. And while this power obtains—and the prompt reversal of the Haitian President's order shows it does—it is sheer foolishness to say that Roman Catholics in offices of prominence cannot be influenced by the views and dictates of their church.

Perhaps it might be timely to recall the comment of Sean O'Faolain, a Roman Catholic, biographer of Newman, and the Eireann republic's outstanding writer, on this particular point as applied to his own country:

"There are two parliaments in Eire, the Dail, duly elected by the people, and Maynooth, the hierarchy which rules the nation. The latter holds the weapon which no other institution has—the sacraments. If the Prime Minister disobeys them he knows that he may draw on himself this weapon whose touch means death."

—("The Sentinel", Toronto, 1959).

Papal Threat to Haitian Government

The threat of excommunication forced the government of Haiti to withdraw an order for the arrest of the R.C. archbishop of Port-au-Prince, a French citizen. This prelate was accused by the government of having criticised the state for expelling two priests who were said to have had a hand in a bombing plot.

The civil government of R.C. Haiti hastened to eat humble pie with what relish it could and tamely rescinded its order to arrest the archbishop. It has instructed its ambassador at the Vatican to request the pope to remove the archbishop. Under such circumstances as these, the signal convenience of having an ambassador at the Vatican will readily be seen. Here is another argument already to hand for the American and Canadian protagonists of such an appointment on the part of their respective governments!!!

When the R.C. leaders of the Haitian government gave the order for the prelate's arrest they no doubt did so in ignorance of the laws of their own Roman Catholic Church. For their information and that of other uninformed members of their church we quote the following extracts from Canon Law, which is the supreme law in Haiti as it is in every other Roman Catholic country and as it would be in Canada and the United States if the papacy were strong enough to enforce it.

CANON 120—S.I. All lawsuits against clerics, both civil and criminal, must be brought into the ecclesiastical court, unless other provisions have been legitimately made for some countries.

CANON 2341.—If anyone, in violation of Canon 120, dare to summon before a lay tribunal a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, or a Legate of the Holy See, or any other major official of the Roman Curia in connection with business pertaining to his office, or his own Ordinary, he incurs automatically an excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See . . .

Vatican circles commented that this would be the first time that a Roman Catholic prelate had been arrested in a non-communist country since the second world war. They added, that Juan Peron, the dictator who fled from Argentina, had expelled the auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires; but had not ordered his arrest. Peron was excommunicated.

The quarrel between the government of Haiti and the Roman Church comes at a time of severe economic distress and of extreme tension heightened by fear of invasion from Cuba.

Feeling against the Church of Rome runs high in the republic of Haiti because of the predominance of French priests in a country that won independence from France more than a century ago.

—(“Protestant Action”, Toronto, Sept., 1959).

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 37.

Orthodox church leaders “now recognise the urgency of better mutual understanding.” This was stated to-day by Dr. Roswell Barnes, executive secretary in New York of the World Council of Churches.

In a summary of the year's events he said public discussion of Christian unity “has been confused,” but added that, even so, notable progress had been made in understanding, and the confusion itself had made it clear that more orderly communication was essential.

If the forthcoming Ecumenical Council of the Roman Catholic Church announced by Pope John clarified the attitude of that Church towards Protestants and the Eastern Orthodox Church it would contribute significantly to understanding. Dr. Barnes went on:

“Present variations of policy and practice impair confidence. . . . We cannot reconcile the brotherly attitude of Roman Catholics in France and Germany, for example, with the repression—in some instances persecution—of Protestants in Colombia and Spain.”

In March, he said, the World Council planned to break ground for the construction of a new building in Geneva. It would contain 200 offices, a large exhibition hall, and a chapel. The council is now housed in four reconverted chalets and some wooden barracks.—Reuter.

—(“The Guardian”, 28th Dec. '59).

[We shall never discourage “better mutual understanding” between Reformed churches and Rome, but we are bound to declare that the Reformed churches by their very title must maintain a testimony to truth. “Better understanding” may and ought to, do away with misunderstanding and intolerance and hostility, but it will not make true what we have for four centuries declared to be false. Our Rule of Faith is Holy Scripture: can we abandon it?]

* * *

Alien Hand and Unity of Church

One of the problems of the Protestant churches is their tendency to splinter for various reasons, which leads to a terrific waste of financial resources, man-power and brain-power, Rev. W. Martin Smyth, Raffrey Presbyterian Church, said in Belfast.

Mr. Smyth, who said he felt the movement for Church unity “has fallen into alien hands,” was speaking at a Protestant rally held in the Wellington Hall, Belfast.

“It is hardly fair,” he went on, “to appeal to us in Ireland to come together to face the menace of Rome and then to have conversations with Rome towards re-union.

“We must take Protestantism and the Reformation seriously. If we are to stop saying “Why does the Church not do something?” and realise that we are the Church and must do something ourselves, victory would be at hand.

“We must know what we believe, and why we believe it. Further, we must learn to express our faith in life.”

Taking as his subject “Protestantism — Whither?” Mr. Smyth said that 40 years ago after the division of the country it was estimated that 75 per cent. of the population of Ireland was Roman Catholic.

More than 300,000 lived in Northern Ireland—“a minority which has an influence out of proportion to its size.”

Intolerance?

It would seem at times, he said, as if the Government bends over backwards in an effort to avoid the insidious charge of intolerance towards the Roman Catholics.

Speaking at the same rally, Rev. A. J. Finch, Knocknamuckley, Portadown, made an appeal to Protestants to join the Evangelical Protestant Society.

"We stand for the truth as it is contained in the Scriptures," he said.

Mr. Norman Porter, director of the Society, spoke on "Jesuitism and Catholic Action."

Mr. Porter said that Pope Pius XII had declared Catholic Action always bore the mark of an official of the laity and that one of the mortal dangers which threatened the Roman Catholic Church was the invasion of the Protestant sect.

Rome was at the back, scheming and striving to overthrow Protestantism in this country, throughout Europe, and as far afield as the foreign missions," Mr. Porter said.

In Northern Ireland, Catholic Action could be seen hard at work in the Civil Service, industrial concerns and public institutions. They tried to win over weak, spineless and ill-informed non-Roman Catholics.

If Protestants tried to do anything like this they were branded as bigots, charged with discrimination and with being guilty of sectarianism.

Exiles in Erin?

Q. "When is an Irishman not an Irishman?" A. "When he's a Protestant." This is the pernicious doctrine which, according to Mr. H. R. Cathcart, head-master of Raphoe Royal School, Co. Donegal, underlies the social and political thinking of more than a few people in our country to-day. It is not an entirely new doctrine: Daniel Corkery gave expression to it in the literary sphere during the 1930s, and was soundly rebuked for his pains by the late P. S. O'Hegarty. During the interval it seems to have persisted and even to have gained ground. Its justification has entailed a revision, to a great extent, of Irish history; the Irish Parliament, the Volunteers of 1782, the United Irishman of a decade later, the Young Irelanders of 1845-8, the Parnellite movement, all have to be written off because their leaders were Protestant. That does not matter: history can take care of itself. The new approach, however, is liable to have serious consequences when it applies to the issues of everyday life. How far, one must ask, if at all, is Mr. Cathcart exaggerating when he says?

Irish children are brought up as members of their denominations first and as Irishmen secondly. They are more conscious of what divides them from their fellow-countrymen than of what they have in common—a common nationality.

* * *

"We are a fusion of peoples," says Mr. Cathcart, "with varying traditions and cultures. . . It is utterly false to propound any conception of a pure Irish race and culture." Happily, the situation is not just so bad as the headmaster thinks. The tendency towards the doctrine of religious racialism seems to be confined, on the one hand, to certain scholars, and, on the other, to the least educated and thoughtful section of the populace. For the sake of a struggling nation which stands in sore need of the contribution that all its elements — Protestant as well as Catholic — can make, we hope that it will never spread. Too many countries have borne witness to the ills that follow upon segregation, whether along religious, political, or social lines.—(From a leader in "The Irish Times" of 13-1-'60).

[We have already referred to this matter. As the Protestant people of Ireland are likely to remain, and as the present political arrangements will continue, we think that Mr. Cathcart and "The Irish Times" are correct in saying that Ireland needs the Protestant contribution, and needs it for moral and intellectual as well as for business reasons. Patriotism is more than shouting slogans].

—("Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 27th Feb. '60).

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3, 16).

THE widespread distribution of the Word of God is the main work of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which makes free grants of Scriptures, especially considering the needs of those who are unable to buy Scriptures, and to such liberal supplies are sent out free of cost. Many a needy missionary and other worker has had cause to praise God that by this means he has been enabled to fulfil our Lord's command to make disciples of all nations and to preach the Gospel, by giving the Word which is able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Founded 1831

(For the Circulation of Protestant and Uncorrupted Versions of the Word of God)

7 Bury Place, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.1.

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

reland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 5—LXIX.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	49
Beware of the Mormons	50
The Case for Protestantism	51
Editor's Chair	54
The Lord's Supper	56
Persecution in Spain	58

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Bishop Appeals For Help To Trace Murderer "Reign of Terror" Condemned

The murder of Maurice Moore over a year ago at Reamore, near Tralee, and agrarian troubles at Ballyseedy, near Tralee, were condemned by the Bishop of Kerry, the Most Rev. Dr. Denis Moynihan, when he addressed the congregation at the close of a men's retreat in Tralee last night.

"I should like very sincerely," said Dr. Moynihan, "to sympathise with the God-fearing people of Tralee on the unenviable notoriety that has been thrust on the town by the misdeeds of some people who live in the vicinity."

Dr. Moynihan went on: "Over a year ago there was the murder of Maurice Moore in Reamore, a townland not very far away from Tralee. Maurice Moore was a God-fearing harmless man, who, on his way from the house of a friendly neighbour, was foully done to death. His body was thrown into a ravine a few yards from his home, and there, strange to say, it remained undiscovered for ten days.

"That murder was denounced the following Sunday by the priests in Ballymacelliot and the people were asked by the priests to give the Civic Guard any information that they possessed which would help in the tracking down of the murderer. Whether they had information to give or not I cannot say, but the murderer of Maurice Moore has been at large. Nobody suspects that the murderer of Maurice Moore came from miles away. Most people, I think, suspect that the murderer of Maurice Moore is a native of that district somewhere out at Reamore; that he is one who knew the habits of Mr. Maurice Moore and, knowing his habits and movements, waylaid him and did him to death.

"Now, if it is not too late, I make a public appeal to any people who can throw any light on the murder of Maurice Moore to tell what they know to the Civic Guard.

In Darkness

"To the south-east of Tralee there are some people who, to judge by their criminal acts, have no respect for Almighty God or for God's laws, and they evade the judgment of the civil law by doing all their criminal deeds under the cover of darkness. It may be that the real culprits around Ballyseedy district are very few. I don't know, but I recall the words of a judge, who, after hearing a malicious claim in Tralee, commented on the sad state of affairs around Ballyseedy. He bewailed the fact that something effective was not being done to put an end to the reign of terror and then added: 'Either every man in that district is taking part in these misdeeds, or there is no man there with a backbone.' Then the judge said: 'I suspect that the latter is the explanation.'

Recent Outrages

"Indeed it might well be," said Dr. Moynihan. "During the past five or six years land has been spiked, shots have been fired into houses, animals have been killed and tormented and attacks made on the lives of people. Threatening letters have been written. There has been incitement to boycotting, and some of their people were forbidden by other Catholic people, under certain threats, to attend Mass.

"Never before, I suppose, in the history of this country, was it known that Catholic people forbade their neighbours by threats to assist at Holy Mass. More recently still, the field of criminal operation was extended to Tralee and a bomb was placed against the home of a respectable citizen while he was absent from home.

"Act of Demon"

"That dastardly act was more the act of a demon than of a normal human being, because the placing of the bomb against the house of a respectable citizen who was absent not merely endangered that house, but the house of two neighbours, and, indeed, of the lives of everybody living in those two houses.

"I am glad to say that dastardly act drew words of strong condemnation from numbers of people; drew words of condemnation from some members of the Urban Council; from another society in Tralee, from the creamery managers and from one political leader speaking in the name of his political organisation. But why did not many more speak out? Why must it be left to the Church and a few people to condemn crime? Is it no concern of anybody else but of the Church and a few people that those people should be coming into our midst and that no other public bodies should speak out?

Church Not Slow

"It is a pity that our people have not better public spirit and give rise to their feelings. The Church has not been slow in its condemnation of these crimes. The two priests in Ballymacelliott have condemned them more than once, and indeed, have condemned them in very strong, and unmistakable language, from this pulpit. I came here last September 12 months and I condemned the outrages. I said, on that occasion, that I hoped it would never be necessary for me to have recourse to certain spiritual penalties, which the Church would allow me to have recourse to, in the circumstances prevailing. On that occasion I did not allow my remarks to be published in the press, because I thought these people who were guilty of these acts might listen to the words of their bishop, when he spoke to them in a fatherly spirit.

Sins Reserved

"Furthermore, I had no anxiety whatever to bring a diocese or county of law-abiding people to public odium in the press because of the misdeeds of a small, but lawless band. My words were not heeded, and a short time afterwards people were forbidden to attend Mass and a bomb was placed against a house in Tralee.

"Now something more must be done. I have decided to reserve, in the parishes of Ballymacelliott and Tralee, certain sins connected with agrarian offences that have been committed. The following sins will be reserved until further notice in the parish of Tralee and the parish of Ballymacelliott—threats, intimidation, incitement to boycotting, spiking of land, injury to property and attacks on persons. Now these sins are reserved for the present in the two parishes and they are reserved without delegation, in other words,

—(Continued on p. 59.)

The Bishop of Ballarat Says:—

BEWARE OF THE MORMONS

Mormons, who call themselves Latter-day Saints, are very active in Australia to-day. Their visits to people in their homes, particularly to lonely women, when their menfolk are at work, are causing annoyance.

The founder of Mormonism was Joseph Smith, who had a weak constitution and suffered from epilepsy. He claimed that at the age of 15 he had a vision in which he received a call to become "a prophet of the Most High God." He claimed also that Jesus Christ came to him, and told him that he had been chosen in Divine circles to establish the real Church of Jesus Christ on earth.

He tells that an angelic messenger informed him that he would find a precious religious volume hidden in a hill. He was informed that this volume was written on plates of gold, and contained the fullest account of the Gospel as delivered by Jesus Christ to the ancient inhabitants of North America to whom our Saviour came after His resurrection.

The Golden Volume

Four years later he claimed that the angel instructed him where to look for the golden volume. He went to the spot, dug up the book, and found that it was inscribed in fine hieroglyphics which the Mormons have since identified as "Reformed Egyptian" script. The English translation was dictated "behind a curtain," because Joseph Smith said he was forbidden to show the golden volume. He said he handed the golden book back to an angel who has it in safe keeping.

Joseph Smith claimed that in May, 1829, a messenger from Heaven ordained him to the priesthood of Aaron, and that a year later he received a command to organise the true church of Jesus Christ. On this, he and Oliver Cowdery ordained one another as Elders of "The Church of Jesus Christ Latter-day Saints."

Weird Teachings

But Mormonism has departed from the norm of Christianity. It teaches that Jesus Christ was the son of Adam-God and Mary. It adopted polygamy. Joseph Smith's successor, Brigham Young, taught and practised polygamy. He had, it is stated, seventeen wives and forty-seven children. He justified the practice on the authority of the Old Testament. It is stated that there would have been no Christ if David had not been a polygamist.

Further, Jesus is said to have married the two Marys, and Martha of Cana.

It is claimed that Mormons have discontinued polygamy. But there are two additional practices they have adopted, and these are "baptism for the dead" and "celestial marriage." Where do these weird ideas come from? They come from the teachings of Joseph Smith, whom Mormons place on a level with our Lord. In fact, they regard Christ merely as the fore-runner of Joseph Smith. What sort of a man was Joseph Smith? A reliable historian, Horton Davies, lecturer at Mansfield College, Oxford, tells us that he was "a bank-note forger and a shifty, illiterate, credulous person."

What Do Scholars Say?

The "Book of Mormon" is a gigantic fraud. This contention is based on the fact that Egyptologists say that there is no such thing as "Reformed Egyptian" script, and that the book which our Saviour is supposed to have hidden in a hill in North America after his resurrection has in its English translation word-for-word citations from the Authorised Version of the Bible, quotations from the seventeenth century Westminster "Confession of Faith," an excerpt from a Methodist book of discipline, and a quotation from Shakespeare. This brands the "Book of Mormon" as a forgery. Why did Joseph Smith not show the golden book to anyone. Can it be that there was no such book?

Neither the character of Joseph Smith nor that of Brigham Young lends credibility to their claims to be prophets, while the claim that all who are not Mormons will be everlastingly damned is a claim that has no warrant in Holy Scripture, and is a gross offence against the spirit of Charity.

Take Heed!

The Bishop of Ballarat was quoted in the last two issues of the "Messenger" as warning against the false teaching of the Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses.

Both are doing much work in Australia. He finally says:

Joseph Smith in "Joseph Smith's Own Story" writes that when he was a youth there was unusual excitement on the subject of religion. He says: "My mind at times was greatly excited, the cry and tumult were so great and incessant . . . How to act I did not know, and unless I could get more wisdom than I then had I would never know, for the teachers of religion of the different sects understood the same passages of Scripture so differently . . ."

The experience of Charles Taze Russell was very similar. What did each of these men do? Each turned to the Bible and interpreted it for himself, and in what they taught each contradicted the other; each of them formed a new sect which said that every other sect, and the Church itself, were hopelessly wrong, and that they were solely and absolutely right. What a ridiculous position! Mormons declaring that they, and they only, are right, and that they, and they alone, were sure of salvation; at the same time, Jehovah's Witnesses teaching something quite different, and declaring that they, and only they, were right, and that they, and only they, were sure of salvation.

What a warning! It shows how dangerous it is for individuals to dare to interpret the purpose and meaning of the Bible, without any knowledge of the times in which the different books of the Bible were written, and the purpose they then served.

Every individual can gain spiritual light and comfort from reading the Bible, but it is to the Church that we must turn if we want to know the meaning and purpose of the Bible, and what its message is. The Church, under the guidance of the Spirit of God, produced the Bible, and the Church tells us in the Apostle's Creed what the Bible's true message is.

—"Church of England Messenger."

THE CASE FOR PROTESTANTISM IS THE ROMAN CHURCH ALWAYS THE SAME?

An address by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D., reprinted from "Evangelical Action", Australia.

One of the arguments most popular with Roman Catholic controversialists is the assertion that the Roman Church has held the true faith of the Gospel ever since it was first proclaimed by the Apostle and afterwards elaborated by the ancient fathers. They twit Protestantism with their differences, which are open and expressed. They say, "Look at the mass of inconsistencies that you find in the Protestant Church, whereas the Roman Catholic Church, which is the true Church, always speaks with one voice very definitely, and every single person who is a member of that Church knows exactly what they must believe."

* * *

Now there is a certain amount of truth in that statement. If the authorities mean that there is imposed upon the people who are members of the Roman Church a duty of absolute obedience to the determination of the reigning Pope at that particular time, then they speak the truth. No Roman Catholic is permitted, under pain of mortal sin, to deny what is officially declared as the doctrine of the Church by the reigning Pontiff. But that is a very different thing from saying that the Roman Catholic Church has always taught the same thing or that there is never differences of opinion among them.

Differences Among the Fathers

The reason why this view gets such credence at the present time is that people have given up making any close study of the ancient teachers of the Church. Roman Catholics talk very learnedly about the Fathers, but if they knew anything at all about them it is only the particular extracts that are contained in some of their popular books. Even the priests, who have a wider knowledge, are still dependent on their text books. I remember many years ago having a discussion with a gentleman who had been prepared for the Roman Catholic priesthood. As I felt that the matter was of very great importance, I rubbed up my knowledge of Thomas Aquinas very carefully. I got down to the "Summa Theologica", and read the particular portion with which I intended to deal. When it came to the discussion my friend looked at me in a kind of mild amazement, and said, "Have you read Aquinas?" And of course I said to him, "Of course I've read Aquinas?" "Well," he said, "all I know about him is what is contained in the text books with which I am supplied." And I am afraid that this is the experience of a great many. Indeed, we are all dependent on text books, because time is so limited that it is impossible for us to devote the attention to the early writings that possibly they deserve, but at least some of us have taken the opportunity of looking up the original statements in the Benedictine or Migne's edition of the Fathers and seeing that they were correct.

* * *

Now when that is done the claim that the Roman Church always speaks with one voice is found to be utterly erroneous. To give one particular instance to which attention was directed many years ago by the celebrated Anglican divine, Archbishop Parker. He said,

"It is avouched by Gabriel Biel that the old doctrines commonly follow the opinion of the master of the sentences (that is Peter the Lombard), that priests forgive or retain sins while they judge and declare that they are forgiven by God or retained. But all this notwithstanding," Suarez, the distinguished Jesuit, is bold to tell us that this opinion of the master is false and now, in this time, erroneous." So here we have, on the testimony of the learned Jesuit divine the fact that the Church of Rome changed her attitude with regard to the question of the authority of the priest forgiving sins. The whole body of doctors commonly supported the master of the sentences and the new Jesuit resolutely denies his claim and says that in this particular he is erroneous.

Differences between Dominicans and Franciscans

If Roman Catholics were aware of these differences, if they studied them carefully, they would perhaps not advance so triumphantly the divisions among Protestant as an argument in favour of the solidity of their own beliefs. There have been any number of varieties of judgments in the Roman Catholic Church. Need I refer to the well known incident of the controversy between the Franciscans and Dominicans concerning the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. It went into very minute detail; some of the Franciscans held that the Blessed Virgin was delivered from original sin by prevention, and some of the Dominicans denied that. But when the controversy broke out the divisions among the different sections of the faithful in that particular age were so great that they resulted in bloodshed, and the Pope had to intervene. Now what did the Pope say? You would imagine that, being commissioned to God, on the Papal theory, with the power to declare what was the undoubted doctrine of the Gospel, that he would say either that the Franciscans were wrong or that the Dominicans were wrong, and that those who held the view that he condemned must forthwith abandon it and accept the alternate opinion. But he did no such thing. He did what any wise statesman would do in the same circumstances. He said, "Both parties hold your tongue; you must not, in any circumstances, raise the question." So saints were left in doubt by an infallible decision of the Pope.

Papal Infallibility Questioned

Indeed, the very question of the measure of authority that attaches to a Papal utterance was itself the subject of controversy for many years, so that, as I reminded my hearers on a previous occasion, the Irish Bishops swore on oath that it is not an article of faith, nor are we required to believe, that the Pope is infallible, and the celebrated poet, Pope, himself said on one occasion, "I am a Catholic, but I am not a Papist." The sentiment was repeated by the Irish leader of the Parliamentary party, Daniel O'Connell; he reiterated the words of Pope and said, "We are Catholic, but we are not Papists." That was not a term of abuse. What Pope, the poet and Daniel O'Connell, the politician, meant was that there were two parties in the Church, one of whom held that the Pope was capable of making a decision which was in itself irreversible, that he had no occasion to refer his determinations to a council of the bishops. The other party maintained very stoutly that the Pope was subject to the teaching body of the Church and, as I pointed out, that particular opinion was, of course, in Keenan's controversial Catechism so that when the decree of 1870 became public, the Roman Catholics were forced to alter the statement in Keenan's Catechism and make him speak orthodoxly; they had to cut out the question, "It is true that the Pope is himself infallible?" and the answer, "This is a Protestant invention." It is a strange thing that the present dogma of the Roman Catholic Church was first anticipated by Protestant controversialists, the reason being, of course, that they saw inevitably to where the theory of an infallible judgment that could not be reversed led, while the Roman Catholic bishops, strong in the assumption that as a body they had authority, were more reluctant to accept the inevitable conclusion, as Bishop Bain puts it, "Only a few Italians believe that the Pope was himself infallible," and he did not think that any Englishman or anybody in the Irish community held that particular opinion.

* * *

Now, Roman Catholics do not know these things, and, what is worse, Protestants do not know them. We are not citing them as grounds for jibing at the Roman Catholics; they are entitled, as we are entitled, to endeavour by every means in their power to determine what is the teaching of Scripture on any particular point, and if we happen to differ from them, then it is our duty to express our differences and support it with such authority as we can master. But when the claim is made that our differences, serious as they are, are such as to exclude us from the Catholic Church, out of which ordinarily there is no salvation, then we have the reason to protest and point out that these very differences prevail in the Roman Catholic Church.

Opposition to Modern Dogmas

We ask, and we have reason to ask, "Why is it that the dogma of the bodily assumption of the Blessed Mary waited until the twentieth century before it was imposed upon the consciences of the people? If people could live and die in the Catholic faith for over nineteen hundred years without maintaining that the Blessed Virgin bodily was received up into heaven, why on earth can they not be allowed to remain in that faith still?" Every new enactment of the Papacy binds the consciences of people inexorably, and nearly every enactment in times past has resulted in a schism in the Roman Church.

* * *

We are very familiar, for example, with the hostility displayed to the Roman dogma of the infallibility of the Pope by such an eminent theologian of the Roman Church as Vondollinger. Vondollinger separated from the Church to which he had contributed a very large amount of learning, and he founded the Old Catholic Church because his conscience would not allow him to accept the new dogma, and it is well known that Lord Acton, the leading historian in England at the time, shared Vondollinger's opinion. The Church of Rome never proceeded to the length of excommunicating Acton, and Acton himself never, so far as evidence goes, accepted the new dogma. Indeed, it is reported that when he was challenged on the question he said, "If the Pope changes his religion, that's no reason why I should change mine."

* * *

Now these facts prove without a shadow of a doubt that one of the great difficulties which confronts us is that owing to our imperfect apprehension of the truth, we will look at things in a slightly different way, and presses upon us the urgency of separating those doctrines which are vital to the Christian faith from those which may be legitimately a matter of difference of opinion. The Roman Catholic Church tries, indeed, as the Rev. Luke Rivington protests, to reduce the dogmas of the Church to a few simple facts that must be accepted by all, but every opinion uttered by the Papacy at any time, however contrary it might be in the judgment of some hearers to the previous historic circumstances, must be unhesitatingly accepted.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the Manager, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

QUESTION AND ANSWER.

The planning of broadcast programmes has revived the ancient method of expounding facts and opinions by means of question and answer. We consider it still to be something of a novelty when it is called "a Brains Trust," or, more modestly, "a quiz." It is in fact very much the old-fashioned custom of catechism, except that in the catechism the answers are printed along with the questions, while in the "Brains Trust" or the "Quiz" the answers are supposed to be impromptu—the theory is that the people who answer are in the dark about the queries until they hear them in the presence of the audience. We cannot claim to know if the answers really are spontaneous; but we feel that the readiness of some answers, and the apt and fluent utterance of the speakers, must imply skill, knowledge, and quickness of speech above the average if the matter is unrehearsed.

* * *

We have referred to the catechism—each communion when it mentions its own educational tract calls it "the catechism," but in fact catechisms are very numerous. There is, for example, the bulky "Roman Catechism" or, as it is sometimes called "the catechism of the Council of Trent." It was compiled as a result of a recommendation of the Council of Trent that there should be in the hands of the parish priests a manual of instructions on which to base the teaching they gave their parishioners. Being a very substantial volume it is very different from the tract known as "the Penny Catechism" which children learn in school. Sheehan's Catechism, a very much more detailed production than the Penny Catechism is modern, but far less detailed than the "Roman Catechism." It is intended, we think, for the higher classes of secondary schools.

The Penny Catechism (probably costing more to-day) has long been thought the basic manual of instruction for Roman Catholics, and it used to be put into the hands of would-be converts as containing the necessary teaching of the Church. We have often heard of the chagrin of John Henry Newman, the Oxford theologian, at being given the Penny Catechism to learn when he offered himself as a candidate to be received into the Roman Catholic faith. The story may be fiction, but the principle behind it is clear enough.

* * *

Another example is the Catechism of the Church of Ireland and the Church of England. We gather that in many parts of the Church of England the catechism is little known or taught, and other manuals of doctrine, thought more up-to-date, take its place. In the Church of Ireland we think it can be said that the Catechism is universally taught in day and Sunday Schools, and used as the basis of Confirmation preparation. We believe that much is gained by having a common foundation of Christian knowledge which can be learnt, and then can be explained in ways which are fitted to different ages, from five to fifteen.

We are firmly convinced that the teaching of the Ten Commandments (God's Commandments) is essential. If people, whether they be modern educational theorists, or old-fashioned pedagogues or parents, or ministers of religion, think they can set aside the Commandments as being negative and prohibitory, they are sadly in error. "Thou shalt not kill," "thou shalt not steal," "thou shalt not covet," "thou shalt not bear false witness," "thou shalt not commit adultery"—these may be restrictive of the lawless affections and sinful lusts of unregenerate man, but it is a good thing that they are. The general tragedy of man to-day is that he believes he ought to be free to do whatever he wants. It ought to be plain that the creature which follows its instincts only and admits no moral or ethical control is sub-human. To assume that God's law is a limitation on our nobler faculties is of course absurd: God's law is indispensable to our higher life, and that is axiomatic.

In like manner the statement of Christian faith, the so-called Apostles' Creed, is a necessary part of catechetical instruction. We shall not quarrel with a catechism which teaches the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments and the Creed, and emphasises God's Word as our rule of faith.

* * *

The Westminster Catechisms, and their Continental predecessor, the Heidelberg Catechism, are precious memorials of the glorious truths of the Reformation. They are also expressions of truths of God's Word, and consequently we are not concerned to say if they are up-to-date or not. We have seen modern alternative catechisms which seemed to us more anxious to get away from Westminster standards than to uphold them in modern terms. Yet the fact is general, that "question and answer" give us a plan of instruction which never grows obsolete. Asking questions is the way of learning which comes natural to man.

* * *

On a slightly different level, many of us have become acquainted with "The Question Box," a publication which had many editions, and was first issued by the Paulist R. C. Fathers in America. It is made up of questions asked by enquiring non-Roman Catholics and the answers given by the Paulist Fathers (one or more). The advantage of publishing such a volume is that you need only include in it the questions to which you believe you have given successful or convincing answers: you need not print the more complicated and challenging! At most, only a selection is possible.

Another feature of volumes of this type is that you may, if you wish, print many questions of an ignorant or ill-informed character, and this will lead many a reader to think that Protestants are often ill-instructed and full of misconceptions. We will candidly say that we would be exposed to the same temptation if we were to publish a book of Protestant answers to Roman Catholic enquiries. Human nature being what it is, we all want to print what will show our effective, if not crushing, replies.

* * *

Some years ago there came from Australia a volume called (if we are right) "Radio Replies," being answers to Protestant questions by a Father Rumble. We recollect that many of the questions were of the sort we have referred to—ill-informed and inaccurate. It was easy to answer them. But there were also questions of a different calibre, and we thought the answers to them far from satisfactory. We shall, no doubt, all agree that many topics require treatises rather than sentences to do them justice, so let us be warned that these convenient volumes which may be put into an enquirer's hands are of comparatively little value. They are not to be compared with catechisms properly so-called, for catechisms ask properly chosen and systematic questions, and give answers which are intended to build up intelligent faith, and not just to refute particular points.

* * *

There was a little Question and Answer book of about 130 small pages called "Papist Pie." The bold and catching title invited a glance within, and the reader found questions and answers "concerning Catholic belief and practice." The readers for whom it was prepared may not have been men of learning or clergymen of Protestant Communion, and the questions have the naivete of earnest but ignorant and immature minds. This is a point we wish to make, that while we don't suggest that these questions were not asked, we know that many questions could be asked (and may have been) which could not be so briefly and briskly answered.

Let us take an instance—one question put reads "Isn't the meaning of the Bible evident to any Christian who reads it devoutly?" Now we can understand that the questioner wasn't thinking of literary problems or historical or philological or archaeological ones, but only thinking along the commonplace evangelical line, that a serious and devout person can, by reading Holy Scripture think about God, think some of God's own thought, become aware of sin and of the need of repentance, of the Saviour, and of everlasting life. These are some of the profound truths of which we may have a simple but real awareness, and by prayer and faith come to grasp. This, we are sure, is what an ordinary Protestant enquirer would have in mind when he asked such a question.

But the answer? The answer rests upon a different understanding of the question, and it is an answer well calculated to head a person off from concentrating on the Bible. The answer says—"No. Good and learned men interpret the same words differently and contradict one another. Since men took to interpreting the Bible for themselves in the sixteenth century, over 130 different Christian sects have sprung up in England alone, all contradicting one another. Christ Himself gave no hint that we were to get His Words or their meaning through a book, neither did the Apostles. He said to His Apostles: "Go and teach." We need a living voice, contemporary with ourselves, and having authority from God to teach us. Again, it was long before the New Testament was written, collected into one book, or widely available. Christians were giving their lives for Christ by thousands before the New Testament was written. It was not till the end of the fourth century that men knew for certain which books really were the New Testament. . . . How do I know that all those now included, and only those, were rightly included? Simply because the church tells one so."

Now when we analyse this answer we find several flaws in it. First, the 130-sects in England—men were interpreting the Bible for themselves long before the 16th century—The Council of Trent demanded that men should interpret the Bible in accordance with "the unanimous consent of the Fathers," but it is clear that the Fathers did not aim at a concerted interpretation; they employed their faith and liberty on a variety of interpretations. It is quite wrong to say that the 130 sects all contradict one another. They have their differences, but these are mainly differences of usage, and order, not of essential truth.

Secondly, though Christ "gave no hint that we are to get His Words through a book," Rome in fact does get His Words from the book, the New Testament. If you enquire how the change of the elements in the Mass is a change into Christ's Body and Blood, you will be told that the words He spoke were "This is My Body," etc. How do you know? "It is in the Gospel." The writing of a Book was inevitable for the Christian Church had inherited an authoritative book, a written Word whose truth, relevance, and importance it never dreamt of questioning. We refer to the Hebrew Scriptures, the Old Testament.

Thirdly, we say of "the living voice" that we must have some check upon it, and how are we to know that it won't lead us into error? Is not the Written Word a primary essential as a safeguard of truth? Was not a written Word part of the Divine plan, providentially intended? Is that not involved in the statement Rome makes about the Holy Scriptures that "they have God for their Author?" If God is the Author, then the Book is inevitable, essential and supremely authoritative.

Fourthly, the books which gradually secured place in the Christian Canon of Holy Scripture reached that position by their intrinsic character. They were not deliberately selected by the church leaders from a larger group of writings, but gradually distinguished themselves from the rest because it was bound to be so.

Fifthly, if the writer of this answer knows that the right books were included only because the church tells him so, he neglects to take into account that the church had no choice in the matter, because as we have said, the Divine Author gave these books to the church, and no other books could have been selected. This should be said firmly in any discussion of how the Church came to have the Bible for its guidance.

* * *

We cannot at the moment pursue this matter of "Question and Answer" any further. We do say, however, that the venerable technique represented by our catechisms is a worthy and effective way of teaching Christian doctrine. On the other hand, the "Question-Box" and similar publications are of little real value, because the questioner cannot check the evidence behind the answer, and there is no certainty that the vital questions have not been avoided. One is tempted to think that the compiler of such a volume is judge and jury in his own case.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The older we grow the more we are inclined to think that the Lord's Supper, doctrinally considered, has been unduly complicated. The passage of the ages has piled dogma upon dogma until the possibility of a simple approach to the Lord's Table is lost sight of. Our question is "must the Lord's Supper be mainly a theologico-philosophical matter?" A second question is "must it be a quasi-miraculous observance?"

Obviously the place to look for the complete information about this Sacrament is not the Catechism and Confession of faith, but Holy Scripture. We do not say that Holy Scripture gives us theological elements which we can refine, process, elaborate, and expand into a full-orbed development. We say that Holy Scripture gives us the full statement, a statement to which we need bring no supplements, no subtleties, and no transformations. Christ's word is enough. Interpretations are of course inevitable, but we need to be careful that interpretations do not add anything from outside sources. Private and personal opinion is free, within the limits laid down in Scripture, so that we may impose no compulsory form of belief as long as we are careful not to fall below the New Testament standard of faith, and equally careful not to advance beyond it.

* * *

Bare commemoration seems to fall below the language of the Gospel, while transubstantiation plainly goes beyond the Scripture warrant. We may set aside both views without feeling that we are losing touch with the inner spiritual lesson Our Lord set out to teach.

It is sometimes thought that Protestantism (by which we mean, as we have often said here, orthodox evangelical Protestantism) holds to the view that the Lord's Supper is a mere act of remembrance. How any man who has looked at the classic Protestant statements of doctrine can say so is beyond our understanding. As far as we know, there is no Protestant formulary of such an inadequate character. We often find this view called "Zwinglian," but the great pioneer reformer Ulrich Zwingli, (of Zurich) had a fuller richer faith than simple commemorationism. Those who have access to Barclay's "The Protestant Doctrine of the Lord's Supper" will find a detailed survey of Zwingli's beliefs and will be satisfied that Zwingli was not a "Zwinglian."

* * *

Admittedly Zwingli and Luther could come to no agreement on the Lord's Supper. They met in colloquy at Marburg, and failed to see eye to eye. Luther thought Zwingli too indefinite, and Zwingli thought Luther too mediaeval, for he held to a view (now called "consubstantiation") which took a very literal sense of Our Lord's Words—"This is My Body." Luther held the belief which was common before the philosophical theory of transubstantiation became official, that the objective Body and Blood of Christ was present along with the continuing bread and wine. Principal Cunningham ("The Reformers; and The Theology of the Reformation") wrote of Luther's "obstinate adherence to the unintelligible absurdity, commonly called consubstantiation." He thought that this belief of Luther "gives the most unfavourable impression of his character and mental structure." It does not appear that Dr. Cunningham appreciated Luther's attachment to the literal sense of Holy Scripture, or that he adhered to what had been the older orthodox belief.

We do not agree with Luther, but we do not go so far as to condemn him as Dr. Cunningham does. We believe that Ridley and Cranmer had clearer grasp of truth, and that they recovered a more truly evangelical and therefore more truly Catholic doctrine of the Lord's Supper when they gave up the theories of the scholastic theology, and restored the more primitive faith. Bread and Wine are not transmuted: their natures are not changed, but their use is. The wonderful symbolic language of St. John ch. 6, is better understood by the reformed theology than by the Lutheran, and where it is understood there is a strong positive grasp of Christ in His Sacrament. There is therefore no point in belabouring "Zwinglianism," for it is not sacramental doctrine of the churches of the Reformation.

* * *

There are sections of the non-Roman Catholic Churches which claim more for the presence of Christ in the Sacrament than a presence in the faithful receiver. We may illustrate this point of view, by recalling the story of John Keble's poem in "The Christian Year" for the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot. In that unlikely place we have the request.

"O come to our Communion feast,
"Here present in the heart,
"Not in the hands the eternal Priest
"Will His true self impart."

A note in the older editions tells us that Keble would allow no changes in the printed text during his lifetime, though an appeal was made to allow the third line to read

"As in the hands . . ." Keble held to the earlier thought, even though he readily accepted the alternative line as expressing a true view of the sacrament. He was a diligent student of the works of the great Elizabethan, Richard Hooker, and edited an edition of his "Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity," but he could not deny that Hooker's teaching about the Lord's Supper was more akin to

"... present in the heart
"Not in the hands . . ."

than to

"... present in the heart
"As in the hands . . ."

This doctrine being neither transubstantiation nor consubstantiation, (in the strict sense) may have its inconsistencies, but we cannot exclude it from reformed churches. Still, it does appear that the "receptionist" view of the Sacrament and its gift harmonises best with the spirit of the Gospel. It may, be said in passing that the word "Receptionism" is not traced back beyond the middle of the nineteenth century, though of course the lesson it conveys is far older.

* * *

We turn to the Bible, and note that the precedent for the Lord's Supper is the Passover. In Exodus 12 we read the details of the new feast "an appointed feast forever." Israel was told that when the children asked "What mean ye by this service?" they should answer "It is the Sacrifice of the Lord's passover, for that He passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt when He smote the Egyptians and delivered our houses." The Passover lamb was the symbol of deliverance, and typified Our Redeemer. Hence St. Paul uses this language of the Saviour—"Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." The Lord's Supper, recalling and commemorating Calvary is the Christian Passover. It speaks to us of the passion and death of Our Lord. In breaking the Bread and sharing the Cup we show the Lord's death "till He come."

* * *

Some have sought to find in the Old Testament a prediction of the Lord's Supper, and have thought they found it in Malachi 1—"From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same My name is great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense is offered unto my name, and a pure offering." The pure offering, they think, is the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. J. C. M. How in "The New Commentary on Holy Scripture" says of the word of Malachi "we cannot admit that the prophet actually foresaw the institution and repeated offering of the Eucharist." This is plain enough. But the matter may be made plainer; we may emphasise that "the pure offering," must be, not things but persons; not gifts, but ourselves, our souls and bodies. We turn to St. Paul and find his lesson "I beseech you, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service." The margin of the R.V. gives "your spiritual worship," and the Berkeley N.T. "your worship with understanding." We believe that we have here, in Romans 12, the explanation of Malachi's, "pure offering," and so we must distinguish it from sacramental ideas.

* * *

In the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke we read the record of the institution of the Lord's Supper—how Our Lord took bread and broke it and gave to His disciples saying

"This is My Body," etc. Innumerable parallels in the Hebrew Scriptures (as well as in other sayings of Our Lord) lead us to interpret the words in a true symbolic sense. They are representative and significative. To read them in an exclusively literal sense goes counter to sayings such as "I am the Door," "I am the Way," "I am the Resurrection," "I am the true Vine." If these are not taken literally (and nobody attempts to do so) the figurative sense of "This is My Body" is established.

"This Cup is the new testament in My Blood"—how can these words of Our Lord (Luke 22, 20) be understood in any sense but the symbolic? We turn to St. Paul (1 Cor. 11, 25) and find that he quotes these words of Our Lord in a passage which points out that the observance is by its actions designed "to proclaim the Lord's death till He come"—such an intention does away with literalism and gives the highest significative value to the entire rite.

In the same way we emphasise the Remembrance. If the Bread and Wine became the actual Body and Blood of Our Lord, He would be physically present, and the word and thought of Remembrance would be inappropriate. But Remembrance is the word Our Lord specifically used.

* * *

In another passage in the same epistle St. Paul writes of "a participation in the Body and Blood of Christ"—what can that mean but a participation in the benefits obtained for us by the sacrifice of the death of Christ?

The material aspect of the ordinance is not the point on which to concentrate: we must use the material to open up to us the spiritual. Material things, Bread and Wine, are vehicles like Elijah's chariot to lift us into the presence of God; they are the pathway, not the goal.

PERSECUTION IN SPAIN!

Drive to wipe out Protestantism seen as Churches forced to close.

(Special dispatch from Madrid to the New York Times by Benjamin Wells, the paper's correspondent)

Spanish and foreign Protestants are worried over signs of a hardening in the Spanish Government's attitude toward the Protestant community.

They are disturbed by indications that Generalissimo Francisco Franco either tacitly approves, or is indifferent to obstructions that officials are placing in the way of the Protestants' right to worship as defined in Spanish law.

In the past few years, at least 30 Protestant chapels or other places of worship have been ordered closed.

In recent months Spanish Protestants have become still more concerned by evidence, furnished them by friendly R.C.'s in touch with the government, that within the past year all provincial governors have received confidential instructions prejudicial to Protestant interests.

More Pressure Seen

These instructions are reliably understood to direct civil governors to start paulatimamente (gradually) closing all Protestant places of worship that do not have express, written authorization from the government. This could affect 200 places of worship.

Implicit in the wording is the government's desire to avoid unfavourable publicity abroad.

In this overwhelmingly Roman Catholic nation the legal rights of non-Roman Catholic denominations are so vaguely worded and often so erratically interpreted as to be virtually non-existent.

Protestants hold that their right to unmolested worship is enshrined in the fundamental Spanish law, the Fuero de los Espanoles, which Generalissimo Franco himself dictated in 1945. Article VI reads:

"The profession and practice of the Roman Catholic religion, which is that of the Spanish State, shall enjoy official protection. No one shall be disturbed because of his religious beliefs or the private practice of his worship. No other outward ceremonies or demonstrations than those of the (Roman) Catholic religion shall be permitted."

The Secret Circular

This public law and a secret circular directed to all governors on 23rd February, 1948, make up the only official regulations covering the Protestants' right to worship. They complain that the working of both is so loosely drawn as to invite capricious interpretation by various authorities at various times and places.

The secret circular, for instance, states:

"Private worship means strictly personal worship or services inside buildings consecrated to the denomination in question."

Protestant groups in Spain are concentrated in Barcelona, San Sebastian, Bilbao, Madrid and Seville, but there are small Protestant communities in cities, towns and hamlets throughout the country. In all it is estimated that Protestants worship in 250 chapels or other places in Spain.

Rigid Restrictions

However, only about 40 of these are believed to have written authorization.

The Protestant leaders are fully aware that Spanish Protestants now must meet semi-secretly in buildings with no external adornments—not even the cross; that they must worship in private, and that they can conduct no campaign to enlist converts.

Officials have also maintained that the phrase ("buildings consecrated") excludes Protestant worship inside a private home. Yet appeals to allow buildings to be consecrated have often remained unanswered or been rejected.

30,000 All Told

The adult Spanish Protestant community consists of about 10,000 persons. With their children they compose a Protestant hard core of about 30,000.

To minister to this flock there are estimated to be 100 to 150 lay Protestant leaders (of whom 30 are said to have had theological training) and 15 foreign Protestant clergymen living in Spain.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 50.

those who are guilty of such offences must go directly for absolution, if they wish to get it, to the bishop or their vicar-general, or they must go indirectly to either of us through their confessor. One must remember, of course, that absolution cannot be given to offences of this kind unless there is a purpose of amendment and a promise to make restitution for the injury done.

Sense Of Duty

"It is no pleasure to me to have to come from Killarney, and to speak as I have spoken. I would very much prefer to come to praise rather than to blame, but my sense of duty has impelled me to come, and, if need be, I will take still further action. Is it too much to hope that there is an end of this reign of terror to the south-east of this town? Is it too much to hope that if outrages similar to the outrages committed, are committed again that all of our people, all God-fearing honest people will become open in their denunciations? Is it too much to hope that never again will it be necessary for the bishop of the diocese to utter these words of condemnation from this pulpit? At all events, I hope so."

(—"Irish Times," 21st March, '60).

A "Safety Valve" for Africans—Separatist Churches

The continued growth of the Bantu separatist churches in various parts of Africa is causing concern to the leaders of the organised Christian churches.

According to a recent survey there are some 1,300 of these African churches bearing exotic names such as "Holy Cross Catholic Apostolic Christian Church in Zion," and in the Union of South Africa now ranking fifth in numbers with 6.66 per cent of the total population belonging to them. The Dutch Reformed Church claims 25 per cent, the Methodist 11 per cent, the Anglican 9 per cent, and the Roman Catholic 4.8 per cent.

The separatist churches, which emphasise African leadership, are recognised as a "psychological safety valve" as they provide an outlet for African leadership which is denied in politics and public life. They interpret the African character in more lively forms of worship, in ceremonial often baptising with triple immersion, in the use of the drum, in dancing and sometimes in hairstyles, and in church uniforms. The "prophet" of one church wears a white marine suit with gold cords, and has bought the Daimler car which was used by King George VI during his South Africa visit in 1947. He has been christened "King Eddy."

Whether these expressions of religion and worship are essentially Christian is proving a puzzle to observers. The Bible is used, and sometimes an orthodox Prayer Book service, and discipline in some cases is strict with a series of taboos which ban drinking, smoking, and eating pork. Polygamy is recognised, but ministers are expected to be monogamous. In the Zion City Apostolic Church young men baptised before marriage must not contact more than one marriage. Most of the churches claim strongly to be Christian, but only 1 per cent of them have been so recognised by the Council of Churches and the South African Government.

—("The Guardian", 23rd Feb. '60).

* * *

Europe

It has been a privilege during recent years to send an S.G.M. representative to visit a group of French, Swiss and Belgian workers who meet annually to confer on the subject of Christian literature in French. Each year this Conference grows more important to Christian work among French-speaking people, who number many millions.

Being made aware of the increasing opportunities in Italy for the spread of God's Word, the S.G.M. commissioned its representative, while on the Continent, to undertake a visit to some of the main centres of evangelical witness in Italy.

Summarizing the impressions he gained from his journey to these two countries, he writes:

"I am left in no doubt at all that this is a day of unprecedented opportunity in Italy and France. Doors are wide open to evangelical workers in both countries, permitting them to take the message of Christ to nearly 100 million people by every known means of evangelism. There is, however, tremendous opposition and no-one knows how long this liberty of action may continue.

Everywhere I visited I found a clamant need for the Word of God, and evangelical leaders who are consecrated to the cause of Christ."

Resulting from this visit certain proposals have been approved by the Mission's Council and Committees. New printing is already in hand so that the Mission's effective ministry in these two countries may be further developed in days immediately ahead in the closest co-operation with French and Italian Christians.

(Scripture Gift Mission Bulletin Mar. '60.)

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.
Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND
AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for The CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	2
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S

WAFER

OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.

BELFAST.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3, 16).

THE widespread distribution of the Word of God is the main work of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which makes free grants of Scriptures, especially considering the needs of those who are unable to buy Scriptures, and to such liberal supplies are sent out free of cost. Many a needy missionary and other worker has had cause to praise God that by this means he has been enabled to fulfil our Lord's command to make disciples of all nations and to preach the Gospel, by giving the Word which is able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Founded 1831

(For the Circulation of Protestant and Uncorrupted Versions of the Word of God)

7 Bury Place, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.1.

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 6—LXIX.

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.

Church House,
Fisherville Place,
BELFAST

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claessen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	61
The Case for Protestantism	64
Editor's Chair	66
Martyrs	68

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

The New English Bible

The New English Bible is the title chosen for the new translation of the Bible into current English. The New Testament, the first part to be completed, will be published in March 1961. Next year is the 350th anniversary—the exact date is unknown—of the publication of the Authorised Version. There will be simultaneous publication of the new translation throughout the world.

Meeting in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey, the joint committee of the churches, which is directing the new translation, formally accepted the translation of the New Testament.

The work is now being prepared for printing at the Oxford and Cambridge University Presses, which in 1947 were appointed publishers of it by the joint committee, and which have borne the entire cost of the project since then.

The initial printing will exceed 250,000 copies: There will be a library edition, and a popular edition in a smaller format. It is hoped that the individual churches concerned in the project will decide in due course, how far the new translation can be recommended for use in public worship.

Scholars of different denominations, and from a number of British universities have taken part in the work of the translation. It was undertaken with the object of providing English readers, whether familiar with the Bible or not, with a faithful rendering of the best available Greek texts into the current speech of our own time.

The work of translating the Old Testament and the Apocrypha continues. The joint committee consists of representatives of the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, the Methodist Church, the Congregational Union, the Baptist Union, the Presbyterian Church of England, the Churches in Wales, the Churches in Ireland, the Society of Friends, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the National Bible Society of Scotland.

* * *

Church Must Censor Books—Cardinal

Cardinal Ottaviani, Secretary of the Supreme Congregation of the Holy Office, has upheld book censorship as one of the tasks of the Catholic Church. "The Church continues to do what it has always done, what it must do, and woe if it did not," he said.

"The Church is no longer the Church if it is not a teacher; and if it does not correct, it is not a teacher," Cardinal Ottaviani said, "Teaching implies correcting, because men are not given truth without rejecting error."

"Everywhere there is underway a devastation of the healthiest principles, of the most venerable traditions, of the most sacred foundations of Christian knowledge, even of the very sources of the revelation," said Cardinal Ottaviani.

"And exactly when the Church's preserving and controlling action appears most necessary, one wants to blunt its defence weapons," the Cardinal said.

Experience

Cardinal Ottaviani said the Church's books censorship system "has behind it the experience of nearly half a Millennium. It may show some shortcomings, improvements may be suggested, but certainly not changes eliminating any form of prevention or repression of the evil."

The Cardinal said: "The list of books not to be read is like traffic signals: no one resents traffic signals under the pretext that he is an intelligent and practical man and understands things by himself."

He said book censorship is "undoubtedly an act of authority. But the Church's authority is service, not arbitrary action; it is strength, not violence; fulfilment of a duty, not usurpation; healing, not wounding."—U.P.I.

[The above, from "The Irish Press," 19/11/59 may sound very reasonable, but censorship has impeded knowledge and criticism. Man's moral safeguard is an enlightened conscience, not the censor].

* * *

The Bible Society

Last year the British and Foreign Bible Society sent out a copy of the scriptures every two seconds and five tons of scriptures every working day. This year it hopes to double that amount.

These are some of the staggering figures which a visitor to Bible House, in the City of London, will be told. The Society and its Auxiliaries cover most of the world, including the Iron Curtain countries. Russia is officially closed to the Bible Society, but the agent for the Society in Poland has built up the circulation there from nothing, after the last war, to the record total of 260,000 volumes in 1957.

It has been difficult to export scriptures to Yugoslavia, but in the New Year three hundred parcels of scriptures were sent out to Yugoslavia from Bible House. In Hungary and East Germany the Society's work has been confined to the supply of paper for Bible printing.

Thousand Translators

In Communist China, however, the all-Chinese staff of the China Bible House has produced forty-three editions of Chinese scriptures since 1949, totalling over three and a half million volumes.

There are great opportunities in Japan, where the United Bible Societies are hoping to distribute ten million copies of the scriptures in the next three years, and, indeed, all over Asia.

The work which goes into the production of the 350 translations of the Bible every year is enormous. Three members of the Bible House staff are employed in the translations department, but the majority of the work is done by missionaries in the field. About a thousand translators all over the world work for the Bible Society. Their translations are scrutinised carefully at Bible House to see if they come up to the very high standard required, and if there is sufficient demand for a translation, then the Bible Society will publish it.

Heavily Subsidised

In 1956 the Society published St. Mark's Gospel in Neo-Melanesian. At first sight this looks like a foreign language, but it is easy to read—because Neo-Melanesian is another name for "Pidgin English." The Bible Society published this translation after making sure that "Neo-Melanesian" really was the common language of the people of New Guinea.

In 1960, the Society will publish eighteen entirely new or revised translations of the whole

Bible, in addition to the new translations of parts of the Bible.

Most of the scriptures published by the Bible Society are heavily subsidised, so as to be available at a price which people can afford. A translation of the Bible intended for the mission field will be sold at 2s. 6d., although it cost the Society 8s. 6d. to produce. The Jubilee Bible, with three hundred line illustrations, supplied to schools, was subsidised. The Braille Bible, in English, which fills thirty-nine volumes, costs nearly £39 to produce, but it is available to the blind for £3, because it is the Society's policy that everyone who wants a Bible should be able to buy one. It is for this reason that the Bible Society supplies copies of the Bible for sale in Woolworth's; it is the only society to do so.

Besides translations, the Society publishes one and a half million English Bibles every year, chiefly for the Dominions and Colonies, and although by its character it is not allowed to publish the Phillips and Moffat translations, it does circulate them, through its agencies.

Some members of the Bible House translating staff are members of the Dodd Committee, and next year the Bible Society, together with the Oxford and Cambridge Presses, will be allowed to publish its new translation of the New Testament.

BFBS activities are many and various. In addition to publishing Bibles it has a very fine collection of Bibles of every date and in every conceivable language.

Besides collecting Bibles, the Society collects stamps. And "stamp corner" in Bible House is ruled over by one of the Society's real characters, Miss M. Davis, known to the staff as "Auntie." The floor of Miss Davis's room is covered with bundles of stamps, and outside in the corridor are parcels of used stamps sent from Canada. "Auntie" Davis is eighty-six and has worked at Bible House for thirty years. Last year she raised £900 with her stamps, and hopes to raise over £1,000 this year.

Notes in Braille

Apart from Bibles and scriptures, the Bible Society publishes one or two stories about its work, and also the series "B" of the Bible Reading Fellowship Notes in Braille. Four hundred copies of these Notes are produced every year, and the number is steadily increasing, as they are of great help to blind people who cannot afford Bible commentaries.

* * *

Less Latin in Church Liturgy?

Rome, Monday—His Holiness, Pope John, is understood to favour modifications in the Latin-language liturgy of the Church so that more can follow services in their vernacular language.

The Holy Father indicated such a desire in remarks made yesterday in a Lenten visit outside the Vatican to a suburban Rome church.

No official transcript of Pope John's remarks has been issued, but in opening the book of the Missal and Breviary during the ceremony the Holy Father was quoted as saying:

"It is in Latin. But with time the faithful will be prepared to penetrate always more what has been said and expressed in the sacred texts and in the official language the Church."

Other reports quoted Pope John as saying that the Latin liturgy would be gradually reduced because it would be easier for the congregation to follow.

Slowly

"But slowly, slowly," he was quoted as saying, as regards the reduction in use of Latin.

Referring later to the forthcoming consistory at which an African, a Japanese, a Filipino, a Dutchman, Frenchman and two Italian Cardinals will be admitted to the Sacred College, Pope John was quoted as saying:

"Not all the Cardinals are white. One will be black. We are everywhere, at the centre of the world, to carry to everyone the truth of Christ."

The new African Cardinal, the first in the known modern annals of the Church, will be His Eminence, Laurian Cardinal Rugambwa, 47-year-old Bishop of Rutabo, Tanganyika. He and the six other new Princes of the Church will be installed in ceremonies beginning in the Vatican on March 28.—(U.P.I.)

("The Irish Press," 15th March, '60.)

[The information given in this news item is another instance of the Roman Catholic Church falling into line with Reformation principles — Worship in the language of the people, not in an unknown tongue, was one of the Protestant demands in the sixteenth century.]

* * *

"Jacob's Trouble"

Recent events have given Jews, all over the world, a rude shock, and greatly shaken their confidence in security. It is not just the fact that a thousand acts have taken place, but that it occurred simultaneously in thirty-four countries is the real trouble. It shows that the Nazi evil is not yet dead, nor has it been idle. It seems that there exists a strong underground organisation somewhere. It is a reminder that "Jacob's Trouble" is not yet over, and indeed may come any day. How urgent then, for earnest Christians to take the Gospel of Salvation to the Jews, whilst there is still time, and pray with the Psalmist — "Redeem Israel O God, out of all his troubles." The promises of God are a special comfort at such a time as this. May the storms rage, but the Lord will be the Refuge of His people, who will also give salvation unto His people, and when He bringeth back the captivity of His people, Jacob will rejoice and Israel will be glad.

—("Immanuel's Witness," March, 1960.)

U.S.A.

* * *

In the Southern States of U.S.A. there is a large moving population of migrants, estimated to be about two millions, who follow the crops—peas, tomatoes, cotton and fruit—making only a seasonal, precarious living. A large number of these come from over the Mexican border for a few weeks each year. During this time, Gospel services are held for children and grown-ups who often appear to be more ready to receive the Scriptures than when in their own country.

One worker in Arizona writes of his frequent trips into Mexico and of a Bible Camp for students. He says: "Recently a man wrote us of his coming to know the Lord through the Scripture portions he had received from one of our students working down in Mexico for his summer vacation. I am constantly giving Scriptures to the students when they go home to Mexico to visit their parents."

Our associate workers, the American Scripture Gift Mission, have for many years supplied Scriptures to Christians working among these Mexicans and among Chinese, Filipino and Porto Rican migrants.

—(Scripture Gift Mission Bulletin Mar. '60.)

* * *

Prospect of Unity of Christians

Sometimes the difficulties encountered with Protestants were simply natural ones arising from background and environment, said Rev. Father Agnellus Andrew, O.F.M., Catholic Assistant to the head of religious broadcasting, B.B.C., and a well-known broadcaster on religious topics, when he lectured on "The Prospect of Christian Unity" under the auspices of the St. Vincent de Paul Society in the Gresham Hotel, Dublin.

"In these days, it is doubtful whether much real good is done by the 'win a victory' type of controversy with non-Catholics. Often he is sent away merely more determined to think up all the counter arguments which he failed to think of during the argument."

The present Pope in his first speech called for unity. This century had been a complete reversal of the tremendous process of Protestantism; now, there was a consuming desire for unity.

"We Catholics cannot sit with them as equals as though we and they were parts of a divided

—(Continued on p. 70.)

THE CASE FOR PROTESTANTISM WHAT THE REFORMATION DID!

An address by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D. reprinted from 'Evangelical Action,' Australia.

In October, 1517, Luther nailed his theses on the door of the Church at Wittenberg. That is regarded by a great many people as the real commencement of the Reformation. Personally, I think that is a mistake. The Reformation was a movement of slow growth, but the nailing of the theses by Luther on the door at Wittenberg brought to a head a great many movements that had been agitating in the minds of thoughtful people for a considerable period. The movement exhibited itself in a great many countries at the same time. But we are considering some of the blessings that resulted from this trouble and movement in Europe generally.

Rediscovery of Scripture

Perhaps it may be well to confine our attention to the English-speaking people, and we would say in relation to that that one of the great blessings that resulted from the Reformation was the rediscovery of the sacred Scriptures and the placing of them in the hands of ordinary man. Tindale boasted that he would make the boy that followed the plough know more of God's Word than the priest with whom he was debating. That particular boast of Tindale has been abundantly justified, for it is well known that at the base of the Authorised Version there lies the vigorous translation that was issued by Tindale, and cost him his life. And the Authorised Version of the Scripture has made the Bible a commonplace amongst English-speaking people.

* * *

Not only that but, a fact which is seldom recognised except in what we may call literary circles, the Bible was influencing the Roman Catholic Church to a very great extent. The original framers of the Rhemish Testament that was issued in 1852 declared very solemnly in their preface that they were not actuated by any idea that the Bible should be in the hands of people ordinarily. On the contrary, they regarded that as what they described as an erroneous position. They claimed that they were translating the Scriptures simply because of the necessities of the times. But, in addition to that, in their effort to translate they were so obsessed by the influence of the Latin Version that they did not give to the people a really understandable English translation. A slight example of this may be seen in the words that we have in Hebrews 13: "To do good and to distribute forget not for with such sacrifice, God is well pleased." The last clause in that verse was translated in the original Rhemish Testament: "For with such hosts God is promoted;" and the note was attached warning the readers that their adversaries, for so they described the Protestants, flew from the word "promerit" and translated here "is well pleased." Now if anybody takes up the present Douay Version of the Scriptures he will read these words in it: "For by such sacrifices God's favour is obtained;" and if he is tempted to turn to Monsignor Knox's modern translation he will discover that he renders the passage: "God takes pleasure in such sacrifice as this." This one example may enable us to see that the Authorised Version of the Scriptures, itself dependent so very largely on Tindale's vigorous English, has influenced not only the English-speaking Protestant world, but has exercised a very profound effect upon the Roman Catholic translations of Scripture

* * *

The wide diffusion of the Word of God has produced an attitude of a somewhat different type in the Roman Catholic Church at the present time. Instead now of claiming that they regard it as an erroneous opinion that everybody should have the Bible in their own tongue, and instead of commending the decision of the Council of Trent that nobody should read it except such persons as have a licence from the Bishop, they assure us that it is a Protestant libel to declare that the Roman Catholic Church is adverse to the circulation of the sacred Scriptures. We may therefore, with very great satisfaction, claim that the present prevalence of Scripture reading, even in the Roman Catholic Church, owes its origin to the movement inaugurated possibly by Erasmus, and supported by John Colet, but crystallised and determined widely at the Reformation, that the Scripture should be in the hands of the people in the vulgar tongue. That is a particular boon for which we have to thank those who secured this blessing to us at the cost of their own lives. Tindale was seized, strangled and burned because he dared to translate the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue. To-day there are rival agencies, even in the Roman Catholic Church, endeavouring to make this sacred Scripture popular, and supplying translations that they regard as adequate to the needs of the people. For that we profoundly rejoice.

Civil Liberty

But valuable as that movement for the free circulation of the Scriptures proved, there are other aspects of the Reformation that have, we may venture to say, a wider civil effect. In the agitation that arose at the time of Wycliffe it was enacted in Statute Law for the first time in England that heretics should be burned. Previously that was the common law of the land. The Church called before it those who were suspected of heresy and, if they remained obdurate, ordered the civil law to take action and proceed against them according to the directions of the Church. But Henry IV, in his attempt to combat the Wycliffe movement, went one step further and placed on the Statute Book a law concerning the burning of heretics. That was in the year 1401, and it remained the Statute Law of England for 150 years. When Henry VIII came to the throne the Statute was in operation, but much later, when Henry VIII died in 1547 and the reformers came into power in the reign of Edward VI, they removed this offensive Statute from the Statute Book, and it was no longer possible to bring a man before a civil tribunal for a purely spiritual offence or spiritual opinion. Unfortunately, in the reign of Mary, when the persecuting spirit was again evoked, that particular Statute was restored to the Statute Book, and under it many of the reformers were burned to death. But when Elizabeth ascended the throne in 1550, and the Protestant beliefs were dominant in England, that particular Statute was removed—we hope for ever.* To-day this principle, that was then so definitely asserted at such great cost to many, is recognised in nearly every civilised country. We have to deplore the fact that mediaeval influences still prevail in certain quarters, and the law against the persecution of heretics, even though it is not on the Statute Book, is to some extent in operation in ordinary life. The recent happenings in Colombia are an evidence of that. But still we can claim with confidence that as a result of the Reformation movement a very great degree of civil liberty has been accorded in every country under civil control.

* * *

We have to recognise in Communist lands the old principle that governed the Church of Rome in the Middle Ages has again been revived, and freedom of opinion is no longer tolerated in the way that we would desire. It is a remarkable fact that the influence of Communism is most prevalent in countries that are under Roman Catholic domination, or at least have not adopted fully the Reformed Faith. Czarism in Russia was a prelude to the present domination by a bureaucratic control, and in France there is a very large body of Communist agitators. We find the same in Italy. It is a well known fact that when people revolt against a particularly severe regime they are tempted by the very circumstances in which they find themselves to adopt the methods of that particular system. However, we may be thankful that the principles of civil and religious liberty have been established in most of the civilised portions of the world to-day, and we trace it directly to the influence of Reformation thought. And indirectly, we may add, to the wide circulation of the sacred Scriptures and its moral influence upon the hearts and lives of many people, teaching them to adopt, in some modified degree at least, the divine command: "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you."

Personal Salvation

There is time to remember, however, that the Reformation brought a real spiritual emancipation of the individual of a far-reaching character. In the Roman Catholic Church, even to-day, the declaration is made that no one can tell whether he is worthy of love or hatred. The consequence of that particular declaration is that the pall of fear hangs over many who are influenced by Roman Catholic teaching. They dread the future, not knowing what the future may hold for them. There are even for the righteous the terrors of purgatory, and there is the possibility, the awful possibility, that they may die in mortal sin, either through imperfect contrition or through having failed to secure the services of a priest at their latter end. These things are affecting the heart and conscience of a great many people. The Reformation freed men from that particular peril. It revived again the Apostolic message that "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life." It revived again the great hope of John that "we may know that we have eternal life if we believe on the name of the Son of God." It gave to the individual a security, because if he placed his reliance on Christ his Saviour he knew that the future was secure for him. It removed the terror of the need for expiating sins by great anguish in the world to come. It taught men that those who die in the Lord went to be with Him, that they departed, as the Apostle said, to be with Christ which was very far better. That hope of a blessed future and that confidence of an immediate pardon in the present, through faith in Jesus Christ our Lord, is still the ruling principle of Reformation thought and is used to bring men to the knowledge of Him Who loved them and gave Himself for them.

*It is well to add to Archdeacon Hammond's account of the Statute authorising the burning of heretics (repealed in the reign of Elizabeth I) the following facts.—

1. Bartholemew Legate (1575-1612) was imprisoned in London along with his brother Thomas, for heresy in 1611. Thomas died in prison. Bartholemew was tried before the London Consistory Court in 1612 and found guilty of heresy and delivered to the secular authorities for punishment. He was burned to death at Smithfield, 18, March, 1612.

2. Edward Wightman was burned to death for heresy at Lichfield a month later than Legate (April 1612).

3. Thomas Aikenhead was executed in 1696 in Edinburgh for blasphemy (aged 18). He was not burned to death.

These instances show how long it took Protestants to unlearn the evil principles of religious persecution.—Ed.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

INDULGENCES.

"God wills that we add our prayers, works and sufferings to those of Calvary to make up for our sins"—this is an assertion made by the Rev. Fr. F. J. Ripley in a Catholic Truth Society pamphlet treating of "Indulgences" among other subjects. Fr. Ripley's words are plain and unambiguous, and we draw attention to them as we are often told that we fail to understand the true nature of an indulgence.

* * *

According to our quotation Calvary (i.e. the death of Christ) was not a complete, only a partial, atonement for sin. Christ, we might say came into the world and died on the cross to encourage us, by removing part of the burden and effect of sin. Having lightened the load, He enables us to shoulder the remainder more successfully. Putting it this way invites, of course, the criticism that we misunderstand the problem and the Church's teaching. We are ready to agree that the remission of part of the penalty of sin is a great thing, and that we ought to be thankful to God for any reduction in the penalty. But that is not the point. The point is—what is the true teaching of the Church of Christ on the subject of Christ's atoning death? That is, what does Holy Scripture tell us? Does the Bible say that Christ partly atoned for the sins of His people, or does it say He fully and completely atoned for them? This is the basic question.

* * *

It will be said to us that we must learn the simple difference between the temporal and the eternal penalties for sin, and see that Christ took away the eternal penalties while leaving us to make reparation for the temporal ones.

We answer that we have not observed this distinction clearly made in the new Testament.

* * *

Fr. Ripley says "the Church has at her disposal an infinite treasury of merits, as St. John tells us, Christ 'is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world' (1 Jn. 2, 2)." From this saying of St. John we believe that we are intended to learn the vastness and completeness of Christ's sacrifice for sin, rather than the idea that He gave to His Church authority to use and to apply His merits. The Church's joyful news ought to be the fulness of Christ's atonement—the Saviour's merits are not rationed—

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the Waters, and he that hath no money, Come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price"! (Isaiah 55, 1).

Is this not a prophecy of good things to come? Were not the virtues of redeeming love, saving grace and everlasting mercy made free for all on Calvary?

"In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness." (Zech. 13, 1).

Is the cleansing stream judiciously measured out? or do we accept wholeheartedly what Our Lord Himself said to the Woman at Jacob's Well in Sychar—"Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up into eternal life"? (John 4. 14). Here we mark the inexhaustible supply to cleanse, refresh, and revivify. Spiritual truth grounded in the perfect work of Calvary, is the undying inspiration of repentance, faith, and perseverance.

* * *

We recognise another precious emphasis and application of Gospel truth in the familiar words of the Dublin University graduate, A. M. Toplady.—

"Nothing in my hand I bring,
 "Simply to Thy Cross I cling;
 "Naked, come to Thee for dress;
 "Helpless, look to Thee for grace;
 "Foul, I to the fountain fly;
 "Wash me, Saviour, or I die."

The fountain is not the tribunal of penance but the Precious Blood, which is the full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world.

* * *

Fr. Ripley quotes St. Paul (Col. 1. 24) who says of the Colossian Christians that they "now rejoice in my sufferings for you and fill up those things that are wanting of the sufferings of Christ, in my flesh, for His body, which is the Church." These words are apparently taken to justify the view that Christ's death needs supplementing. But the point is this, that we, not others, are to "add our prayers, works, and sufferings to those of Calvary." If St. Paul were to urge what Fr. Ripley says, he had need to tell the individual Christians in Colosse that they must add their sufferings (not his) to Christ's sufferings in order to "make up for their sins."

* * *

Nevertheless, we ought to ask ourselves what St. Paul meant by this unusual statement in Col. 1. 24.—

"Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church." The emphasis is laid by the apostle in the sufferings he endures on behalf of people such as the Colossians—the imprisonments, beatings, journeys, shipwrecks, toils etc. which are consequential upon his self-dedication to the life of an apostle—"the afflictions of Christ in my flesh" is a single phrase and refers to the consequences of following Christ. He wrote in his epistle to the Philippians of "the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, becoming conformed unto His death." In II Corinthians (1, 5) he writes "... as the sufferings of Christ abound unto us," and in ch. 4, 10. "always bearing about in the body the dying of Jesus." In Galatians 6. 17 he wrote "I bear branded in my body the marks of Jesus."

These references make it plain, we think, that "the sufferings of Christ" are the sufferings which are entailed upon faithful discipleship, and they show us that St. Paul had no thought whatever of suggesting that the people of God must make up the defects or insufficiencies of Our Lord's redeeming work.

St. Paul had endured much, and knew that he was to endure more for the cause of the Gospel. He wrote to the Colossians from prison, perhaps in Rome. He had more than once been condemned to death by the Jews, and had been stoned and was thought to be dead as a result. If he did not contemplate death by Roman judicial proceedings, he must still have contemplated death by violence, this at last filling up what was lacking in his experiences of "the afflictions of Christ in my flesh."

* * *

This interpretation is the only one which is reasonable, and harmonious with the rest of the New Testament. It follows then that St. Paul's words have nothing whatever to do with indulgences or with supplements to Calvary.

* * *

A baseless theory of some theologians is that human merits accumulate and that a surplus exists (somewhere) which the church controls and applies: as Fr. Ripley puts it "not only do the merits of Christ belong to the Church, but all the merits of all her members." How far does Holy Scripture carry us in this idea of merits? The sacred writers never contemplated this development, so they throw little light upon it. In fact, there is one conclusive statement which is the perfect answer to this theory—in the Epistle to Titus we read "When the kindness of God our Saviour, and His love toward man appeared, not by works done in righteousness, which we did ourselves, but according to His mercy He saved us, through the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which He poured out upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, that, being justified by His grace we might be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Titus 3, 4-7.

* * *

Naturally we know that in ancient times penances were imposed on the penitent. There were penalties (like fines or other sentences to-day). It is a human judgment, not a divine one, and it relates to conditions here and not to conditions after death. What we need to guard against is the supposition that we can obtain (for money, austerities, pilgrimages, observances etc.) what God freely promises and offers by Christ in the Gospel. We must reject any and all suggestions which take from the all-sufficiency of Calvary.

* * *

No evangelical Christian can agree with the following—"When a man repents the eternal punishment is taken away with the guilt of the sin; but he must still try to make up to God for the way he has disturbed right order and the unlawful pleasure he has enjoyed. This debt is called temporal punishment, as opposed to eternal."

"It is their temporal punishment the church takes away by Indulgences. This applies to souls the satisfactions of Christ and the Saints which are in her treasury."

We believe that an illustration of the Divine forgiveness is provided in Our Lord's parable of the Prodigal Son. Recording to the theory of eternal and temporal punishments the Prodigal was forgiven by his father, and so was received into his home once more. But he had to bear the temporal punishment (as he supposed when he said "make me as one of thy hired servants"). What is the real story and lesson? The father at once calls for the best robe for him, shoes on his feet, and a ring on his finger; the fatted calf is killed and cooked, a feast is prepared; friends are asked to come; there is music and dancing—surely this is the pattern story of God's forgiving love.

The all-powerful is the all-loving. Against the background of eternity, of an illimitable universe, of infinite wisdom, what need has God of temporal punishments, or of the satisfactions of mere revenge, or of any punitive justice? Hear Isaiah on the achievement of Christ — "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Truly "the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed." The blood of Christ cleanses our consciences from dead works (past misdeeds) to serve the living God (Hebr. 9, 14).

* * *

Temporal consequences of sin are experiences of earth: they are not impositions we endure after death. Eternal consequences of sin are the experiences of the impenitent—eternal death, and about them nothing can be done. The lesson of the moral and spiritual urgency of repentance is the lesson of God's word—"To-day." When there is repentance there is forgiveness, and Love does not calculate.

MARTYRS.

A martyr, as Christians understand the word, is a person who bears witness to his faith with sincerity and consistency. In a narrower, if more popular sense, a martyr is one who dies rather than lives at the price of giving up his faith.

Martyrs may be found in any time or place of religious intolerance and persecution. There were vast numbers of martyrs in the early days of the church when the Roman empire was pagan and on several occasions tried to destroy Christianity. We recall, for example, the persecution under Decius and the persecution under Diocletian.

When the empire became Christian in name, and Christians obtained legal powers, dissenters from the official brand of Christianity were often persecuted by the majority—the followers of Priscillian suffered death at the hands of professing Christians. Gnostics, Manichaeans, Cathars, and others whose Christian faith diverged from orthodoxy were often ruthlessly attacked. Some of these suffered in Western Europe, and religious persecution under church and papal sanction reached the level of a "Crusade" when all hands were summoned to Southern France in the thirteenth century to destroy utterly the enlightened spiritual movement called Albigensian.

Inquisitions in most parts of Europe, and the peculiar Spanish inquisition in Spain speak eloquently to us through the centuries of the evil practice of religious persecution. Behind the evil practice lay the evil principle—the claim of the church to the right to penalise, torture, imprison and plunder all who are accused of "heresy." In addition the church claimed the right to deliver its victims to "the secular arm" i.e., the obedient civil power, to be condignly punished. As the church piously pretended to abhor the shedding of blood, the civil power had permission to burn its victims alive.

* * *

The drab falsehood was current, that "heresy is a very great evil," but in truth the very great evil is religious intolerance. The very great evil is that men take to themselves the power and will to inflict atrocious suffering and death on those who differ in opinion from them.

We do not regard truth with indifference, or dismiss the doctrines of the Christian faith as irrelevant. But we say that the use of force, coercion, torment etc., is not the way either to convert those who are in error, or to safeguard (by terrifying) those who may be thought in danger of "apostasy." Wicked means and policies can never be right even when employed in the interests of "religion." "The truth in love," not the truth in frenzied zeal that does not hesitate to maim, or murder is what the Gospel of Our Redeemer requires.

* * *

In England during the Middle Ages the church welcomed the Parliamentary statute "De Haeretico Comburendo" which authorised the civil authorities to burn the church's victims. In the sixteenth century some leading ecclesiastics who were later the leaders of the Church of England Reformation were guilty of taking part in heresy trials which ended in the burning of the victims. That a number of these men endured the same fate under Queen Mary Tudor may seem to be "poetic justice," but we hope that they had some realisation that such intolerance is wholly evil.

At least it may be granted that those they persecuted were sincere and loyal in their beliefs, while it is plain that when the reformers died they too were steadfast—the edifying death of Archbishop Cranmer after several vacillations is an example.

* * *

Though the statute above referred to was repealed by the Protestant Parliament, it remained possible to put "heretics" to death for their religious error—elsewhere we name two or three who suffered the death penalty. But as everyone knows the death penalty for heresy could not survive long in the atmosphere of the reformed faith. The churches of the Reformation, whatever their faults, could not fail to learn how ungodly and sinful it is to imprison and kill religious dissenters. Thus all Protestant churches had for centuries abandoned as wrong a penalty which Rome only suspended in 1917 (Revised Code of Canon Law).

* * *

When Elizabeth Tudor became Queen of England the fires of Smithfield and elsewhere ceased. These had for some years under her Roman Catholic sister, Queen Mary, burned vigorously. Several hundreds of Protestants of all classes, bishops, priests, laymen and laywomen had suffered. The contrast between the barbarities of the brief reign of Mary Tudor and the barbarities of the very long reign of her sister ought to be kept in mind. Had Elizabeth treated Roman Catholic subjects as Mary treated Protestant ones her victims would have been reckoned in thousands, and not as they in fact were, in scores.

* * *

Another point to remember is that Elizabeth was completely ringed in by foreign enemies. Scotland, France, Spain, the Holy Roman Empire (extending from the North Sea to the Adriatic) were all, in one degree or another, her foes. The Pope excommunicated her, and expressly empowered her subjects to disobey her. The result was a series of conspiracies against her—plot after plot (with foreign aid) was formed. Only the patience, sagacity, and courage of the Queen and her advisors (Cecil, etc.), saved her and the country. Elizabeth's great offence in the eyes of those who still condemn her was her success. She reigned for forty-five years.

"For the first ten years of the reign Catholics, who did not accept the new position were debarred from public offices and fined for non-attendance at Anglican services, but there was no physical persecution. Such was the situation at the date of Pope Pius V's sudden excommunication and deposition of Elizabeth" (Ehler and Morrall "Church and State through the centuries" 1954. p. 180).

"We declare her to be deprived of her pretended claim to the aforesaid Kingdom. . . ."

"Also we declare that the lords, subjects and peoples of the said Kingdom, and all others who have sworn allegiance to her are perpetually absolved from any oath of this kind and from any type of duty in relation to lordship fidelity and obedience: Consequently we absolve them by the authority of our present statements, and we deprive the same Elizabeth of her pretended claim to the Kingdom, . . . and command all . . . that they have not to obey her. We shall bind those who do the contrary with a similar sentence of excommunication." These quotations are from the Bull of Pope Pius V, "Regnans in Excelsis," 1570.

* * *

The effect of the Bull was to turn every Roman Catholic subject of the Crown into a rebel, and guilty of high treason. The Bull forced them into this situation and made them what we are now accustomed to call "a fifth column" within the realm. Church and State were so closely linked everywhere in the sixteenth century that any opposition to the Queen's religion was treason. England was fighting for freedom and for the reformed faith. Had the Queen failed the fires would have been kindled again, not only in Smithfield, but in every parish. The people of England knew also that the Spanish King who at that time also ruled the Netherlands, had condemned to death as heretics the entire Protestant population of the Netherlands.

He tried his best to carry this out, and it was he who sent the Armada against England.

* * *

No matter how sincerely we deplore the sufferings endured by a few of Elizabeth's subjects as a result of the Pope's Bull which made them unwilling traitors; and no matter how much we condemn religious persecution, we must recognise the realities of that day. Every Roman Catholic priest who went into England from the Continent was necessarily suspected of being an agent of the Queen's enemies, domestic or foreign; and all who sheltered them were liable to the penalties of high treason. It is beyond doubt that many priests under the guidance of a Fr. Parsons, a Jesuit, were involved in State matters.

In 1580 a Fr. Saunders, also a Jesuit, upbraided the Irish chiefs for not rebelling against Elizabeth—their offence was "maintaining a heretical pretended queen against the public sentence of Christ's Vicar." This was an inevitable outcome of the Bull.

* * *

A number of years later, when the Armada had failed the Queen addressed a special proclamation to the Roman Catholic clergymen then in England, and enjoined all of them to quit the realm except such as should acknowledge allegiance and duty to her before a member of the Priory Council or other competent person. With those who swore allegiance she would make further arrangement. Thirteen priests complied, and put forward a declaration in which they acknowledged the queen as the rightful sovereign "and themselves bound to obey her as much as any Protestants." They stated that even if the Pope were to excommunicate all who did not conspire against the queen they would still consider themselves bound in conscience to disobey such censures and abide faithful to the Queen. They acknowledged the Pope, and said they would die rather than infringe "the lawful authority of Christ's Catholic Church." From this we may deduce that they did not regard the excommunication of the Queen as coming within the lawful authority of the church.

The Roman Catholic Bishop Berrington long after gave his opinion that if the English Roman Catholic priests had presented this declaration to King James I in 1603 "it is probable that we should have heard no more of recusancy and penal prosecutions."

* * *

The question of martyrdom was brought to mind by reading in "The Sunday Express" of 8th May, 1960, an article entitled "Pray for Two Miracles." It was stated that the Roman Catholics of England and Wales were being asked to pray for two miracles which can be regarded as a sign that forty Roman Catholics put to death "during the Reformation" can be declared saints. We observe that the forty were not put to death "during the Reformation" which was already settled in England, but during the period called by Roman Catholic historians "the counter-Reformation."

It appears that before "the English Martyrs" can be canonised as a group, it must be shown that they have been collectively responsible for two miracles.

The intention is said to be that the forty martyrs may become patron saints in the effort to convert Britain to the Roman Catholic faith. Twenty-eight of those who suffered the death penalty for treason were priests from continental seminaries or religious orders. The writer in "The Sunday Express" mentions the sixteenth century charge of "treasonable allegiance to the Papacy." He does not refer to the Pope's Bull which made every Roman Catholic an enemy of the Queen. Could a Roman Catholic organiser or agent, or cleric convincingly demonstrate his loyalty unless he took the oath of allegiance? We have noted above how few responded to the Queen's invitation in 1588. They were in a most desperate position of divided loyalties, and the Pope had forced them into it. Perhaps he in turn was unable to do otherwise. In that case may we not say that the Queen had no alternative either?

Those were hard times for conscientious men of all sorts. Ought we not to-day to respect integrity and perseverance, and pray that such things may never happen again?

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p.63.

Christendom, but we can look out to them with longing and love and bury old animosities" Father Agnellus said.

The Pope had given an example of how it should be done. First of all, he had given the clearest possible teaching of the true nature and authority of the Church. Then he invited co-operation in presenting a common front against Godlessness; to solve the social problem, and he invited all who share the name of Christ to take their stand on the common ground of Christian charity.

—("Dublin Evening Herald", 25/4/'60).

[As long as it is assumed that Rome is right and Protestants, however innocent and sincere, are wrong, the unity of the Church will remain an unrealisable dream.

Despite Fr. Agnellus's opinion, we are all part of divided Christendom, and the evangelical Churchman's answer to the charge that he rejects unity is "we are divided in the interests of truth."]

* * *

Israel and the Arabs

"The central wish of the Israelis at present is for peace, for a settlement with the Arabs which guarantees their borders and promises them a breathing space in which to complete the development of their country. Mr. Ben-Gurion has declared himself ready to meet the Arab leaders at any time to discuss such a settlement, his Government has offered to take back 100,000 of the Palestine refugees and to pay compensation to the rest (and with their practical experience of the problems of land reclamation and irrigation, Israeli technicians could make a practical contribution to the resettlement of refugees in Iraq and Syria if the Arabs would ever consider such a solution). There is space reserved on the sea front at Haifa for a free port, which the Israelis would be prepared to link by a land corridor to Jordan, allowing the Jordanians access to the Mediterranean. In return the Israelis would want freedom of navigation through the Suez Canal, the renunciation of all further claims on behalf of the Palestine Arabs, and the recognition of the State of Israel with its existing borders (subject perhaps to modifications in detail) guaranteed by the United Nations."

"Unhappily there is not the slightest chance of such terms being accepted by the Arabs, since they ignore what to the Arabs is the heart of the matter—the fact that the foundation of the Jewish State in Palestine was an injustice which they cannot and will not accept. And whatever the rights and wrongs of this attitude, its practical effect is to strengthen the determination of the Israelis to make no concessions and to provide a justification for those who advocate strong-arm methods, on the ground that "the only thing the Arabs understand is force." This attitude, which underlay the policy of "punitive raids" in 1955 and 1956, has been tacitly abandoned since Suez, but it is still dangerously near the surface and found isolated expression in the Tawafiq incident on the Syrian border earlier this year."

—(From "The Guardian," 2/5/60).

[If this world were managed with a little more wisdom Israel's reasonable proposals would be accepted, and the near East could settle down to civil and economic progress.]

Anglican Priests now Catholics

Five former priests of the Anglican Church have been ordained priests of the Catholic Church, the Vatican Press Office announced today.

They were ordained priests on April 14 by Cardinal Traglia, the Pope's Vice-Regent for the City of Rome, of which the Pope is Bishop.

All were members of the Archdiocese of Westminster. They were converted to Catholicism some time ago, and then went to Rome to prepare themselves for the priesthood.

They are: Richard Johnson who formerly served near London; Kenneth Dain formerly an assistant priest at Paddington; James Douglas formerly an assistant priest in London; Allan Wilcox and formerly a member of the Anglican Benedictine religious congregation of Nashdon.

They will return to England to take up their priestly duties.

—("Dublin Evening Herald," 25/4/60.)

[What are we supposed to conclude from this news item? That the Church of England is surrendering to Rome? Or that some young men have gone where their opinions should make them feel more at home and easier in conscience?

The fact is that now and then some Church of England clergymen do go over to Rome, and a number of these, after, a few years' experience, quietly ask to be taken back into the Church of England.

We cannot say how many, but it is known that some return. The extract below shows another situation].

* * *

R.C. Priests join Reformed Church

According to the World Presbyterian Alliance, more than 40 former R.C. priests are now ministers or lay members of the French Reformed Church. Another 12 are reported active in other Protestant Churches, while some have entered the Orthodox and Old Catholic Churches.

Twenty ex-R.C. priests, meeting recently at Sete, France, estimated that more than 1,000 priests have left the R.C. Church in France since World War II. They said that greater numbers had left it in Italy and a smaller group in Spain. The meeting was called by French Reformed leaders to help the ex-priests adjust to their new way of life. Former priests in the French Reformed Church are organized for aid to those who leave the Church of Rome and "border crossing" ex-priests from Italy and Spain.

The group also advises the French Church on contacts with Roman Catholicism.

—("Church of Ireland Gazette," 6/5/60.)

* * *

Israel's Progress

The Israelis are developing in different parts of Africa and Asia the normal international relationships which they have been unable to establish in their immediate Middle Eastern environment.

In other words, they are using the deep reservoir of technical ability which they command, and the financial resources which have been put at their disposal, to jump the Arab blockade and establish close and profitable relations farther afield. In the eyes of young nations which are looking for technical assistance and are jealous of their newly won independence, Israel has unique qualifications as a guide and mentor. In the very fields which most interest these nations—agriculture, irrigation, stock-breeding, and the development of light industries—the Israelis have proved their techniques by giving them practical and strikingly successful application within their own frontiers during the past twelve years; and they are hampered by no imperialist past and are too few to be suspected of colonial ambitions in the future. In this respect Israel again is unique, a small country which is itself only just climbing out of the stage of under-development, and which has practical and up-to-date experience of the same problems faced by all newly emergent countries, and is only too eager to share this experience with them.

Already this eagerness has prompted the dispatch of Israeli specialists in medicine, agriculture, and the management of co-operatives to a score of countries from South America to South-east Asia. Israeli experts helped to establish the Black Star shipping company in Ghana; the Government of Sierra Leone signed an agreement at the end of March with the Israeli company of Solel Boneh to set up a joint construction company there; 25 agriculturists from Uruguay have just arrived in Israel to study the techniques which have quadrupled the value of agricultural output in Israel since 1948; Israeli advisers who gained their experience in the co-operative villages of Israel are supervising there settlement of ex-soldiers in co-operative communities in up-country Burma—and the list of such technical assistance projects is growing every day.

—("The Guardian," 3/5/'60.)

[The Guardian article adds that, the services and experiences Israel employs are just what the Arab countries need, and will one day ask for—Is this not the Divine plan?]

* * *

Difficulties of Protestants in Spain

Continuing difficulties of Protestants in Spain in respect of worship, education, literature and the erection of places of worship were mentioned in a report to the Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church in Church House, Belfast.

It was pointed out, however, that there was a more tolerant attitude of the Spanish Press since the Pope's suggestion of an Eucumenical conference, and there had been some relaxation of the difficulties imposed on young Protestants wishing to be married.

Dr. A. A. Fulton, reporting on the Foreign Mission, spoke of the effects in India of the debate on Indian Church Union which had taken place in the Irish General Assembly last June.

It had seemed to imply not only disapproval of the union but also the likelihood of financial sanctions applied from Ireland.

The Irish Assembly should consider reassuring the Church in Gujarat and Kathiawar that the Home Church would respect its right to take her own decision on theological issues, and would continue to implement her financial commitments in India.

—("Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 15/4/'60.)

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

WHITE'S WAFFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	—	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	—	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	—	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	—	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	—	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	0	4
The Confessional	—	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3, 16).

THE widespread distribution of the Word of God is the main work of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which makes free grants of Scriptures, especially considering the needs of those who are unable to buy Scriptures, and to such liberal supplies are sent out free of cost. Many a needy missionary and other worker has had cause to praise God that by this means he has been enabled to fulfil our Lord's command to make disciples of all nations and to preach the Gospel, by giving the Word which is able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Founded 1831

(For the Circulation of Protestant and Uncorrupted Versions of the Word of God)

7 Bury Place, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.1.

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 7—LXIX.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	73
The Story of a Priest	74
Christian Unity and the Pope	75
Editor's Chair	78
The Notes in the Rheims—Douay Bible	80

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

"Religious freedom is for all"—Dr. Fulton—Demonic evils threatening the Christian Church

Discrimination against a man on religious grounds is as reprehensible in Dublin as in Delhi, is no worse in Bombay than in Belfast, said Dr. Austin A. Fulton, the new Moderator of the General Assembly, in his installation address at the opening of the Assembly in Belfast.

Dr. Fulton—"The Missionary Moderator"—said when a Christian was dismissed so that a Hindu might get his job, they could readily see the wrong that was done. When in a Roman Catholic country a Protestant was dismissed so that a Roman Catholic might get his job, they had no doubt about the wrong that was done.

It was no whit different should a Roman Catholic be deprived of the means of livelihood on religious grounds.

Dr. Fulton condemned I.R.A. terrorism, and expressed a wish that the conscience of all Irishmen could be effectively aroused concerning what he called this "fanatical travesty of patriotism."

He paid tribute to the mature restraint of the people of Northern Ireland in the face of sore provocation.

That was not to say that there might not be dangerous trends of thought released which might be understandable, but which they must oppose.

They had heard, for example, the amazing suggestion that civil and religious liberty means such for Protestants only.

This was as evil a suggestion as that freedom of religion in Roman Catholic countries should be for Roman Catholics only.

There could not be any monopoly of first-class humanity for some of the human race and a lesser degree of humanity imposed upon the rest.

Church Union

Dr. Fulton dealt mainly with the witness of the Church in Ireland and beyond, and commented on the "demoniacal evils threatening the Christian movement."

He said Church union was an urgent issue. A Church divided into competing and sometimes hostile camps, could not face her task.

Denominations by the score at home, by the century in America, and reaching a numerical millennium in Africa, imperilled the Christian movement.

The fault, he said, belonged to all, and he hoped the Church in North India would receive some assurance from the Assembly that they would not exert pressures to compel their theological or ecclesiastical decisions.

Dr. Fulton spoke of "the alarming tragedy of death on the roads," and said he welcomed the intention of the Minister of Home Affairs to tackle this matter energetically, and to arouse the conscience of the people.

Dr. Fulton said the Church's stewardship campaigns were both "thrilling and successful," but warned that a great danger accompanied their great opportunity.

If stewardship was merely a more efficient mode of congregational finance its spirit would run into the sand.

"It will provide organs and halls and equipment and mark the death of the spirit," he said.

By the promotions of congregational spending sprees the last state of the Church could be made worse than the first.

Stewardship as the realisation, on the other hand, that they owed all that they were and had to God, to be used for His Kingdom, could bring blessing and revival. Such a conception of stewardship meant giving away.

Missions

Dr. Fulton referred to the critical needs of Church extension and of missions at home and abroad. He then gave some comparative figures for missionary support.

The Christian Missionary Alliance churches, with 60,000 members, supported over 700 missionaries.

The Menonite Church, with 12,000 members, supported over 180 missionaries; 90 members per missionary in the one case, 84 in the second.

It took 2,250 members of the Irish Presbyterian Church to support one missionary. Stewardship must be viewed in the light of such figures, always remembering that the cheerful giver was beloved of the Lord.

—("Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 10/6/'60.)

* * *

Methodist President Says—Ounce of co-operation worth a ton of vague goodwill

The Northerner often fails to appreciate the position in certain Southern circuits, and the Southerner equally often fails to appreciate the position in some Northern circuits, the new President of the Methodist Church in Ireland, Rev. Robert W. McVeigh, Armagh, said recently.

Speaking at the opening of the annual conference of the Methodist Church in Dublin, Mr. McVeigh said there were those in Ireland who told them that their domestic policy was mistaken, or that they had policies at odds with one another, or that they had no policy at all.

Such criticisms should not be condemned out of hand. They were evidence of life and manifested an awareness of need and a refusal to stagnate in complacency.

"Our major difficulty is that we are not a Church fully and consciously facing our problem of evangelism in one particular situation," he said. "We are a Church united in essentials, but composed of members of very different outlooks in a divided country, facing the spiritual needs of people living in completely different political and religious environments.

Sympathy

"If our increases and decreases of membership were common to all parts of this country we might have vastly more sympathy with one another in mutual success and failure.

"But when our increases are largely confined to one area with its own religious and political atmosphere, and our decreases are largely identified with another area of a different kind, our major sympathies tend to go to the needs of the particular area in which we have lived for any length of time.

"To put it bluntly, the northerner often fails fully to appreciate the position in certain southern circuits, and the sense of discouragement felt in churches, now almost empty, that once teemed with activity, and the southerner equally often fails to appreciate the position in

—(Continued on p. 82.)

THE STORY OF A PRIEST.

The Revd. R. J. de la Sota.

The impression most of us have about Spain is that it is a land of acute religious intolerance. We cannot forget the deeds of the Spanish Inquisition which, from the Middle Ages to the time of Napoleon, controlled the religious life of the country. We read in well-authenticated books of the systematic periodic burnings of "heretics," the "autos-da-fe." These were recognised public spectacles and occurred with distressing frequency. It must have been very easy to incur the suspicion of heresy, and as the property of the heretic became the property of the Inquisitors or of the Church there was a very real temptation to press for conviction rather than acquittal.

In addition, Jews and Mohammedans were often compulsorily converted, and were carefully watched for signs of lapsing. During most of the Middle Ages the greater part of the Spanish peninsula was under Mohammedan rule, centred upon Granada. The Caliphate at Cordova had a glorious record of cultural achievement when the Christian nations of Europe were barbarian. In that epoch (the early Middle Ages) the Jews found greater freedom in Spain under the Moorish or Arab rulers than they did under Christians. As a consequence they prospered and grew numerous.

In the fifteenth century the resurgence of Christian Spain brought to an end the rule of Islam, and then persecution, torture and death became principles of government.

In the sixteenth century Spain rapidly rose to be a world-power through the remarkable conquest of Central and South America which gave it enormous resources. The acquisition of the Netherlands in Europe made Spain unusually powerful and its strength was devoted to putting an end to "heresy" in Europe.

Why did Spain pursue that policy of grim and unrelenting opposition to evangelical thought or other divergence from its official Creed? We can only suggest that its history of centuries of subjugation to Islam produced a deep determination to uphold a stiff orthodoxy. Also, its king in the middle of the sixteenth century appears to have been a gloomy and superstitious bigot. Philip II tried to destroy the Dutch Protestants and failed. He tried with his great Armada to destroy the English Protestants and failed. He was determined not to fail in his own Kingdom, so Christians suspected of evangelicalism, or Judaism or Mohammedanism (often on false allegations) found it hard to clear themselves or secure a release from the toils of the Inquisition.

The spirit of religious intolerance is still considered virtuous in Spain, and the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church there are probably more unyielding in their attitude to other forms of the Christian faith than their colleagues elsewhere.

It is therefore the more interesting to read of the recent conversion to the Church of England of the Revd. Rafael Jiminez de la Sota. He was in fact received into the Church of England in Canada by the Bishop of Huron last month.

How did this conversion come about? Some five years ago the Bishop of Huron was in Spain on holiday, and in Seville became acquainted with Fr. de la Sota. It may be assumed that an Anglican bishop visiting Spain and unacquainted with the Spanish language is unlikely to meet and become friendly with a Spanish priest of the Roman Catholic faith. But in this instance there was a curious circumstance—Fr. de la Sota was Secretary to Cardinal Segure of Seville, and had been instructed to learn what he could about the Church of England in order that the Cardinal might the more courteously entertain a distinguished visitor of that faith. Fr. de la Sota welcomed the happy coincidence that a Protestant bishop was in his city for the time being. With the help of an interpreter long discussions took place, and the new seeds of religious thought were planted in his mind. The enquiry became a personal one.

Naturally nothing happened immediately. Our source of information refers to "five years of difficult negotiations, flight into the mountains, and all kinds of hardships." What experiences of mind and spirit are involved in this we have no means of knowing, but we may be sure that there was sustaining power given, and increasing light and guidance.

In 1959 Fr. de la Sota arrived in Ontario and has now found a home in the Anglican Communion. He is now library assistant in Huron Theological College while perfecting his knowledge of English. When possible he will go to the United States to take up work in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

In the United States evangelical churches have been doing great things among Spanish-speaking peoples—both in the old Spanish areas of the South-Western States, and among new settlers from Spanish-speaking areas in the West Indies (Puerto Rico). The Revd. R. J. de la Sota is sure to find friendship, sympathy, and great opportunities in what is for him in many senses "the new world." Once more we note the special Providence at work in an individual life.

CHRISTIAN UNITY AND THE POPE.

Most Christians would like to see unity. It is an honourable ideal, and many of the obstacles to it are insignificant. But is it enough to call unity an ideal? Some will certainly tell us that it is an imperative duty, and that disunity is sinful. But the average person (that is, average Protestant person) who has grown up in an atmosphere of acceptance of disunity will not agree in confessing that it is a sin. Rather, he will think of separate communions and denominations as being traditional, and as meeting the needs of varied temperaments. Thus he will not be conscious of the problem of disunity at all.

Why do we say that most Christians would like to see unity? Because it seems right for professing Christians to be outwardly one when they have much basic agreement, and because it is economically sensible. Most evangelicals, i.e., Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists and such like may defend their special church order and system, but they know that eternal destiny does not depend on church order, and that spiritual and moral ruin arises from other causes than mistakes about church polity. Unity then, (or what we call "unity") may well be thought of by these men as the ultimate though minor step to line up Christians who are already of the same mind about fundamental matters.

Others may hold out for emotional reasons: they hesitate to abandon their inherited customs; and may even feel that to abandon what was attained in the past at some expense of sacrifice is disloyal and even a betrayal. A few may suffer from a worse condition—they may be proud and exclusive. Such people neither wish to add to their numbers nor to join a wider fellowship.

* * *

Then we have to reckon with the view, widely held, that we must look forward to unity as a thing to be planned and realised in the future through the providence of God. This means that the Church of Christ has not yet evolved into its final form, and its constituent elements are not yet co-ordinated. Many take for granted that this is the present position, and believe that reconciliations and adaptation will somehow be brought about. The result then will be the one church comprehending all the faithful.

Against this we must of course place the view of the Roman Catholic Church that it is the Church of the past, of the present, and of the future. It holds that no church can be brought into being by the union of existing communions, for all that can be done is that all separated and dissident Christians must return to the unity of Rome and submit to the spiritual authority of its Infallible Head.

There are no "churches"; only the one true church centred in Rome. The result is that Rome's conditions of unity are that we surrender our separate existences, reject the errors we have used to justify our separations, and return to "the Mother and Mistress of all Churches."

We have no reason to doubt the sincerity of Rome's attitude. That church's version of Christian history is the only version likely to be studied by any of its members, and in face of that version of history all the rest of us are in dangerous error. As individuals we may be excused on the ground of invincible ignorance, and may be considered parts of the soul of the church—we are not members of the Body as Rome defines it (not in Communion with the Pope), and our churches are mere nullities.

The Pope is considered to be Christ's Vicar here and now. As it is not disputed that if Christ Himself were on earth all who call themselves Christians would necessarily rally to Him, so it is assumed that we owe the same allegiance to the Vicegerent, the Roman Pontiff. The baptised (and a lay person or a heretic can validly baptise) are the Pope's subjects—the orthodox, the Protestants, and the lapsed are thought to have no spiritual freedom to choose their spiritual path and loyalty.

* * *

From the non-Roman parts of the Christian faith there has risen in our day "the World council of Churches." That Council, not being in any sense a Church or a super-Church, but a Council only, has often said that the Pope is welcome to join and that his Church has the right of entry. This has, we believe, been constantly misunderstood. It has been assumed by some who do not have anything to do with the Council that the Council's constituent Churches and its presidents are ready to surrender to Rome the moment the Pope takes the chair. But obviously Rome will not swallow the Modernism which is thought to be common in the Council, nor the Communism which is also thought to be there, nor the Protestantism which must be the strongest influence in the Council and the decisive element. What then is the meaning of the open door for Rome? Is it not plain that while the Council keeps the door open, Rome can itself enter only when it has divested itself of its present distinguishing features and given up its characteristic claims? That is perfectly well understood by the Council and by its spokesmen. We need not be indiscriminating admirers of that Council in order to appreciate the significance of that "open door."

A common conjecture has been that the World Council is seeking to set up a World Church of a Protestant kind vis-à-vis Rome. We do not possess enough information to say how far this represents any real tendency in the Council, and we suppose that such a very mixed assembly must at times be a little mixed-up. But we are told that there is little prospect of that sort of development. The development which we of course desire to see is a development into firm positive earnest evangelical faith. We believe that Christianity can only survive in virtue of its solid loyalty to the Gospel. If that is allowed to be secondary to organisation and ecclesiastical power-politics then the whole usefulness of the Council will disappear. We believe that Christian history shows that Christian institutions which have outlived or outgrown their usefulness can be more harmful than secular ones which have lost their significance.

* * *

Most people know that the present Pope, John XXIII, shows a deep interest in the problem of Christian unity. He is to hold an ecumenical (i.e., universal) Council of his Church in the fairly near future to consider ways to unity. His understanding of the problem and ours must be radically different. He urges the Orthodox Eastern Churches (Greece, Constantinople, Antioch, Cyprus, Alexandria, etc.) to return to communion with Rome, a communion which once existed, and which, for a variety of causes, secular as well as religious, gradually ceased in the Middle Ages. Rome does not condemn the Easterns as heretics but as schismatics, and recognises the validity of their orders and Sacraments.

The position is naturally different when Protestants are brought forward—Rome cannot invite Protestant bishops (Anglican) to a Council of Bishops because in her view there are no such persons. They cannot represent churches for Rome says that there is no such thing as a Protestant "Church." Still less can Rome take notice of Presbyterians, Lutherans, etc. A year or so ago we drew attention to the absurdity of Protestants being all agog over the proposed ecumenical Council, for it does not and cannot, include them in the picture. All that can be done is to send them a renewed invitation to repentance and return.

* * *

We see, as yet, little ground for expecting the leaders of Orthodox Churches to accept the Papal headship and infallibility. Probably the powerful Russian Orthodox Church, powerful in spite of its uneasy status in U.S.S.R., has more influence in Eastern Orthodoxy than we hear of; and Moscow will not be likely to welcome an extension of Rome's influence beyond the Adriatic. Nevertheless, the Council might do much positive good for its own Church. It might inaugurate a movement of reform by which many exuberant devotions would be controlled. It might increase the use of vernacular languages in its worship and make the liturgy more like the primitive models. It might try to foster unhampered reading of God's Word. It might replace much of the scholastic theology and philosophy by more relevant and contemporary programmes. Above all, it might take steps to secure religious liberty and freedom of conscience for everybody.

* * *

It is undoubtedly true that Pope John XXIII has shown a disposition towards Evangelicals which is far in advance of anything we are aware of among his predecessors. He has urged "greater understanding for those of our brethren who are carrying Christ's name in their hearts and on their foreheads, although they are separated from the Catholic Church." Here at last is the desire to understand and to recognise as fellow Christians those who heretofore were viewed with suspicion and animus. Let these words be heard above all other sounds in Spain and Columbia!

"We must go to work with all the goodwill at our command," the Pope went on, "overcoming our old view-points and prejudices and laying aside our less courteous expressions so as to create the proper climate for the homecoming we hope for and to second by every means in our power the workings of grace. In this way the gates of the unity of the Church will open before us."

We believe that this was said with the utmost sincerity. No Christian will think otherwise.

We live in a world of many conflicts, and the Western nations now embracing the most of the traditionally Christian peoples, Protestant and Roman Catholic, must avoid treading on each others' susceptibilities. In particular, the prospects of Roman Catholicism in the English-speaking world must be influenced by the practices of Roman Catholicism in the Latin World of South America and Southern Europe. Let Roman Catholic Church leaders harry and persecute Evangelicals in South America and the repercussions in the Protestant United States (especially in view of a Roman Catholic presidential candidate) may be very serious. It is time to recommend acts of genuine goodwill as first-fruits of a change of attitude and of heart.

* * *

But it still must be emphasised that unity is the problem. If Protestants hold open a door Rome can only reach a decision to enter by changing a great deal—some will say by changing its very nature. If Rome holds open a door to Protestants they can only enter by accepting profound doctrinal changes for themselves. Can such a change take place in us? Can we accept as truth what we and our forefathers have declared to be error? Can we bring ourselves to confess that we were wrong to believe that we are justified by faith? Can we undergo such a transformation as to say that the men we honoured as martyrs for the cause of God and truth were but obstinate fools?

Rome will not say to us "Come now, let us reason together." With all the goodwill in the world (and we truly welcome every expression of goodwill) Rome cannot accept us on our terms: only on its own.

We may put from us all thought of doctrinal unity with Rome. We cannot acquiesce in what we believe to be error. No reformed Church (whatever individuals may do) is going to appear in penitential robes at the gates of Rome as Emperor Henry did at Canossa. Every reformed church ought to pray that Rome may move in the path of reform, and discover the realities of Christian fellowship "in the bonds of the Gospel." We don't need to scold each other, and we don't thrive by merely apathetic acceptance of our differences. Rome has many agencies in Ireland and elsewhere to persuade the Protestant to conform: ought we not to pray and learn so that Protestants may give the best of all reasons for the faith within them, and by word and deed show the love of Christ and His welcome to all who seek salvation.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"UNDERSTANDEST THOU WHAT THOU READEST?"

This is a question many put to themselves and to others—"do you understand what you are reading"? Two simple facts contribute towards the answer which obviously cannot be a decisive yes or no. They are 1. persevering in reading is itself evidence of some grasp of the subject, 2. understanding even though not complete may be very valuable as far as it goes.

Our question is from Acts 8, 30—Philip the deacon put the point to the Ethiopian official. The man was reading Isaiah 53, and he said to Philip "About whom does the prophet say this, about himself or about someone else."? It was "about someone else." We know that, thank God, and the Ethiopian knew it when Philip explained.

A moment before, the Ethiopian had said "How can I, unless someone guides me."? That was a confession of inability on that one point, and it has been quoted from time to time as a condemnation of Protestant presumption in thinking that private Bible study is no harm, and that the meaning of God's Word can be found unaided.

Can this simple and beautiful episode, so spontaneous and yet so filled with the power of the Spirit of God, be used to establish the necessity of an official guide in the understanding of the Bible?

No doubt many of our readers are aware of the Roman Catholic declaration that we need an explained and interpreted Bible. It is an old declaration, and we find it very strongly maintained at the time of the Reformation. At that time the work of Bible translators, Erasmus, Tyndale, Coverdale, Luther, etc., had reached such dimensions that it was no longer possible to control the access of lay people to God's Word. It could not be suppressed by the mere cry that these versions were heretical. That cry which had driven the Lollard or Wyclif Bible underground would not work any more. The new cry was that the Bible needed official notes to guard the reader from error and false reasoning. We have some details on other pages in Archdeacon Hammond's article which show us what sixteenth-century (and later) men thought advisable to guide the laity in reading the words of the God of love.

Now how far right are the people who use the episode of Philip and the Ethiopian to justify control of Bible reading? If we meet some good young Roman Catholic man who quite earnestly believes it wrong to have a Bible without notes (and of course in an unauthorised translation) and he quotes to us the words "How can I unless someone guides me," what are we to answer?

First, let us answer that the Ethiopian was reading from the Hebrew Scriptures (probably in a Greek translation), from what we call now "the Old Testament." There was at that day no New Testament to give the divinely intended interpretation of the Old Testament, and especially, to unveil the Cross as the meaning of Isaiah 53. Christians now have the written guidance which their predecessors in the days of Philip had not. Hence, the Ethiopian's question has long been met by God's provision of a key to the Old Testament (i.e., the New).

* * *

Secondly, if there had been a New Testament in Philip's rucksack we may be sure he would have fetched it out and used it as the source of interpretation. Once the New Testament was available the Christian reader had all necessary truth in his hand. We may not at the moment digress into a study of the authority of the Church in confirming the New Testament—that is another matter for another day. But even if we did agree that the Church of the third or fourth century gave the New Testament Canon its authorisation, we could not deny that in so doing the Church gave men God's Word and did not issue editions with official notes!

* * *

If we are challenged with the enquiry—Where do you get your interpretation of the Bible? Our answer is that we accept the customary and traditional interpretation which has always been the Christian explanation. It need not be assumed at this point that we have admitted Rome's claims, because there was from the beginning an accepted body of Christian truth and understanding, long before there was any distinctive interpretation of a Roman Catholic character, and that ancient traditional understanding and exposition is itself an answer to Rome because it contains none of the later accretions to the faith which we recognise as peculiar to the Church of the Council of Trent and more recent centuries.

* * *

The customary understanding may fairly be called "evangelical," and in accepting this evangelical understanding we may confidently hold that Christians have had with them the fulfilment of Christ's promise that the abiding Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, would guide us into all truth.

The Holy Spirit, not a human Infallibility, is the guide the Church looked for, and found.

* * *

Holy Scripture is largely self-interpreting, and we are seldom sufficiently grateful to the learned and laborious men of the past who provided our Bibles with ample references. Some editions are more detailed than others, but with the reference edition of the Revised Version in English (or similar versions) it is possible to demonstrate pretty conclusively the truth of what we have just written, that the Bible is largely self-interpreting.

If we consider along with this the further fact that the major truths of our Redemption are set out plainly enough, and repeated often enough, and that Our Lord's Words were intended to be understood by unlearned and ignorant men we need not hesitate to say that the Bible is able to get its meaning across, as far as need be, to simple as well as learned men.

* * *

Our young Roman Catholic friend may at this point gently remind us of the confusions of Protestantism. These he must believe to be the result of having no official guide.

We admit that it is a most unfortunate thing that the old and respectable word "Protestant" (which meant orthodox anti-Papal Christianity) is now a sort of religious umbrella under which many strange sects shelter. Orthodox evangelical churches do not wish to be herded together with Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, Christadelphians, Seventh-Day Adventists, Christian Scientists, etc.—all of them American, under the common title. We must admit the confusions, and draw a distinction—we are not answerable for other people's wanderings from the right path. Our responsibility to God is to follow His Word as our Rule of Faith—we profess the ancient faith of Christendom, the faith enshrined in God's Word, and we hold it in common with all who are recognisably evangelical. We have, naturally, our varying points of view, but we do not disagree upon the truths essential to salvation.

* * *

Our friend may then take a step further and refer to our errors. The answer is that we profess and admit no errors. Our Roman Catholic friend believes all the Christian doctrines we believe. Of course he believes other things as well, and that is where we are bound to point out his errors, and that they are more serious than ours. Evangelical Protestants believe no doctrines which were not believed in the days of the Apostles and fathers: can our Roman Catholic friend say that about his faith?

If he were to consult one of his clergymen on this point we imagine he would be told that the answer is that the Apostles and fathers believed what the Modern Roman Catholic believes, because they had "implicit faith"—i.e., if these things had been defined in their day and set before them, they would have accepted them. This reminds us of a passage we read in one of Cardinal Newman's books (written years after he had become a Roman Catholic)—Newman repudiated with great vigour the suggestion that in Holy Communion the faithful receive the flesh of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Just a hundred years after the publication of Newman's book we read an article in one of the Roman Catholic theological journals (with the official imprimatur) in which the writer took the view which Newman had so vigorously condemned. On this point no one can say that Newman had "implicit faith."

* * *

It seems to us that the best lesson we can learn from the Ethiopian is to copy his example, and read the Bible with diligence. The Spirit will lead us, as He did him, to the passages which speak most to our hearts, and lives, and destiny.

THE NOTES IN THE RHEIMS-DOUAY BIBLE

Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, Th.D.

[Modern editions of Bp. Challoner's version of the Douay Bible contain the old Douay Notes in a very modified form, and Mgr. Knox's New Testament has notes of a quite different character. The old Douay Notes have an official sanction and with them Dr. Hammond is concerned in this article. It is a valuable comment on the suggestion we note elsewhere that Protestants and Roman Catholics should have a common version of the English Bible.—Ed.]

An Address by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A., Th.D.,

The Object of the Notes

The first question we ask ourselves is, "What is the object of the Notes in the Douay Bible?" In Protestant versions of the Scriptures where Notes are appended they give us the private opinion of the commentator for our guidance and instruction, but they do not bind us in any way. However, according to the sentiments of Pope Pius XI in a Preface that he wrote to an Italian version of the Scriptures published by Martini at the end of the 18th century, the Notes in the Douay Bible are intended to guard the reader from any dangerous errors. The Words the Pope used, as reproduced in the translation in the Bible of 1791, were, "Especially when you show and set forth that you have added explanatory notes which being extracted from the Holy Fathers preclude every possible danger of abuse." That is the subject of the Notes in the Douay Bible. It is expressly stated by the Pope.

* * *

It is rather remarkable, however, that the very edition that Pope Pius VI sanctioned, the Edition of Martini in the Italian language, was placed on the index of prohibited books by his successor, Pope Pius VII. But we are not dealing with that at the present moment. What is our concern is that any Roman Catholic reading this rescript of the Pope would say to himself, "When I study the books of the sacred Scripture and am guided in my interpretation by the Notes that have been appended, seeing that the Book contains in the beginning the approbation of a bishop or bishops, and that the Pope himself has told us that the object of the Notes is to preclude every possible danger of error, I can be perfectly satisfied that I am following the dictates of the Holy Roman and Catholic and Apostolic Church, and that the Bible will prove a source of profit to me."

* * *

Unfortunately the individual who is thus confident has been misled by illusory promises. That is a very startling statement to make, and the general public should be made aware, it seems to me, of the serious consequences that result from bold assertions of this kind that have really no foundation. Now the Notes, to which I am directing attention, are the Notes that were originally appended to the editions of the Douay and Rhemish versions of the Scriptures that were published by the authority of Gregory Martin. (It is said that Gregory Martin spent so much time and labour in the translation of the Scriptures that he fell into a consumption from which he subsequently died). These editions were circulated with a view to correcting the false teaching, that, in the judgment of Dr. Gregory Martin and others, prevailed at the time. No doubt many of the Notes exhibit the virulence and bitterness of acute controversy, and we may, to some extent, pardon the original translators and the original annotators. Some of them were men who had suffered persecution for their religion, and we know the old proverb that persecution driveth even the sane mad.

An Irish Edition

But the interesting fact that gives rise to what I call "The Scandal of the Douay Notes" emerged at the beginning of the 19th century. A Roman Catholic bookseller in Cork named Macnamara conceived the brilliant idea that he would make valuable profit and also possibly assist his fellow Roman Catholics by publishing in full these Notes, in a version that would have the approval of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland. Macnamara was a very enterprising man, and when he entered on his campaign he determined that he would give it all the publicity that he possibly could. And therefore he published rather flamboyant advertisements in many quarters announcing the tremendous value that would accrue from this new enterprise of his. Macnamara claimed that he had the support of His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. O'Reilly, Lord Primate of All Ireland; His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Troy, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin; His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Roman Catholic Coadjutor Archbishop of Dublin, and President of the Royal Catholic College of St. Patrick at Maynooth, to which were added six other bishops and three dignatories and nearly 300 Roman Catholic clergymen in different parts of Ireland. He claimed that the reader of this particular edition of the Scriptures would be in possession of the most copious Notes issued by the eminent authorities of the Roman Catholic Church, and sanctioned by the famous University of Louvain. Now that was an imposing appeal to the general public; the aim was that the book should be published in fortnightly parts at 1/8 each, and 2,500 copies were struck off for the benefit of subscribers, and 500 left to the publishers, or rather, I should say, to the printer, Mr. James Cumming, who happened to be a Presbyterian.

* * *

Now the issue that I have mentioned might have circulated without any further comment were it not for the unfortunate fact that Macnamara was declared bankrupt in the year 1814. At that time the edition had gone up to the end of the Epistle to the Romans—a rather curious coincidence that the disaster should have occurred just at that particular spot. However, Mr. Cumming found himself in possession of 500 copies of the Scripture which, of course, were of no particular value because they were only a portion of the whole volume. He determined to retrieve his loss, and got into connection with Mr. Coyne, publisher to the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth. Coyne refused to have anything to do with the edition unless the censor who had already been appointed, the Rev. P. A. Walsh, a Roman Catholic priest in Dublin, would be retained, and thus the approval of Dr. Troy secured. Mr. Cumming secured these particular advantages and the Bible was completed. But Mr. Cumming, being an enterprising Presbyterian and probably a Scotsman, thought that he would go further than the original design, and so he placed the book on the open market through the firm of Keating in London. As a consequence the document fell into the hands of a cautious Protestant critic, who is identified by Dr. Cotton as Dean Arthur Kenny, of Achonry. Under the pseudonym of: "Fabricius," Dean Kenny published some very severe strictures upon the Notes contained in this edition of the Scriptures. He pointed out that they described Protestants as heretics and as no more worthy of consideration than thieves and murderers or other malefactors. And he asked the pertinent question: "Are you going to give political power to people who entertain these opinions concerning you?" (At the time, as my readers well know, the question of Roman Catholic emancipation was strongly before the public).

The Scandal

Now emerges the scandal. Dr. Troy was roused to indignation at these attacks upon the Bible, and instead of saying, as one would have expected him to say, that he believed he was justified in issuing these statements, however offensive they might be, he took the extraordinary line of repudiating the whole edition that was published with his name and the sanction of his authority. He probably was induced to take this action by the strong denunciation of the famous Irish leader, Daniel O'Connell, who said he owed it to his duty as a Catholic, and as a Christian, to denounce the execrable notes in the edition that was published. Here was a strange statement. Dr. Troy, who had given his name to it, now said that, having for the first time read the Notes, he rejected them as harsh and irritating in expression, and many of them containing doctrine which the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ireland had already repudiated on oath. Now that reflected very seriously on the character of Mr. Coyne, the publisher, and he refused to lie under the stigma. He published a letter in the Freeman's Journal drawing Dr. Troy's attention to the fact that he had agreed with him to nominate the Rev. P. A. Walsh as censor, and that he had given his approbation to the edition in question. Dr. Troy never succeeded in clearing his name from this particular reflection upon him.

* * *

But the point that presses upon our attention is this: Here was a body of Notes circulating in a Bible, claiming to guard the faithful against all error, and they were denounced by eminent Roman Catholic leaders as execrable and unworthy. Yet, strange to say, one of these objectionable Notes which were excised from the edition by Dr. Murray, to whom reference has already been made, appeared in an edition sanctioned by Archbishop Walsh in quite recent years. Archbishop Walsh, of Dublin, allowed the statement to circulate, "Here is the power given to leaders in the Old Testament period, punishing with death those who proudly refused to accept their decision," and here in the late 19th century the claim is made, on the authority of a note of a Douay Bible, that heretics can be put to death by the command of those who are appointed as the religious leaders of the people.

* * *

It is incidents like these that create the idea of scandal, at least in the mind of Protestants. The remarkable fact is that the edition of 1816, being disclaimed by Dr. Troy, the alleged supporter of it, of course fell into disuse and was withdrawn, but a second edition of the same Bible, under the authority of Macnamara again, who was rehabilitated, appeared in 1818 with the same objectionable Notes. What are we to think of a Church which offers as a guide to its people Notes that are declared afterwards by Dr. Doyle, a distinguished Roman Catholic Bishop, to have no weight?

* * *

What are we to think of the authority attaching to Notes that Dr. Geddes, a Roman Catholic priest, described as "manifestly calculated to support a system, not of genuine Catholicity, but of transalpine Popery" (Address to the Public, 1793)? And what degree of confusion must be created in the mind of a Roman Catholic who finds that Notes which were thus condemned by eminent Roman Catholic bishops and laymen, found encouragement at the hands of the celebrated Dr. Milner, Vicar-Apostolic, in England, who commented on Daniel O'Connell's outburst, declaring we ought to blush for the frenzy of priests who contaminated the sacred Word of God by their atrocious interpretations, by writing in the London and Dublin Orthodox Journal as follows: "But who are the frenzied priests, and what are the atrocious interpretations? . . . they have been the textbook of Catholics for two centuries, and a half, and is it to be for one moment supposed that their learned and elaborate work would have been allowed to circulate, without condemnation by the proper authorities if the exposition of the sacred and mysterious Word had been other than sound and orthodox?" Dr. Troy, a Roman Catholic Archbishop, avowed that the Notes countenanced opinions and doctrines which he had disclaimed on oath. Dr. Milner says they are truly described as "The eloquent copious and instructive Notes or Annotations." Could difference be more marked? Yet they are differences within the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church.

—("Evangelical Action," Australia).

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 74.

some northern circuits where possibilities of advance are constantly being lost because of the lack of more men and money."

On the task of the Church, Mr. McVeigh said there was at least one useful field of missionary endeavour that could be more actively explored at the present time if only they could capture the imagination of their people and make far greater resources available to their home mission department—the field of colportage.

Possibilities

There had been some striking results of colportage work in Ireland through the years and there could be many more.

At present an effective answer needed to be given to at least one sect which was particularly zealous in this work, whose teaching was a travesty of the Christian Gospel.

If full-time workers still remained scarce there were two possibilities that might well be examined—the recruiting of young people in their colleges and universities who were interested in worth-while employment during the vacation periods, and closer co-operation with sister churches in this effort.

Many pagan homes of the North needed this ministry of personal contact just as much as homes in the South.

"Pre-Occupation"

Speaking of the "tragedy of pre-occupation with our own affairs," which was common to other churches, Mr. McVeigh said no one believed that church union would automatically solve all their problems in Christian enterprise, but he was sure that the very fact of union itself would add immensely to the weight of Christian appeal in the world.

In some ways the Protestant communities in Ireland had been drawing closer during recent years. A measure of grace, assisted by a certain degree of economic pressure, had made possible the unification in worship of some Presbyterian and Methodist congregations—in places as far apart and dissimilar as Belfast and Sligo—with a consequent widening of local understanding and saving of manpower and money.

An ounce of this kind of thing was worth a ton of vague goodwill which could never impress a world now largely ignoring the Christian way.

The tragedy was they were all preoccupied and had severally become so immersed in their own denominational affairs that they had little time or thought for unification with others.

—("Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 10/6/'60.)

Archbishop seeks Orthodox Unity

Patriarch Athenagoras has made a month-long tour of the Middle-East in an exploration of the possibility of uniting the five autonomous Orthodox churches. The patriarch, who is archbishop of Constantinople and ecumenical patriarch of the entire Orthodox Church, conferred with leaders of the Maronite, the Assyrian, the Armenian churches. He has not yet, as far as we know, approached Russian Orthodox leaders. One estimate sets the total population of Orthodox persuasion as 320 million. Archbishop Athenagoras is sounding out the leaders of various bodies on the possibility of a formal meeting to be held on the island of Rhodes, possibly in 1960. The effort to solve differences between the different branches of the Eastern church received substantial encouragement last August at the meeting of the central committee of the World Council of Churches, which also met in Rhodes. Success in the enterprise would immensely encourage the entire ecumenical movement. Even the news that it is being actively attempted is welcome.

* * *

General Synod of the Church of Ireland— Missionary Council

The Bishop of Meath introduced the report of the Missionary Council, and he dealt principally with financial matters and warmly applauded an increase of nearly £1,000 in the giving of the Dioceses of Connor and of Down and Dromore. The Bishop urged that in the new impetus of planned giving the missionary work of the Church must not be left out. The time is short and we must do what we can while the doors are still open. Already the University Mission to Fukien is debarred from China and has become the Far Eastern Mission. Commander Herdman, of Derry, seconding, made special reference to Koinonia House and said that the work and money spent overseas is largely wasted if immigrants from those countries are not welcomed and offered Christian fellowship in our own country, a sentiment echoed by Dr. S. McCann, of Belfast. Major Richard Garratt, who gives generous and untiring service to the missionary cause and is Belfast Secretary of S.P.G., made an impassioned plea for prayer, saying that the Church is fighting the battle in the missionary sphere with one hand tied behind its back because of lack of recruits.

The Dean of Waterford proposed the Report of the Temperance and Social Welfare Society and hoped that it would go out from the House that, as a people anxious to take a responsible part in the life of the country, they deplored the inadequacy of the penalties for drunken driving. Indeed, the Dean said that every such driver should be put behind bars, but the members were so serious in their support for this sentiment that they failed to see its humorous side. The Rev. John Mercer of Connor thought that Christians should be careful not only of their conduct but also of their influence in the matter of intoxicants, and went on vehemently to deplore the content and impact of many TV programmes, a sentiment with which the House by its applause was obviously in wholehearted agreement. On the report of the Moral Welfare Association the Rev. F. Gowing, of Armagh, in a forthright speech, attacked the present moral laxity, often portrayed in deplorable television programmes, and said that sexual impurity must be shown up for what it was, namely sin. Dr. S. McCann, speaking as a medical practitioner, supported him and asserted that the Church must do more in the realm of sex education.

* * *

Old Catholic Bishops assist at Anglican Consecration

The Archbishop of Utrecht and Bishop of Deventer (Holland) took part in Westminster Abbey at the consecration of three Anglican bishops.

A reception was given at Lambeth Palace on the occasion of the visit of these two Old Catholic bishops. The Archbishop of Canterbury emphasised the great significance of full communion between the two Communions.

The Archbishop of Utrecht stated that the participation in the consecration did not aim at adding or improving the Anglican consecration but was the natural outcome of the mutual recognition of the Catholicism of both Communions and the strengthening of the faith that both Communions wished to express. (From the Society of St. Willibrord.)

* * *

The "Winds of Change"

It is reported that the Pope, as part of the preparation for the forthcoming Council, has recommended Roman Catholics to have a great understanding for "those brothers of ours who, though bearing the name of Christ on their brows and in their hearts, are separated from the Catholic Church."

It was necessary, the Pope continued, to overcome old mental attitudes, prejudices and expressions lacking in courtesy, in order to create a climate favourable to their wished-for return and to assist, in every way, the working of grace.

This change of policy, it is hoped, will bring some relief to the people who are at present being persecuted for their religious beliefs in Spain, Columbia and elsewhere.

It is a change to be welcomed. The late Rt. Rev. W. S. Kerr, in his Handbook on the Papacy refers to religious persecution and states "for centuries it was the practice of the Church of Rome, and the infliction of the death penalty has been promulgated as its official teaching even in this present century.

* * *

A Unified Bible?

The suggestion put forward last autumn in "America," a national Roman Catholic weekly in the U.S.A., by Father W. M. Abbott, S.J., that Roman Catholics and Protestants should join in the preparation of a common English translation of the Bible, has already received wide publicity all over the world.

The article says that prominent R.C. and Protestant Biblical scholars are in favour of a unified Bible as indispensable if Christian unity is ultimately to be achieved. It cites especially an endorsement by two Protestant scholars—Dr. Robert M. Grant, Professor of New Testament of the Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago, and President of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis; and Dr. J. Coert Tylaarsdam, another member of the Federated Theological Faculty.

In a joint statement reported in the article, these two scholars are quoted as saying that the ecumenical significance of a generally accepted English version of the Bible would be "hard to overestimate". They said a common translation could "exercise a unifying influence theologically and become a tremendous cultural force."

[This sounds good, but is the Church of Rome going to abandon the "notes" which, it has always said, must be attached to a translated Bible? If not, are the Protestants to accept Rome's notes without demur? The proposal will come to nothing].

* * *

Eire Presbyterians' Devotion Praised

The outgoing Moderator of the General Assembly, Dr. T. A. B. Smyth, paid tribute to Eire Presbyterians for their devotion to the Church when he gave his closing address.

Dr. Smyth told of one place where only two members—sisters—remained.

They were still to be found on Sunday in church, singing their hymns, reading the Bible and praying together.

Dr. Smyth said that having seen the Presbyterian Church throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, he had a feeling of hope. He had been encouraged to see evidence of a new spirit of interest and devotion in most congregations.

In the Northern part of the country, practically without exception, there was a marked increase in church attendance. Where evening attendances had declined morning attendances in most cases had risen.

He had had evidence of a revival of good taste in church architecture.

But while there was much to encourage, there were signs of complacency that could spell danger.

When he considered that a church which could spend £282,000 on local building improvement in one year, had only £17,000 for church extension, that suggested they did not see in right proportions their responsibility for maintaining the witness of their Church in Ireland.

If the congregations would give one-tenth of what they spent on their own property it would go a long way towards solving the serious problem and ensure that in new areas people would not be left to drift from the Church.

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	—	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	—	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	—	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	—	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

TO LET

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 8.—LXIX.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	85
The Sacrament of the Altar	88
Editor's Chair	90
Charles Simeon	91

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

'Sectarianism is an evil Thing'—Time it was Dead—Minister

An Appeal to Protestant Churches to end sectarian differences has been made by Rev. R. E. Ker, President of the Methodist Conference.

Speaking at the opening of a combined Methodist - Presbyterian church at Lower Braniel, Belfast, he said there was no longer any place for the sort of denominational rivalry they had in the past.

"Sectarianism is not yet dead, and it is high time it was. It divides Christ's disciples, and that is why it is an evil thing."

Mr. Ker said that at the new church, which will be known as Braniel Church, it was encouraging to see Methodists and Presbyterians working in collaboration instead of competition.

The Methodists, who had always tried to be friends of all and enemies of none, were particularly glad that the two churches had got together in this project.

Mr. Ker, who extended good wishes on behalf of the Methodist Church, dedicated the church.

Dr. T. A. B. Smyth, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, said the new church gave them all hope for the future. It marked another stage in the experiment which the two churches were carrying out. They had had very happy co-operation here, at Taughmonagh—the first combined church in Belfast—and in the West of Ireland.

"This does not mean the absorption of one church by the other. Presbyterians will continue to be Presbyterians and Methodists will still be Methodists."

Local Goodwill

"Behind this experiment is the goodwill of the local people without which the unity would not have been possible."

This new church, set on a hillside, was a symbol of Christianity on the offensive.

* * *

Lapsing Latin America

The Roman Catholic Church is losing ground fast among its 168 million members in Latin America—close to one-third of all the Catholics in the world. This is the considered opinion of a Belgian Jesuit sociologist who has spent the last three years in Chile, is now director of the School of Sociology of Chile's Catholic Pontifical University. The Church's difficulties, says the Rev. Roger E. Vekemans in the weekly Ave Maria, began in the 19th century after the Latin American countries achieved independence from Spain and Portugal and thus were thrown open to such influences as Protestantism, spiritism, and plain materialism.

The materialism of modern technological civilisation has been especially serious in Latin America because of the nature of Spanish Catholicism. "Traditionally, Spanish Catholicism has been highly spiritual, almost mystic. It has never been, as we could put it, an 'Incarnation Catholicism' It has never been very concerned with man's life in this world." The greatest danger to the church is not from Communism, Protestantism or spiritism as such, but from a Catholicism that is notably "weak in confronting modern progress. Since Hispanic Catholicism doesn't seem to be able to make the continent suitable for normal human life, and since, despite the papal encyclicals, the social situation in Latin America is one of the worst in the world, it is quite obvious that the people of Latin America look for other solutions." One of the solutions, particularly for the "lower, lower class" is rapidly growing Protestantism (there are some 5,000,000 Protestants in Latin America today).

What can the Catholic church do about the situation? First of all, more priests are needed. "We have 30,000 priests in Latin America for some 180-million people. To have here a sound proportion between priests and Catholic people (about one priest for 600 Catholics) as we have it almost all over the States and in many countries of Europe, we would need 200,000 more priests in Latin America."

Meanwhile, the population is rising faster and faster. Within 40 years, "if the Church loses Latin America, she loses one-half of her world-wide population. And that could be a crisis within the church even more serious than the oriental schism or the Protestant Reformation." To get more priests, says Fr. Vekemans, there must be "a big movement of the Catholic countries towards Latin America. In other words, we have to see Latin America as a real mission territory—the mission territory of our century."

—("The Vigilant," 14/2/'60.)

* * *

The National University and University College Dublin

[University College Dublin a constituent College of the National University of Ireland is the largest and youngest of the three Colleges which form the University. It has been of late a storm centre though critics of its policy have often been unfair to its administration. Cork and Galway are the former Queen's Colleges, once parts of the Queen's University of Ireland, while University College Dublin claims to represent "the Catholic University" set up about a century ago with Dr. J. H. Newman (late Cardinal) as its first Rector.

The excerpt attached is interesting.]

Cork and Galway "Jealous"

University College, Dublin, has between three thousand and four thousand students and is by far the largest constituent college of the National University. The sister colleges of Galway and Cork have always been a little jealous of Dublin which, it is felt, by virtue of its size and of its favoured situation in the capital, tends to wag the whole university.

It is suggested that U.C.D.'s ultimate ambition is to attain to the status of a separate and independent university—possibly to become the true Catholic University of Ireland which is desired by, among others, the Archbishop of Dublin. In this confusion of plans and ambitions there is some danger of losing sight of the need for much closer co-operation and pooling of resources between U.C.D. and the much older but smaller foundation, Trinity College.

Some of these disagreements were drawn together in motions passed at Convocation. There was unanimous support for a motion which noted reports that architects had been appointed to design science buildings for the new college site at Belfield, hoped that they were unfounded, and stressed the desirability of having open architectural competitions for all stages of the project.

—("The Guardian," 7/6/'60.)

* * *

Ireland's Welfare Best Served by North—South Co-operation

"Ireland is the people of Ireland, and the welfare of Ireland means the welfare of its people," stated Mr. Garrett Fitzgerald, Dublin, a barrister and political commentator on economic affairs, when he addressed a meeting in Belfast under the auspices of "National Unity."

Mr. Fitzgerald said it was now clear that the welfare of the people of this country would best be served by co-operation between North and South within the framework of a broader co-operation between Ireland and Britain. That was the policy of the Irish Government to-day and, indeed, of the Opposition parties in the Dail to-day, he said.

Mr. Fitzgerald referred to the revolution in economic thinking that had taken place at every level in society, and stated that all the old nationalistic clichés were dead or dying. It was on a solid foundation of economic realism, of acceptance of modern conditions and of the world around them that this revival was based.

Where did this leave the Partition question? he asked.

It was clear, he thought, that the South had begun to think more clearly about this issue and to reject past errors of tactics and of manners. A straw in the wind had been the recent decision to refer to Northern Ireland by its proper name. He had never understood how the cause of ending Partition was supposed to be served by inventing this anonymous title—the Six Counties—for a part of their country which should surely never be referred to as other than a part of Ireland—Northern Ireland.

Deeper Change

This change of nomenclature said Mr. Fitzgerald, was, however, merely a symptom of a deeper change in attitude—a change which reflected the growing conviction that the way to unity was through friendship rather than enmity, through co-operation rather than mutual abuse.

Mr. Fitzgerald said that Mr. Lemass had also indicated that this was the policy of the British Government, as indeed one might expect. It was a policy which must also commend itself not merely to the Nationalist minority in Northern Ireland, but also to a substantial section of the Unionist majority, men of good will and good faith.

No doubt, he said, this policy of co-operation could be temporarily frustrated, against the wishes of all concerned by the Northern Government, but no one could believe that this obstacle to an enlightened policy was other than a temporary one.

Mr. Fitzgerald, referring to concrete ways in which co-operation between the two parts of Ireland might prove mutually beneficial, said the two areas could usefully co-operate in the promotion of tourism and of industrial development.

To the tourist from outside Ireland there was only "Ireland" the distinction between the Republic and the North, he said, was no more than a picturesque anomaly, for the people and the scenery on both sides of the Border were equally charming.

And in the field of industrial promotion, there was surely also room for co-operation. For the North could benefit from the successful campaign being waged by the Industrial Development Authority on the Continent of Europe, and the Republic could equally benefit from the efforts made by the Northern Ireland Development Council in Britain. The two campaigns were, in fact, complementary.

Joint Shipping

There was also room for co-operation in transport, he said. Both North and South suffered from the operation of a shipping cartel that had successfully prevented the establishment of modern ferry and container services on a number of routes.

Surely a joint North-South shipping company would be a much more powerful venture than two smaller concerns run separately by the two Governments.

In electricity production and the development of peat resources, there must also be room for co-operation, Mr. Fitzgerald said.

Mr. Fitzgerald said one thing was certain—there was no room for King Canutes in Ireland to-day, whether they be sentimentalists trying to preserve rural life in face of the modern world, or bigots trying to maintain a regime on the basis of religious bitterness three centuries out of date.

Mr. John Mee, chairman of National Unity, presided.

[We extract the above from the Belfast Nationalist paper "Irish News" of 18/6/'60. It is of interest as showing a new reasonableness in place of the old and sterile Nationalist attitude to Northern Ireland. But it still remains a fact that Northern Ireland has its own principles and connections, and these are not to be bargained away].

* * *

Rathcoole's Three Churches Unite in Communion

Church history was made last week in the Presbyterian Church at Rathcoole, Belfast. For the first time in Ireland, three congregations of the Church of Ireland, the Presbyterian Church and the Methodist Church united in a Communion service.

The form of service was that of the Presbyterian Church. The Communion vessels of the three churches were seen on the Lord's Table during the service.

While the people received the wine in individual glasses, the ministers communicated from the Church of Ireland chalice as a symbol of the unity that exists among the three congregations.

The service was conducted by the Methodist minister, Rev. Hamilton Skillen. Rev. W. E. Davison, the Presbyterian minister, administered the Communion, and Rev. E. D. R. Simms, curate in charge of the Church of Ireland, preached the sermon.

Mr. Simms said that divisions in the Church of Christ are sinful, but it must not be supposed that unity of churches will come about without hard work on the part of men in the pews as well as the church leaders, any more than we get our daily bread simply by praying for it.

Next year the united Communion service will be held in the Church of Ireland, and the following year in the Methodist Church. The form of service will be the usual form of the church in which the service is held.

—("Belfast Weekly Telegraph", 1/7/'60).

* * *

Church Union for North India Approved

The General Council of the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma and Ceylon (Anglican) has given general approval to the Plan of Church Union in North India and Pakistan, as amended at the December meeting of the Negotiating Committee, and has referred the Plan to the Diocesan Councils for consideration and the passing of resolutions of general approval or disapproval.

The Metropolitans of the other Churches and Provinces of the Anglican Communion are to be asked whether they would be prepared to enter into relations of full Communion with the United Churches from their inauguration, so that the C.I.P.B.C. may come to its final decision in the light of the replies received from their own Diocesan Councils and from other Provinces of the Anglican Communion.

The United Churches of North India and of Pakistan, as envisaged under the Plan, would include Anglicans, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians and adherents of various smaller bodies.

The resolution giving general approval to the Plan was presented to the Council by the Episcopal Synod, and was passed by simple majorities in each House. The voting figures were: bishops, 14 for, 1 against; clergy, 32 for, 8 against; laity, 32 for, 3 against.

Preamble

The General Council, in a preamble to its resolution, records its belief:

(1) That certain doubts felt in the Committee of the recent Lambeth Conference are now dispelled.

(2) That the preface, prayer and formula as the "bringing together of the episcopates" especially as now amended express sufficiently clearly the Anglican view that the historic

—(Continued on p. 95.)

THE SACRAMENT OF THE ALTAR.

If we admit a simple undoctinal use of the word "altar," we may consider the phrase "the Sacrament of the Altar" tolerable enough. We must ask, however, if there can be nowadays a simple undoctinal use of "altar." We know the figurative sense of the word when we employ it in reference to Marriage, and if the figurative sense were general we might welcome it. But, plainly, we cannot count on the strictly symbolic understanding of the word. We ought to think of it in its Biblical context, and when we do, the Old Testament forms come to the forefront, and the word "altar" brings us to Israel's "altar of sacrifice" whereon the shed blood was offered. There was, we know, another altar, but the altar which dominated Israel's religious faith and practice had to do with the death and the offered blood of the victim (thence called "the sacrifice").

* * *

In like manner the death and offered blood of the New Testament are associated with Calvary; and the Cross was the Christian altar of sacrifice. We say "was," not "is," because that offering and that altar (though eternally efficacious), belong to the past. On the Cross, and then, and nowhere else, Our Lord offered the one perfect and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world. To-day the sacrifice is remembered, not repeated; and the Cross is kept in mind as the place of "the finished Work," the Work by which the Lamb of God took away the sin of the world.

If, as the Epistle to the Hebrews says, "we have an altar," we understand by the phrase that we look back to Calvary whereon was offered once for all the true propitiation for our sins. We do not understand by those words that we have in our midst an altar which may be contrasted with Israel's; we mean that we have in the Cross an altar of infinite superiority. It needs no renewals, for the blood shed for us is rightly called "the Precious Blood." It needs no supplements, for it is the sufficient price for all souls that ever were or shall be.

* * *

We are of opinion that much of the later teaching about the Supper of the Lord was developed in spite of the teaching of the New Testament, and especially, of the Epistle to the Hebrews. We do not mean that the lessons of Holy Scripture were purposely and knowingly set aside, but that gradually less notice came to be taken of that epistle. It ought to be remembered that the chief sacramental controversies of the centuries prior to the Reformation were in what many will still call "the Dark Ages"; that is, in the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries.

If we form a low estimate of the secular scholarship of that period as compared with the classical and patristic period (the age of the fathers) which preceded it; or as compared with the Age of the Renaissance and Reformation which followed, we may well ask the question—why should we form a high estimate of its theological scholarship? There were men of good scriptural views, such as Ratramn, and later, Berengar, but they were overborne. The winning cause was the one which best suited the popular mind and the monastic mind. It favoured a literalism of interpretation which introduced a recurring miracle and a recurring sacrifice. It did not favour a truly Scriptural emphasis.

* * *

If we enquire into the reasons for that decline in spiritual truth we may mark how little was generally known of the full contents of the New Testament. Ability to read or write was severely limited, and in the Europe which was suffering from the effects of generations of barbarian turmoil, manuscripts were few and not widely available. Little real critical spirit existed to safeguard the church from errors of many sorts, and when a scholar of distinction appeared (e.g. John Scotus Erigena) and challenged some popular ideas, he was in serious danger.

Further, in that age churchmen believed that whatever increased their power would make things better for everybody. Popes fought Emperors in order to establish the superiority of the spiritual sword. In many ways the church was less barbarian than the Kings and the empire, and we need not feel that we must hesitate before acknowledging that the church did contribute largely to stabilising and civilising Europe in the early Middle Ages. If the church had inadequate and unreliable secular powers at its disposal, it sought to make full use of the awesome spiritual powers it claimed increasingly. To create afresh, and to sacrifice afresh the Son of God in the Sacrament of the altar was a power before which even the most self-sufficient emperor might quail. If he had the spirit of defiance, what about his allies and his more impressionable followers? Penances, excommunications, interdicts, Purgatory fires, Hell itself, and eternal damnation were real terrors of the mind and soul. Threatened with these in varying degrees the emperor's armies (or levies) could melt away.

* * *

It was to be expected then that an age without criticism, and an age in which wonder was added to wonder, would be an age in which the Christian imagination spread itself dogmatically—the more one believed, the better. Faith was a capacity for believing, and no longer a vitalising incentive based upon the Word of God.

Thus we find as the contribution of the mediaeval period to the Sacramental doctrines the dogma that "in the Sacrament of the altar Christ is truly present, and indeed in such a way, that Almighty God, Who was pleased at Cana in Galilee to convert water into wine, changes the inward substance of the consecrated bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ" (J. A. Moehler—Symbolism, Vol. 1. p. 334.)

In this sentence Dr. Moehler sets down the dogma of Transubstantiation. When, as he believed, in common with all his fellows, that the body and blood of Christ are on the altar, then he can add "we therefore adore the Saviour mysteriously present in the Sacrament." We put forward our own view that the word "mysteriously" does not mean here "in a way we do not know," for it is thought that the philosophical doctrine of Transubstantiation is the explanation. "Mysteriously" seems to us to mean that in the Sacrament of the Altar Our Lord is veiled under the appearances of bread and wine.

* * *

Dr. Moehler writes "Christ on the Cross is still an object strange to us: Christ, in the Christian Worship, is our property, our victim. There (i.e. on the Cross) He is the universal victim—here (i.e. on the Altar) He is the victim for us in particular, and for every individual amongst us; there He was only the victim; here He is the victim acknowledged and revered: there the objective atonement was consummated;—here the subjective atonement is partly fostered and promoted, partly expressed."

This, from a greatly admired and classic exponent of Roman Catholic dogma, shows us the contrast with evangelical thought and truth. We look back to Calvary fully aware that He who died for us there is alive for evermore, and with St. Paul we say "He loved me and gave Himself for me." We say that in contemplation of the Cross, not of the Altar. We, at the Altar, remember. We do not re-enact.

Nowhere in the New Testament (which expresses the original Christian faith) do we find sufficient warrant for Dr. Moehler's distinction of Cross and altar in the sense that the altar has atoning effect subjectively (i.e. in the impression made on us). The Lord's Supper is the memorial of Redeeming Love: in it "we show forth the Lord's death till He come." We do this figuratively in the breaking of the bread and sharing the cup. We cannot take from the Cross the completeness and fulness of its atoning power. That power we apply to our souls by faith, and not otherwise.

We cannot affirm that the Lord's Supper is the same sacrifice as Calvary, because it is not a sacrifice at all, but is the remembrance of a sacrifice, Christ is present as we believe, but He is present in the entire service, and in the hearts, not in the hands, of the faithful.

* * *

Dr. Moehler can write of "the offering up of Christ" in "the Catholic Mass"—"It is one and the same undivided victim,—one and the same High Priest, Who on the Mount of Calvary and on our altars hath offered up Himself as an atonement for the sins of the world." This is explicit. The evangelical Protestant can find no warrant for the words "and on our altars." He holds that the Sacrament of the altar is "for the continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ and of the benefits which we receive thereby." Christ Himself is received "after a heavenly and spiritual manner"—Can we ask for more?

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a, Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"YOU ARE THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD."

Matt. 5, 14.

We may at first think that these words of Our Lord are an overstatement. When we remember the character and quality of the men He assembled round Him, we find it hard to recognise them thus described. No doubt they found it hard to recognise themselves—Matthew a tax-collector and renegade Jew, and others unlearned and ignorant shipmen from Galilee. But Our Lord's statement was scarcely meant to describe them as they were at the moment of hearing the Sermon on the Mount: it applied, we think, to what they were potentially. In the power of the Holy Spirit they became capable of fulfilling the privilege and task for which they had been designated.

* * *

"The light of the World" is a title Our Lord took to Himself. If, therefore, we lay claim to it, it can only be because of our oneness with Him. We are not lights in separation from Him, but only in union with Him. That our light is derived from Him and not original to ourselves is the thing to remember, because it prevents any notion of spiritual grandeur on our part. It repels pride and arrogance; and when we recollect that the treasure of light, like all other spiritual riches we have, is in earthen vessels, we are led to humility and gratitude to God.

* * *

Christ then, is the source of our light. We constantly use the words of Zechariah "the Dayspring from on high hath visited us"—let us in consequence avoid behaving as if we were still in darkness. If we are enlightened, then we may no longer have any fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness (Eph. 5, 11); for they are alien to us, and we are in a different sphere. Once we know Christ and realise that "in Him was life; and the life was the light of men" we must find ourselves thinking new thoughts, enjoying new fellowship, discovering that spiritual matters once arid and tedious are now refreshing and absorbing, learning new values, refining and purifying tastes and habits. The "new creation" is not a bit of Christian mythology, but an ever-recurring experience of the people of God. For those in Christ "all things are become new" for He promised that Himself—now, and not only at the end of time, He fulfils His promise "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21, 5).

* * *

We have then, Our Lord as "the bright and morning star," nay, rather, as "the Sun of righteousness"—full-orbed light—God's radiance: how is it conveyed to us? We may enjoy the light, but we are called to make a great deal more of it than enjoyment, for we are to be the Incarnate Light's instruments. So then we must take to ourselves the lesson taught by the Psalmist, and soundly taught though the Psalmist had little intimation of the full truth. The lesson is in Psalm 34—

"They looked unto Him, and were lightened:

"And their faces shall never be con-founded."

(or, in the Berkeley O.T. "They looked to Him and were radiant").

This will remind us of the words we have in the Epistle to the Hebrews—"Looking unto Jesus, the Author and Perfecter of our faith." We see here an instance of how Holy Scripture hangs together, and how one place illustrates and explains another—"looking unto" implies an upward gaze, and gathered into that act are admiration, emulation, and veneration. It speaks of the worship of the heart which inspires to obedience and perseverance.

From Christ we have our light: we look unto Him and it is ours. But we can step aside into the realm of darkness and danger. This seems to be at least touched upon by Our Lord when He said "If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness!" Light can be totally obscured if we go out of the way. How are we to avoid that peril? Abide in the light—Jesus said "I am the light of the world: he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life" (John 8, 12). So, to follow Him is the way to abide in the light, and only by abiding in the light can we possess it sufficiently to spread it.

* * *

Many and varied results must follow if we walk in the light and are "children of light." Our effectiveness as lights of the world must come from our own realisation of the inexpressible gain of being one with Christ and sharing in Him Who is the light of life. We read the words of St. John (1st Epistle, 1, 7)—"If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another..." because "our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ." The unity of God's children in sonship and in brotherhood is grounded in Him Who is light itself.

* * *

It is remarkable how the knowledge of God and the truth of God are described as "light" in Holy Scripture. This plainly tells that not only man's fallen condition and state of sin are states of darkness, but that man's natural wisdom, and secular learning may be darkness too. We are familiar with the phrase "the light of nature," and firmly say that the true light of nature is the light of nature's God, not the deductions and precepts man may formulate as a result of his experiences.

People often defer to "the light of nature" without taking account of the fact that the only nature we know is fallen human nature, a nature marred in all its faculties by sin. But the true light of sinless nature can be none other than the light of Christ the Sinless One. If we are to talk of natural light, let it be genuine and not illusory. In human history the one genuine unblemished personality is Our Lord. When He is our light we may faithfully do our modest best to be "lights of the world"; "a city set upon a hill."

CHARLES SIMEON.

Since 1959 a good deal of attention has been given to Charles Simeon, for 1959 was the centenary of his birth. No doubt our readers are familiar with the name and with some of the achievements of this eminent Christian, but it may be worthwhile to give a more detailed account of his career. We may hope that knowledge of his life will inspire many to a fresh realisation of the power of the Holy Spirit as the incentive to Christian discipleship as well as its sustaining force.

* * *

Charles Simeon, an English clergyman, was born in 1759 and died in 1836; thus he lived in the developed period of the Evangelical Revival of the eighteenth century and probably had some acquaintance with the Revival's leaders. Perhaps he was too young to pay attention to either John or Charles Wesley, but he cannot have been unaware of other leaders even though his earlier years were not marked by religious zeal. As enlightenment grew we recognise many resemblances to the great evangelicals—earnest ministry, singlemindedness, gifts of teaching, steadfast perseverance under reproach.

Simeon also lived through the American Revolution, but it was probably far too remote to make much impression on him. The loss of the American colonies was, one supposes, more a loss of prestige than of anything more serious in that day.

He lived through the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars. We may conclude that the excesses of the liberal revolutionary spirit made him more conservative. It is true that evangelicals are usually conservative, so that Simeon could have had little or no sympathy with the democratic ideas of the time. But we ought to say here that Evangelicals of the right sort are too much engaged in the basic issues of life and destiny to give attention to the popular but disproportionate concern with mundane affairs. They are by no means unaware of the harsh realities of life, or indifferent to amelioration and reform, but they know that amelioration and reform are insufficient as remedies for man's ills. Only radical change of heart can meet the need: where that is ignored the modern social panaceas only deal with symptoms.

Towards the end of Simeon's life there were the great domestic agitations which led to the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, and the Reform Bill (Parliamentary Reform) of 1832. We have not sought information on his attitude towards these, but we surmise that he shared the hesitations of his class in regard to both. Yet he seems to us so entirely pre-occupied with the task God had plainly given to him that there can have been little room or time for these temporal matters.

* * *

What struck us in reading about Simeon was his unusual concentration and perseverance. His convictions were compelling, and his singlemindedness was remarkable. Some may question if it is right for a man to adopt so exclusive a way of life, and to set aside so much that others find legitimate and valuable: but surely the answer is hidden in the realm of Simeon's conscience, and it is not for us to decide whether he was right or not. If an answer must be given we may look to the achievements of Charles Simeon—if ever a tree is known by its fruits, we may claim that Simeon is vindicated by labours from which the Church of God still profits.

Simeon attended Eton College, and from it went to King's College, Cambridge. He became a Fellow of King's College in 1778 and held the office till his death fifty-eight years later.

He was ordained in 1782 and undertook the perpetual curacy of the Holy Trinity Church in Cambridge which he retained throughout life (a perpetual curacy is an incumbency which is now styled a vicarage).

Possibly there is not much to be said of Simeon as a scholar in the academic sense. College fellowships in the eighteenth century were not onerous, and the amount of learning required was not great. Bishop Handley Moule in his Life of Simeon says "he was not highly sensitive to contemporary currents of thought and action" which bears out what we have written above. The bishop also adds that "he lacked the purely literary instinct." From this we may assume that the contemporary "Romantic Revival" left him untouched. For this we may be grateful, for the "Romantic Revival" in the sister-university of Oxford had had some share in fostering the atmosphere in which the Tractarian Movement began. John Henry Newman was as much the product of Romanticism as of reaction against liberalism.

* * *

In this connection, i.e. Simeon's attainments, it is well to say of him that he was "a giver rather than a receiver." Of course he received much from God, but he was not particularly receptive of human learning, and he made impressions instead of receiving them.

In short God made him an instructor, a guide and counsellor—his wisdom was chiefly the wisdom from on high.

* * *

When Simeon went to Cambridge he had a hasty and extravagant disposition. But along with it he had some degree of spiritual responsibility—it may have been little in comparison with later attainments, but it was perhaps more than most of his contemporaries had.

He entered the University in days when its academic standards were very low. His older contemporary, the historian Edward Gibbon referred in his autobiography to "the dull and deep potations" of the College Fellows. The Fellows and holders of professorial chairs made little or no pretence of lecturing, and Bishop Moule says that the Fellows' Common-rooms were scenes of "shameless intemperance."

Outside the Colleges the Cambridge churches were not inspiring—their services were perfunctory and hasty. The Wesleys had not influenced Cambridge very much, and in the Colleges there was a fair amount of free-thought and socinianism.

* * *

As is well-known, after three days in residence in King's College Simeon had notice from the Provost that he must go to the Holy Communion on an official day in term. He knew he ought to prepare, and bought the only religious book he knew of—"The Whole Duty of Man"—We believe it is an anonymous 17th century tract—He says—"I made myself quite ill with reading, fasting and praying."

Then he tried to read Kettlewell on the Sacrament—"it required more of me than I could bear."!

"I procured Wilson, which seemed more moderate in its requirements"—Wilson was a T.C.D. graduate (and later, Bishop of Man)—his book well-known for nearly 200 years. In Wilson he found the thought leading to the phrase—"the Jews knew what they did when they transferred their sin to the head of their offering"—"the thought came to my mind 'may I transfer all my guilt to another?'—'Has God provided an offering for me that I may lay my sins on His head? Then God willing I will not bear them on my soul a moment longer.'"

"I laid my sins upon the Sacred Head of Jesus, and began to have a hope of mercy. On Sunday-morning, Easter Day, I awoke with these words upon heart and life."—"Jesus Christ is risen to-day!" From that hour peace flowed into my soul, and from that time the prayers in chapel were as marrow and fatness to my soul—no prayers in the world are better suited to our wants or more delightful to our souls.” Some forty years after Simeon published Four Sermons on “The Excellence of the Liturgy”—We refer to them here to show that the early conviction of the value of the Prayer Book was never lost.

In these sermons Simeon first outlined the character of religion in the Old Testament. He perceived in the Old Testament two themes, (a) Fear of God, and (b) need of a Mediator. These remain undercurrents in our Liturgy. This is Sermon I. In Sermon II he showed that liturgical worship is lawful in itself, for Our Lord gave a set form of prayer.

Liturgy is expedient for us—“Let a person be in a devout frame and he will be far more likely to have his soul elevated to heaven by the Liturgy than by the generality of prayer he will hear in other places.” “The Liturgy is concerned more with solid truths than with fluent words.”

Sermon III suggests that to judge the Liturgy aright we should contemplate “its spirituality and purity: its fulness and suitability: its moderation and candour.” It can edify all members of the church—

“If a man were the devoutest of all the human race, he could never find words wherein to give scope to all the exercises of his mind more suitable than the Te Deum.” “All is practical, candid, peaceful, temperate: every word is spoken in love.”

—May not this last sentence apply also to Simeon himself, and to the church at its best?

All we want, he says, is “a heart suited to the Liturgy.”

Sermon IV expounds the lessons of the Ordinal, urging prayer, pastoral diligence, and example.

* * *

We return to the young man in College now quickened into a real spiritual life. Thinking of the impression we have of Simeon and of similar pious young men, we may be a little surprised by the facts that in the ensuing Long Vacation he attended a race-meeting and a ball, rode many miles on Sunday to pay a social call, was at least once so much under the influence of drink that a fall from his horse nearly killed him. But he soon corrected these matters, or better, changed these past-times, and back at College lived a sincere and earnest life.

When kneeling at prayer in church was infrequent Simeon knelt, and a phrase of his was “Why should I be afraid of all the world seeing me do my duty?” He fasted much in Passion Week, so that we may see that far from being an evangelical innovator, he reverted to the standards of older Church of Englandism.

* * *

About the time of his Ordination in 1782 Simeon began to meet some older clergymen who were serious and evangelical. One of them, Henry Venn, closely connected in later years with foreign missionary work wrote of him prior to his ordination on Trinity Sunday 1782 “Before that day he never was in company with an earnest Christian”—if that was true, it is a remarkable tribute to the printed word’s effect, for Bishop Wilson’s little Work, and then the Prayer Book gave Simeon the proper dispositions for faith and conduct, and a vocation.

* * *

From the beginning Simeon’s sermons drew hearers, and he quickly filled a Cambridge church, a thing unknown for nearly a century. The communicants tripled in number. Then Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge needed a curate in charge under the Bishop and Simeon was appointed—so he began a ministry of 54 years of unbroken loyalty to God and his people.

Simeon’s appointment to Holy Trinity was much resented by church wardens and pew-holders: like Wm. Romaine in his London Church. He preached to people standing in the nave and aisles among the padlocked empty pews. The reason for all this was that the pew-holders wanted the curate-assistant as curate in charge. Simeon bore with this situation—he wrote “I wished rather to suffer than to act. If I suffered with a becoming spirit my enemies must must of necessity do me good; whereas if in acting I should have my own spirit unduly exercised I must be injured in my own soul.”

His guiding principle may be found in the Apostle’s words—“The servant of the Lord must not strive.”

But Simeon also took legal advice and knew he had rights even though he was not in a hurry to assert them. He was no simpleton, but in most of the problems of his ministry he had “a more excellent way” than to enforce his authority by process of law.

* * *

So the years in Holy Trinity went on—Simeon was a careful and scrupulous pastor, reasonable and persuasive in the pulpit; genial and courtly in private; active in College as Dean and Bursar; and specially careful in preparing candidates for Confirmation. On holidays he occasionally went to Scotland, and used to preach in Scottish churches until forbidden by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland (moderation's hostility to evangelical doctrine).

He visited Ireland and at least once preached in St. George's Dublin for Jewish Missions.

But for long years he was disliked, suspected and slandered in his College, while physical assaults upon him were planned and his church windows stoned during Service. When he once opened the New Testament during this persecution and sought a chance word of comfort his eye fell on the line "Simon of Cyrene, him they compelled to bear His Cross." (Matt. 27). He spoke evil of no man, and turned more and more to prayer.

* * *

When Simeon was settled in his College rooms and parish he saw the many undergraduates intending to be ordained and left without any preparation of any sort—"no man cared for their souls." He began a system of pastoral training under the prompting of the Holy Spirit; and many generations of students trained by him gave new life and faith and devotion to the Church of England. Only the bogus and tendentious "histories" of the church claim that all was dark before 1833. Simeon saw that men needed to be taught to preach. He aimed at making "intelligent and intelligible preachers"!

He published a long series of outlines of Sermons, 2,500 of what he called "skeletons," to be studied and then filled out by those who used them into complete discourses. He was paid £5,000 which he gave away to Missionary Societies.

He gave a splendidly bound set of the 21 volumes to the T.C.D. Library with the dedication "To the Governors or Trustees of the Public Library in Trinity College, Dublin

—"A present from the author in the humble hope, and with earnest prayer to God, that his efforts to diffuse the knowledge of Christ with all the wonders of redeeming love may not be in vain." Chas. Simeon, King's College, Cambridge, 1833.

He says in the preface that "no one expects to succeed in the legal or medical profession till he has with labour and study qualified himself for the discharge of the duties pertaining to them."

In these outlines he sought to maintain "the spirit of moderation which so eminently distinguishes the Established Church." He said the outlines would not lead to sloth as they could not be used without considerable thought. They would help the rude and incoherent to preach readily and well.

Simeon disclaimed all Shibboleths, and asked only this of a Sermon—

Does it tend to humble the sinner, exalt the Saviour,

promote holiness?

He recommended

unity in design,
perspicuity in arrangement,
simplicity in diction.

* * *

What did Simeon think about the acute problem of his day—the meaning of Baptism and Regeneration? His views are fairly like the views of Gorham, the hero of the long-drawn-out conflict with the Bishop of Exeter in 1850—

"Baptism is a change of state, not of nature." "A change of nature may occur at the time of the Baptism, but the ordinance does not communicate it"—Simon Magus was baptised!

In his "Appeal to Men of Wisdom and Candour" published in 1816, he laboured these points—New birth—no sudden impulse of Holy Spirit is needed. A new heart is promised. We must not say that all persons do necessarily receive the Holy Spirit so as to be changed into the Image of God:

"If we are born again in Baptism

- (a) it is sudden,
- (b) irresistible,
- (c) without co-operation,
- (d) arbitrary, as man can delay or forbid,
- (e) coincident with the parish register,
- (f) we are assured of it without evidence, and in face of all the evidence to the contrary."

He asks "who then are the enthusiasts, but those who make these claims?"

He expounds Justification by Faith, and says that if good works are needed "Pick out what will eke out the insufficient merits of the Saviour."!

* * *

Among students he regularly held what he called "Conversation Circles"—what we should call "one man brains-trusts." With foresight he organised a trust to acquire livings so that his disciples might be usefully placed and able to do their work in peace and independence. That system still continues.

* * *

These notes are already long, though the portrait remains incomplete—We can do no more than refer briefly to the Sermon preached in Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge, on the occasion of Charles Simeon's death—the preacher—Wm. Dealtry had as text 1. Sam. 2, 30 "Them that honour Me I will honour."

First he described how Simeon honoured God:

1. from the outset Simeon chose the better part though isolated in doing this.

2. He honoured God by his fidelity in preaching the Gospel as he found it.

3. He honoured God by his Christian courage.

4. He honoured God by his disposition and character.

5. He did all for the glory of God.

Second. How God honoured him.

1. Anxiety of crowds to hear from him words of eternal life.

2. The fruits of his work.

3. Results of his successful labour among students.

4. Honour at length shown him in the University.

5. In old age enmity died; "praise in all the churches."

6. God is his portion for ever.

Chas. Smyth in his "Simeon and Church Order" emphasised Simeon's opposition to all ecclesiastical irregularity—"He honestly believed the Church right, and the principles of Dissent wrong." He put the Bible first, and the Prayer Book next.

Mrs. Oliphant, (Lit. Hist. Eng. III) says that Simeon's influence on young men was just as great as that which attended Newman at Oxford. He encouraged foreign mission vocations—"his work of this kind was greater and more pervasive than that of any other of the modern fathers of the Church."

* * *

Simeon's great contribution to the Church and Kingdom of Christ was to teach that Ordination, like Holy Matrimony, is not by any to be enterprised, nor taken in hand, unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly; but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God."

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 88.

episcopate is being conveyed to the bishops of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia, as well as enabling the bishops of the C.I.P.B.C. to enter into the spiritual heritage of the episcopal branch of the Methodist Church.

(3) That similarly, in the representative act of the unification of the ministry, episcopal ordination is bestowed upon those not previously so ordained (though it does not repeat any ordination previously received), in such manner that all the participants become ministers in a three-fold ministry of bishops, presbyters and deacons, which is to be reverently used and esteemed in the United Churches of North India and Pakistan.

—("Australian Church Record").

[All that brings the people of God closer in churches and personal fellowship and fosters their Christian witness ought to be encouraged. The above paragraphs cheer us].

* * *

"Romish Practices" Under Fire by Anglican Group

A group of about 1,000 prominent clergy and laity in the Church of England has launched an attack on the increasing use by Anglicans of "Romish practices."

They submitted a formal petition to the Archbishops of Canterbury and of York and to the other 41 prelates of the Anglican Church asking them to put an end to such rites. Influential signatories of the petition include Lord Brentford; Sir Henry Holland, noted eye surgeon; Sir John Glubb, former leader of the Arab Legion in Jordan; and three retired Bishops.

The petition said that certain Anglican leaders seemed determined to impose through a revision of the canons the very form of religion which had driven so many to form other denominations or to stop going to church altogether. It asked for an end to the use of clerical vestments as being "inevitably associated in the minds of many ordinary folk with the Roman Mass and the accompanying doctrine of a sacrificial priesthood" and for the Bible to be again established as the final "supreme authority in all matters of faith and doctrine."

* * *

Basque Priests Indict Franco Regime. Contradiction of R.C. Doctrine and State Practice

Madrid, July 1.

Is the Roman Catholic Church turning against the Franco regime? Is it disengaging itself from identification with an authoritarian system in decline, as it did shortly before the collapse of the dictatorships in Argentina, Venezuela, and Colombia?

These questions come to mind when one reads the collective protest sent by members of the Basque clergy in Spain to the Bishops of four Northern provinces and to the Papal envoy in Madrid, Mgr. Hildebrand Antoniutti. The document, reportedly signed by 339 priests, is a severe indictment of the Franco regime. It is impressive both for the scope of its criticism and for the dispassionate tone in which it is written. It says:

"We are impelled by our conscience to warn of the widening abyss that separates us from those whose souls have been commended to us for guidance. Accusations against us are so numerous and vehement that they have become a veritable clamour. They arise from a variety of complaints which clearly reflect the hostility that surrounds us. This situation bodes ill for the spiritual future of our people.

"We trust that this testimonial of priests in daily contact with the people will be heeded. It would be a grave mistake to discount the seriousness of a situation which can harm the Church in our diocese for generations to come."

"Torturing of suspects"

Quoting Pope Pius XII on the subject of justice and freedom, the letter charges the Franco regime with having liquidated liberty, "a sacred inviolable right which the State is duty-bound to recognise and respect." It charges the Government with tolerating the beating and torturing of suspects by the police.

Here are some extracts from what the authors describe as "an analysis of the true situation in Spain":

"The people, social classes, and regional entities which comprise the Spanish body-politic do not enjoy sufficient freedom. People are arrested because of activities not in accordance with the political thought imposed by the State. People are detained for expressing political opinions at variance with those held by the Government.

"In the course of the regime's 24 years of existence persons have been held in prison for months and years before being tried by a special tribunal, charged with 'rebellion against the State' because they had the courage to question the rulers' claim to perfection and infallibility.

"The Executive power in Spain interferes with the course of justice, directing and controlling it to suit the political concepts of the political Chief . . . All the elements of power, all appointments that carry with them civic responsibilities and influence, are controlled by a single, all-embracing, unchallengeable authority. Under such a system decline into servility is inevitable.

"No one may be deprived of freedom of conscience, which is of the soul, a heritage of God . . . Coercion, whether physical or moral, is an offence against the human person and individual liberty."

"(The State runs) a super-propaganda machine that controls the press, radio, and all other information media and carries on a personality cult of the Leader. . . . The Spanish press is an instrument designed to mis-shape public opinion. It does not prepare the citizen for participation in public affairs. It does not permit constructive criticism of the country's political, economic, social entities. It arbitrarily limits the right to express opinions. It does not permit citizens to exercise any checks whatever on the administration of public affairs."

"Spain has no genuine parliament, no political liberty, no free labour unions. The State's political party, the State's labour syndicates, its controlled Parliament are the basic structure of a regime that is under the absolute control of the Leader. The labour syndicates are a creation of the State, designed to protect the interest of the regime."

Letting it slide

The most vital part of the clerics' letter emphasises the idea that the Roman Catholic Church in Spain is so closely identified with the Franco regime that the Spanish people are shunning the clergy.

The cause of the widening gulf between the people and the clergy, it says, "is the contradiction that exists between the Catholic doctrine relating to the human person and the violation of this doctrine by a regime that proclaims its official catholicism and enjoys the full support of the Church hierarchy."

The leaders of the Church in this country are, in fact, closely bound to the Franco regime, where there is no separation of Church and State. So far they have shown no intention of breaking away. In 1953 a concordat was signed, an event which was widely interpreted as signifying that the Vatican made no distinction between the Franco State and the Spanish people.

To-day Spain's Roman Catholic Church, at the highest level, remains (with the Army) a basic prop of the Franco régime. It would be surprising if an official Church publication (such as "Ecclesia," which is exempt from censorship by the State) published the letter of the Basque priests. Yet it is noteworthy that the hierarchy has evidently chosen to let the matter slide rather than discredit the letter from the North and reprimand the priests who signed it.

—("The Guardian", 2/7/'60).

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1
QUARTER PAGE	10/-
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/-

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	s.	d.
William Bedell	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	0	4
The Confessional	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

SOWING BESIDE ALL WATERS . . .

by the Amazon and the Niger,
by the Nile and by the Indus,
by the Rhine and by the Thames . . .

SCRIPTURES SUPPLIED by the TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

bring the Light and Truth of the
Gospel to many who sit in darkness

To Sow the Seed of God's Word

in the world-wide field
is the pressing task of

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.C.1.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 9.—LXIX.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE CATHOLIC

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Arch-deacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification", "Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d. Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev. A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos. Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano Ruggi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	97
Church of Rome in Great Britain	98
The Story of a Priest	100
Editor's Chair	102
Communism and China	104
New Archbishop Must "Command Respect"	106

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

More Finds at Jordan

The American archaeological expedition which has been working on a site near Dothan, in what is now North-West Jordan, has come upon a 3,000 year old tomb containing more than 900 objects. There are indications that it may have been the tomb of a warrior of the time of the Judges. Also there were signs of an earthquake having occurred, which, it is suggested, may have been the one mentioned by Amos. Many of the lamps and jars date back more than 200 years before Solomon. So far 15 different levels have been found, showing that the city began some 5,000 years ago, and was destroyed and rebuilt several times through the centuries. On top of the mound, the excavators uncovered the city built after the military invasion and destruction by the ancient Assyrians about 700 B.C. The walls, rooms, houses, storage chambers, and other remains of this part gave a clear idea of Palestinian life nearly 3,000 years ago. Ancient writing on a potsherd from this period was one of the outstanding discoveries of the present season. Dr. Free and his assistants have been excavating at the site of Dothan, six miles from Jenin, for seven seasons. The site is referred to in the Second Book of Kings in connection with the prophet Elisha; and in the record in Genesis of Joseph and his brothers, as the site where Joseph was cast into a pit and later sold into slavery. Dr. Free is Professor of Archaeology at Wheaton College, Illinois.

—("The Christian", 20/5/'60).

* * *

Alcoholic Drink on Television

Nearly two years ago the Society of Friends Temperance and Moral Welfare Union instructed an organization to record and report upon all mentions of alcoholic drink on television in the periods June 16th to 29th and September 15th to 28th, 1958. The monitors watched the output of all television transmitters in the country, logged all references to alcoholic drink which arose, whether visual or verbal, noting and classifying them and where possible recording them on tape and timing them by stop watch. The analysis of the results has now been published. The references were classified into three categories: (1) Casual references, such as the pouring of drinks in a play, or an invitation in a play to partake of alcoholic drink; (2) References, which although unnecessary might be regarded as harmless; (3) Undesirable references which might be expected to offend against the good taste of any reasonable person. It has been found that about 87 per cent of alcoholic reference are casual in nature, as against 2.6 per cent classified as undesirable. This is an improvement on a similar survey in 1953. The B.B.C. has fewer references to alcohol than I.T.A. The final conclusion of the report states that the number of references to alcoholic drink on television is higher than on radio, in spite of the fact that television has less broadcasting hours per week. ("The Christian", 13/5/'60.)

* * *

Ministry of the Church of Ireland—Call of Church "facing strong competition"

Many people look on it as abnormal, even unnatural, to enter the Church as a full-time career, the Bishop of Connor declared.

Dr. R. C. H. Elliott said: "This attitude to the vocation of full-time service in this Church is a sad reflection on present conditions although some excellent men are coming forward to prepare for ordination."

He told the annual synod of the Diocese of Connor in Belfast that there is a fair supply of men in training for the Church of Ireland ministry—thanks mainly to the diocese's bursary fund.

But Dr. Elliott went on: "It would be folly to build churches and halls in new housing areas unless there are sufficient clergy to minister to the people in them."

Although he was about to ordain six men there would still be at least seven vacant curacies which might have long to wait before they were filled.

"If we want to maintain an adequate ministry we shall have to sound the call to the ministry in face of strong competition from other calls," Dr. Elliott went on.

—(Continued on p. 108.)

CHURCH OF ROME IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Though we are not regular readers of the Roman Catholic papers published in England (and widely distributed in Ireland), such as "The Universe" and "The Catholic Times," we are not deprived of information. It is plain to all that the English daily press (a secular industry) gives a good deal of Roman Catholic news. We have often observed that if Church of England "news-items" appear they have to be mildly sensational as a rule, but if the "news-items" are Roman Catholic they are generally strongly in support of Roman Catholicism. They do not belittle that creed or imply that it need not be taken seriously. Too often, we fear, there is inattention to the real worth and achievement of the Church of England. But let someone belonging to it say something which may look a little odd in print, and it will secure publicity.

Possibly the explanation is that a large number of Roman Catholics engage in journalism. Another possibility is that many who have abandoned the practice of religion, and are inclined to treat it lightly, may yet treat Roman Catholic news with cautious respect. Whatever be the explanation the daily papers, English and Irish, tell us a good deal about the Roman Catholic church in England.

* * *

It is, in fact, natural for the Irish daily papers to record Roman Catholic affairs in England, because the great majority of priests and other religious are of Irish origin, and the growing flocks they minister to in churches and schools are mainly of the Irish race. Rome in England would be very small were it composed only of native Englishmen. During the last war, and since, the Irish migration to England has been remarkable. Some will fall away into indifference, but probably most of them and their families will be reckoned as church-members.

* * *

This indicates a great expansion of Roman Catholicism in recent years. The migration of the last twenty years has followed the older pattern which dated from the days of the great Irish famine of 1847. For well over a century, Irishmen and women of the labouring sort, with a steady proportion of tradesmen, have been swelling the numbers of Roman Catholics by settling in the industrial towns. They must be an important factor in all industries, and in all branches of the trade union movement.

* * *

But what is likely to draw attention is a quite different side of Roman Catholic life in England. To-day it is often assumed that Roman Catholicism has acquired intellectual ascendancy. We regularly read of persons of some cultural or academic attainment turning Roman Catholic. We need not question their sincerity: it would be impertinent to doubt it, but we want to know what it shows. When a literary person of some degree of education adopts a new religion, does it mean that the old arguments against Rome have lost validity? Does it mean that all has been carefully investigated and that reformed Christianity has been proved wrong?

We are inclined to think that many new recruits to Rome had previously little or no knowledge of the Christian Creed as held in reformed churches. They may have grown-up in indifference, agnosticism, or secularism. Perhaps in school they had some formal classes in divinity with no very impressive teaching to assist them, and possibly their families were "non-church-going." Such people in search of a responsible attitude to life, may see only the alternatives—Rome or Moscow. If communism repels them, Rome may attract.

Again, a person of literary tastes may rightly value the great traditions of Western culture, and allow himself to be persuaded that Western culture is but an aspect of Roman Catholic faith, and that it derives any worthwhile elements it has from the Church. This we think was a point the late Hilaire Belloc never tired of making, and it has power to impress and persuade. Against the background of Europe, the Protestantism of England may look provincial and out of step.

An instance which may illustrate this is the present wide interest in philosophy both inside and outside the colleges. Where people talk philosophy there will always be someone to proclaim that St. Thomas Aquinas has all the answers. The thirteenth century philosopher is the standard Roman Catholic authority, and the norm of thought. How fascinating to discover that the mediaeval scholastic settles the intellectual problem of the twentieth century! Pope Leo XIII about eighty years ago directed his church to take its philosophy from Aquinas, and it has done so with great consistency ever since. But we find ourselves in agreement with the late Bishop of Truro, Dr. J. W. Hunkin, who wrote, some twenty years ago in his "The Gospel for To-morrow"—"We must examine and appreciate, but make no attempt to go back. A re-edition of the Summa Theologia (Aquinas's great book) will not meet the needs of our own times. According to the story paraphrased by Robert Bridges in the first book of "The Testament of Beauty," St. Thomas Aquinas himself came to realise the limitations of his impressive system of Theology. One day in Naples he had a vision at Mass, and afterwards said to his friend Reginald of Piperno

"My writing is at end. I have seen such things revealed "That what I have written and taught seemeth to me of small worth!"

"St Thomas Aquinas would by no means approve of the artificial revival of his philosophy by some of the more sophisticated writers of to-day."

Yes, we agree with the Bishop that the thought of the men of the past can never meet our needs because they have never lived in our circumstances. Only God's Word can have perpetual relevance to our condition. The scholastic philosophy is taken too seriously. To meet with the living God (as St. Thomas seems to have done in Naples) is very different from the abstract ideas of teleology, and cosmology, and ontology which are thought to prove God's existence. The official philosophy of Roman Catholic teachers is likely to influence those who think of a limited universe, and who want a system of thought rather than thought itself. Anyway, the Christian religion does not call for a system of philosophy, and no philosophy can ever be a proof of the Gospel.

* * *

We recognise that certain minds want a fixed dogmatic foundation, and in contrast with the varieties of Protestant churches, and the varieties of Protestant thought, the Roman Catholic faith does appear to offer stability. The true evangelical foundation is not of course a system, but a person, and that person is Our Lord Jesus Christ. If we mould Him into a system we misinterpret His teaching—"My words are spirit and life." The stabilising factor in the confusions of thought and practice is the One Who said "I am the Way and the Truth and the Life." If we hold on to Him, and learn from Him, we shall not remain unsatisfied for long. If we are asked "what of the church?" we answer that the church of Christ is not embodied at Rome or Geneva, at Canterbury or Constantinople. It has its manifestations in all these places, but its reality is greater, and still awaits its full unfolding. The visible church of Christ is the congregation of faithful men in which the pure Word of God is preached and the Sacraments administered with all that is requisite to them. We need not go to Rome to find the faithful men or the pure word or the sacraments of the Gospel.

If Holy Scriptures were more earnestly studied as present truth (and not as voices in the distant past) there would be corresponding moral, spiritual and intellectual improvement.

* * *

There are, we suppose, other motives and explanations of the influence of Rome on some literary minds. It is true that there is a great readiness to publicise conversions, but no readiness to publicise lapses, still less to publicise conversions to the Church of England and other evangelical churches. The movement is not all one way, yet we receive statements which are calculated to create the impression of a one-way movement.

Lately we saw it stated that in 1939 there were nine Roman Catholic dons in the University of Oxford and about a hundred and fifty students, and to-day there are nearly sixty dons and nearly seven hundred students. This is said to be greater in proportion than the expansion of staff and students—and it is said that this is true of other universities. But what does it prove? Only that more Roman Catholics go to universities in great Britain than used to. We are told that nuns now attend the London School of Economics—it must be a great forward step for them to engage in wider studies. Are we to suppose that all these students will be absolutely impervious to the influences of their environments, teachers and classmates?

We must however mark this, that many Roman Catholic graduates will take up the teaching profession, and teach in public and state schools, and many will enter the Civil Service and local administration. It is to be regretted that many ambitious non-Roman Catholics avoid these good and honourable vocations because commerce and industry offer higher money rewards.

* * *

Then it may be noted that some public entertainers who are quite popular are known to be Roman Catholic, and that may create an interest in some people who are not likely to read books or probe deeply

* * *

There is also the steady propaganda through films and other modern methods of entertainment and instruction. Many novels which portray aspects of the Roman Catholic religion have been filmed and have drawn great crowds—the rise of Lourdes, for instance, has been successfully screened. We recall a German or Austrian film "Embezzled Heaven" (or with some such title) which was popular in Ireland, and gave scenes in the Vatican which showed some of the artistic splendours of Rome as well as some of the major religious observances.

In contrast with the readiness of all concerned to foster this type of propaganda, we remember the reluctance to make use of the excellent film on the life of Martin Luther. In Dublin ardent efforts were made to hinder its display to Protestants in Protestant Church halls. Readers better informed in the matter than we are can tell to what extent the fine film on the life of Dr. Albert Schweitzer was displayed. We are inclined to think that this vivid record of the great Protestant Missionary of our day has not been widely seen.

* * *

If we say that the Roman Catholic population of England (and Wales) is about four millions or a little more (it may be less of course), we are entitled to ask how far that is a figure of genuine adherence. We understand that it is admitted that about forty per cent of the nominal total is indifferent, and that a substantial proportion of the rest is inactive apart from the weekly attendance at Sunday Mass.

For some Roman Catholics the lax religious atmosphere of England is a challenge. They think in terms of the "re-conversion" of England. They picture their hierarchy replacing the dignitaries of the Church of England and England once again subjected to the See of Rome. But for others the same atmosphere is the solvent of prejudices and the instrument of tolerance. If the religious Protestants of England, the people with serious purpose and genuine evangelical faith, would develop a sense of responsibility towards the new-comers in their midst those now lapsing from Rome might find Christian fellowship in "the visible congregation of faithful men wherein the pure Word of God is preached and the Sacraments duly administered with all that is requisite to them."

THE STORY OF A PRIEST.

THE REVD. JOSE RICO.

On April 15, 1956, I arrived on the tranquil shores of peace with God through Jesus Christ, after nineteen years of continually threatened shipwreck in the Roman priesthood.

Among the reasons for leaving my native Spain was the call of American bishops in face of the avalanche of Protestantism in Latin America. There is something in the soul of a Spaniard that makes him instinctively react against Protestantism. From the reign of Charles V and Philip II onward, the history of Spain is full of religious episodes, fights, decrees of faith, and the Inquisition. Everything that forms a part of Spanish "Quixote" life reaches an extreme climax in its hatred of Protestantism.

Thus when the Pope told the Spanish clergy that Latin America is the mission field for Spanish priests, it was to me a clarion call. Coupled with this reason was my desire to labour in that part of the world that, even though I had not seen, I loved, because it had been the most precious possession of our empire.

I soon learned that Latin America is a new and different world in every sense of the word. In Sao Paulo, Brazil, later in the Argentine, and finally in Chile, I saw the Protestant chapel alongside the Catholic church, claiming the same right of social recognition. From my prejudiced viewpoint, I felt that this was an intolerable abuse. Nevertheless, the Divine Providence was soon to bring light to my mind on all this.

I arrived in Antofagasta, Chile, where as a priest of the Cathedral I found excellent opportunities to exercise my anti-Protestant ideas. I was ready to commence my fight when evangelical literature began to reach me. I read it with disgust. Later I read some Protestant books that I had dared to place in my private library.

Little by little a current of sympathy began to replace the mortal hatred that I had had up to that time against Protestantism. I saw clearly that Protestantism is not what it is said to be, not what is taught to be in the Roman Catholic theological halls of learning. The evangelical books were full of profound teaching drawn from the holy books of the Bible. Between them and the Catholic books, there existed no difference that I could see other than that they lacked the "imprimi potest" of the Romanist-approved books.

When it came to the lives of the evangelical believers, however, there was a notable difference between them and the average Roman Catholic. I would have desired that my faithful adherents live as morally and correctly as those hated Protestants.

Unforeseen circumstances took me from Chile to Bolivia. A few months later I was appointed to the honourable position of National Counsellor of the Catholic Student Organization, called the J.E.C. The nomination was made and signed by the Archbishop of La Paz. I came in touch with the best Bolivian people, that is to say, with her marvellous young people of the J.E.C. They surged with abundance of life and enthusiasm—a snowballing force within the ranks of Catholic Action.

My heavy responsibilities retarded for a time the evolution that had commenced in my soul toward Protestantism. Yet God continued the work that He had started, and I not only had the opportunity to get acquainted with evangelical books and tracts, but also to meet some strong evangelicals.

My Catholic faith and priesthood were close to irreparable shipwreck. I wanted to make some supreme effort to save them. Could it not be that all this was a diabolic temptation like similar cases I had heard of? I wrote a book called, The Priest and The Host, which though not published had the official approbation of the diocese. I went to the Epistle to the Hebrews for inspiration in writing the book. I did not find there the Catholic priesthood that I was looking for. The only priest spoken of was Jesus Christ, who "once in the end of the world" by His personal sacrifice "put away sin" (Hebrews 9:26).

Then I read in Hebrews 10:17-18 the impossibility of another offering for sin. How is it that from Roman Catholic pulpits it is preached that the Mass is the BLOODLESS RENEWAL of the very sacrifice of the Cross if this epistle teaches that there is no possibility of repeating that which Christ did once and for all? And of what value is a bloodless sacrifice if the same writer teaches that "without shedding of blood is no remission" (Hebrews 9:22)? For this reason he says that having accomplished eternal redemption the Eternal High Priest of the New Testament ascended on high where NOW He intercedes for us in the presence of God (Heb. 1:3; 7:25).

When I finished my study of the Epistle to the Hebrews, I felt that an invisible and omnipotent hand stripped me of my vestments and my priestly character. The only priesthood is that recorded by St. Peter, "Ye, also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up SPIRITUAL SACRIFICES, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ" (I Peter 2:5). It is the same that is referred to in Hebrews: "By Him therefore let us offer THE SACRIFICE OF PRAISE to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His Name" (Heb. 13:15).

I then saw the uselessness and falsity of purgatory, since the same writer tacitly says that Jesus Christ is our purgatory, by offering His Life on the Cross, "when He had by Himself PURGED OUR SINS, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on High" (Heb. 1:3). If Christ purged our sins, how is it that souls that are saved now have to go to purgatory to be purified? What kind of purgatory do the Catholics have that it is not once mentioned in the Bible?

After this there lacked only the opportunity to reach the goal that with such clarity appeared in the distance. God intervened by putting me in touch with a young pastor whose natural intelligence was combined with a profound love for God and an extraordinary knowledge of the Scriptures. He was the director of the Indian Bible Institute in La Paz, Samuel Joshua Smith. This was my first real personal contact with a "Heretic." His conversation illuminated my mind, dispelled my doubts, and comforted my heart to the point of making it valiant. What did I care for the lies and the threats of the Catholics, since I had discovered the truth?

The next day I repeated the visit, and at its close Samuel Joshua said, "What keeps you from accepting Christ as your only and sufficient Saviour?" I felt my heart melt with celestial bliss which choked me with emotion, while tears coursed down my cheeks. Nothing more was needed but to pronounce the words: I accepted Jesus Christ with full conviction.

Christ became my only Saviour, for none other had died on the Cross for me. He also became my sufficient Saviour because His blood is all powerful to wash my sins from my soul. How miserably the rites and ceremonies and human traditions of Romanism had failed to cleanse the soul.

It was only then that I understood what Jesus meant when He said: "No man cometh unto the Father, but by Me" (John 14:6). I asked forgiveness for having wandered for so many years in wrong paths, and I was determined to walk by that Way, which is Christ Jesus.

From that moment I knew myself to be a NEW CREATURE in Christ Jesus (II Cor. 5:17). I realized at the same time that God justified me, and lifted from my heart the enormous burden that had until that moment mercilessly weighed me down. Yes, I had "passed from death unto life."

I still had to continue for two months my normal activities in Romanism. It was necessary to evaluate all the details before taking a definite step. Those months were the darkest days of my life, but God finally broke the cords that had held me prisoner for so long. One bright afternoon I arrived at the Evangelical Church in Miraflores, La Paz. I quickly took off my gown. Dressed in civilian clothes, I sat down to a cup of tea, and I entered into the spiritual, simple, intimate conversation with the brethren, feeling as though I had always known them.

In this manner the curtain fell that put an end to the tragedy that had existed throughout my nineteen long years in the priesthood.

—("The Bolivian Indian Mission").

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the Editor, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

AN ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

The word "ecumenical" has become very popular in church circles during the past forty years. It was not new forty years ago; for it was in common use to characterise those ancient councils of the church whose decisions had been accepted in East and West. The Ecumenical Councils were ecumenical not only from the representative character of their members but more significantly from the recognition given to them by all Christians. Nicaea, Ephesus, Constantinople, Chalcedon are great names in the theological text-books and church histories—in those cities councils met and after long, and at times angry and embittered, debates rejected doctrinal errors and defined the Christian faith on a firm Scriptural basis.

What does the word "ecumenical" mean? Simply, "the world," or that part of it which was within the bounds of the Roman Empire. We read in the Gospel of St. Luke that Caesar Augustus the Emperor published a decree that all the world should be enrolled in census registers. This Emperor could make no claim to enrol the peoples of India or the Far East, or of Africa, but only of the Empire, and the term for "world" was "oikoumene," whence the word we write of—"ecumenical."

* * *

An alternative word in use in the same connection is "general," and in the Thirty-Nine Articles of religion there is a reference to "General Councils," by which are indicated those we have named. Are we to say that there are but four "general" or "ecumenical" councils? Two more might be added, as two others repeated the same definitions and upheld them. But if we go beyond that we are involved in councils which did things for which the Holy Scriptures gave them no warrant. For example, the Second Council of Nicaea, held in A.D. 787 (over four hundred years after the first Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325, and over three hundred years after the fourth ecumenical Council, Chalcedon A.D. 451), put forward the definition—

"We decide that the holy images, whether painted or graven, or of whatever kind they be, ought to be exposed to view. Whether in churches, upon the sacred vessels and vestments, upon walls, or in private houses, or by the wayside. Since the oftener Jesus Christ, His blessed Mother, and the saints are seen in their images, the more will men be led to think of the originals and to love them. Salutation and the adoration of honour ought to be paid to images, but not to the worship of Latria, which belongs to God alone: nevertheless it is lawful to burn lights before them, and to cense them, as is usually done with the Cross, the books of the Gospels and other sacred things, according to the pious use of the ancients. For honour so paid to the image is transmitted to the original, which it represents. Such is the doctrine of the holy fathers, and the tradition of the Catholic church; and we order that they who dare to think or teach otherwise, be they bishops or other clerics, shall be deposed."

* * *

It is plain that by the passing of seven hundred years since the time when our Lord was on earth, grave deterioration of spiritual thought and custom had come about. The ancient fathers of the church may not be held responsible for the observances ordered by this second Council of Nicaea. Where was God's Commandment in A.D. 787? Was "Latria" (worship of God) all that the Commandment meant? "Thou shalt not bow down to them or worship them" seems decisive enough, yet men will get around the Commandment by making distinctions which Moses did not make. Was it really plausible to claim that "honour paid to the image is transmitted to the original" when there developed a belief that certain images were more wonderful than others? If the image of a saint in one particular place is thought to work wonders which the image of the same saint somewhere else does not do, are we not faced with a belief that the particular image has a virtue in itself? Is the honour paid, or the reverence, or the worship (call it what you will), not directed to that individual image rather than to the saint now in heaven whose representation it is?

* * *

The trouble with all these developments is that they combine over the centuries to make Christianity somehow different from its original. Though not Oxford Groupers, or adherents of Dr. Buchman, we hope our readers will agree with us in upholding "first-century Christianity" as the standard of all our spiritual thought, and as the essential expression of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." Councils, ecumenical and non-ecumenical, have their place in the life of the church of God, but it is not enough to respect the sincerity of the members, or the earnest and responsible points of view they express—we must always compare their statements of the Christian faith with the written Word. The Church committed itself to that written word in the days of its youth and freshness of its vision and vocation, and it has not since become a separate source of truth and dogma.

* * *

The Roman Catholic Church (unlike the Eastern Orthodox Church) considers several Western and mediaeval councils to be ecumenical, speaking for the entire Christian world. Apart from them there have been numerous local and provincial councils and synods of varying usefulness and importance.

Protestants naturally fix attention on one mediaeval council, the third Lateran Council of A.D. 1215 because it formulated certain doctrines which we recognise to be distinctively "Roman," and which at the Reformation our churches disowned and rejected. This Council of 1215 held in the Palace of the Lateran in Rome under Pope Innocent III gave the world the official doctrine of the Transubstantiation of the elements of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ in the Mass. It has sometimes been said that this doctrine was read out to the Council as a canon put forward by Innocent III himself, and not officially debated by the assembly but only silently agreed to. However it does not appear to have been contested, and we suppose that it is rightly regarded as coming from this Council.

The theologian Scotus wrote "Before the Lateran Council Transubstantiation was not a dogma of faith." We think there is little ground for denying that after the Council it was a dogma.

Yet close on twelve hundred years had gone since the Passover night in the Upper Room in Jerusalem when Our Lord gave thanks and blessed the Bread and the Cup, and told His little flock to "Do this in remembrance of Me." Can we believe that the faithful through those centuries were deficient in necessary truth, or defective in worship, or disabled in the Christian path because they were ignorant of a theory of the scholastic philosophers, or because they simply knew why they received the Sacrament without theorising how? The age-long answer to the question "how?" is of course "By faith."

* * *

Pope Innocent also furnished the Lateran Council with a canon recognising that there is but one sacrifice, the Mass, and that it can only be celebrated by a priest lawfully ordained. Some rule was made about "the sacrament of penance," and in common with other Councils, decrees were carried to reform abuses of one kind or another.

* * *

From most aspects we can say that Rome's supreme Council was the Council of Trent which met, on and off, during the middle years of the sixteenth century at Trent in Tyrol. That was a centre equally convenient for Germany and Italy.

For long years the best men in the Church had called for a reforming Council, and the project had constantly been postponed. When the Council met it was too late. When it began the Protestant Reformation had already become permanent, so that the Council which ought to have reformed Europe under the guidance of the New Testament, could only quarrel with the Reformers, condemn what it took to be their teaching, and then pass many necessary decrees on discipline. Though Trent was a failure because it was too late, it was also a failure in that it could not appreciate the new light of Holy Scripture which had come to stay, and could not be shut out. It's only answer was to take the false step of placing tradition on an equality with Holy Scripture. It then provided a supplementary creed, turning into articles of faith what the wiser minds of the Mediaeval age were content to leave as devout opinions

* * *

Thus we may see how later Councils moved away from the secure ground work of Holy Scripture which had marked the ancient and truly ecumenical councils. In so doing they lost all right to be considered "ecumenical" or universal. A council must be true to the past as well as to the present.

* * *

It may be accepted that between the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century, and the Vatican Council of 1870 no event of great significance comparable to the Reformation took place. We know of course that in 1854 Pope Pius IX declared that the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin was a divinely revealed truth, but it was not a matter of supreme concern to the Christian world. But the dogma of the 1870 Council created an insuperable barrier between Rome and the rest of the world for the dogma declared it a divinely revealed truth that the Pope when officially, as head of the church, defines a doctrine of faith or morals he is infallible. Supernaturally safeguarded from error in these circumstances, the Popes, past and future, are not simply defining Christian points of view, but are defining "truths necessary to salvation."

* * *

To-day, much interest is being shown in the projected Vatican Council which the present Pope has called. While we have no information about a new dogma, we have, like everyone else, read that the immediate aim is the reunion with Rome of the Eastern churches. That means trying to undo the effects of the separation which is popularly dated from 1054 A.D.

For centuries Rome proselytised from the Eastern churches, and formed branches of her communion in imitation of Eastern churches, with Eastern rites and customs. These were called Uniate churches, and they in turn were subject to inducements to give up their Eastern or Greek observances and to become Latinised or Westernised. Several papal letters condemned these attempts. The new Council will try to win over the entire Greek Orthodox faith. We have little confidence that it can succeed. We imagine that the Orthodox Greeks in Yugoslavia have not forgotten the massacres and atrocities inflicted upon them during the late war by Western Roman Catholics under Pavelik, etc. It is also unlikely that the Russian Orthodox will either favour such reunion or remain neutral. The project may well be represented as an effort to extend Western influences into Eastern Europe. It will surprise us greatly if the New Council brings about any measure of union with Rome. It may, however, influence such branches of Orthodoxy as are well away from the Iron Curtain.

* * *

The proposed Council is not meant to co-operate with Protestants. They have only one duty in the eyes of Rome, and that is to submit. Rome, nevertheless, is showing more interest in World Protestantism than formerly: We note that the non-Roman Catholic "ecumenical" movement increasingly attracts attention, and a semi-official arrangement of "observers" is now provided, as witness the recent World Council of Churches committee meeting in St. Andrew's.

Though we are not indiscriminating admirers of the policies of the World Council of Churches, we are satisfied that the Council is moving neither to Rome's camp nor to Moscow's. We believe that our Protestant churches have enough basic Protestant strength of conviction to safeguard them. It is better to converse about our deep differences than to be silent. Perhaps the true strength of Protestantism will yet be shown in the presentation to the World of plain and honest facts of God's revelation and of evangelical Scriptural faith—many in Rome may welcome the positive Gospel if our Protestant spokesman will lovingly affirm it.

* * *

If Protestantism's leaders are expected to appear in white sheets, as penitents our answer must be "No." If there is a disposition (in some at least) to hear us, then we may welcome it and believe that our words will bear fruit.

COMMUNISM AND CHINA.

Rev. Hedley Bunton was an L.M.S. missionary in China many years ago and recently returned to Hong Kong to resume his ministry after having been forced some years ago to leave by the Communists. Here is a portion of the letter dealing with China, the remaining portion deals with Japan.

"It is now eight months since we left Australia and took up residence and work again in Hong Kong. Normally we would not be sending out another letter to all our friends until just before Christmas, but recent events in Asia make it important that we should write now. There are two things to write about: first, the true state of affairs in Communist China, and second, our visit to Japan this month.

"Now that we have had plenty of time to gather first-hand news of the situation on the Chinese mainland and to evaluate it we must pass on to you our findings. It is important to do so in view of the persistent efforts of Communism everywhere to give a false picture of life in Communist China in order to back up its world strategy which at present is to lull the free world into a sense of security, thus preparing the way for the infiltration of their ideas and their people and our eventual take-over by Communism. Their strategy takes several forms:

"(a) Encouraging business men to get their Governments to permit trade with Communist China. Our desire for financial profits make us easy targets and actually if we fall for this we are fulfilling one of Lenin's own prophecies. He said years ago that when the capitalist nations start to trade with the Communist world they will be providing the finance for their own ultimate destruction.

"(b) Inviting politicians, educationalists and trade unionists on tours of inspection of the Chinese mainland so that they will go back to their own countries to assure the public that all is well and to urge that Communist China should be admitted to the United Nations. This would mean sacrificing the 20 million free Chinese in Formosa and other Asian and Pacific areas who neither want nor approve of the Communist Government in their homeland. These people have as much right to live in freedom as we have.

"(c) Asking Protestant church leaders to go on conducted tours of the Chinese churches so that they will return and report that the church still exists under Communism and everybody seems contented. We have first-hand reports of the way everything is stage-managed on such tours and of the real situation about the churches and the way they are controlled by the Government. Communism is against God and works always for the control and ultimate destruction of the church.

"The following are some facts that we have obtained. They are not from anti-Communist propaganda but from ordinary people who have recently escaped from Communist China, others who have come from there to visit relations here and then gone back, and still others who have gone from here to visit relatives and then returned again.

"1. LIVING CONDITIONS — In the villages and small towns beyond the great city areas the people have been drafted into communes. Family life has been completely broken up. Husbands, wives and children are separated from each other and only allowed to see each other occasionally. The centuries-old Chinese family system which had so much to give to the world through the virtues of loyalty and filial piety is being smashed so that the Communist State may more easily control every single individual. Please read the recent "Reader's Digest" article on the Chinese communes. Practically every detail of that account we have had confirmed by Chinese who have recently come over the border into Hong Kong and who have never heard of "The Reader's Digest," much less read it.

"2. FOOD — Even rice, the staple diet, has been scarce for some months past and people have not been able to get enough to eat even in the communes. In the cities, people have to be at the street markets in the queue as early as 4 a.m. with their ration tickets in order to get even a few scraggly vegetables. Meat is but a memory and cooking fat likewise. Hong Kong has an abundance of everything to eat and most of it is sent from the South China area in order to get foreign exchange for the Communists. The food scarcity is also because the whole economy of the country was disrupted by the establishment of the communes and through putting so many of the population on to the terrific drive to produce iron and steel.

"3. CLOTHING — Everybody has to dress alike in plain, dark blue cotton material. Shoes are difficult to buy, even the common wooden clogs used by so many. Many people say that although the Communists claim there are no beggars in China, in truth, most of the common people are now beggars.

"4. MONEY is scarce. Everybody has to work as directed by the Government and in many cases wages are replaced by ration tickets. Even the few people who do have a little money cannot buy very much with it because the things just are not in the shops to buy. People who receive remittances from relations overseas have to deposit it with the Government bank (there are no others). The relation of one such person told us that the Government official said that as there wasn't anything to spend the money on it should be left with the bank. At various times the Government deducted certain amounts from it as 'contributions' to specific patriotic causes until eventually there was none left. Remittances from overseas Chinese to relations in Communist China have dropped by millions of dollars for this reason.

"5. CHURCHES — Peking which used to have over a hundred churches now has four. Shanghai had more than two hundred and it is now reported that only twelve remain. Canton churches used to number over seventy but within the next few months the Communist plan is to reduce them to three. People's lives have been so organised that they are left no time to go to church except the aged and few others who risk official disapproval. This gives the Government the opportunity to say that all those church buildings are not being used adequately now so they should be handed over. The son of an old colleague told me about his father's recent experience. The Government asked the church to make a present of the building to the country as a patriotic gesture. 'You can guess what that meant,' said the son, 'they had to hand it over.'

"Ministers, who have always been suspect because of the church's links with foreign countries, now have to attend indoctrination classes three days a week, and for another three have to work on farms or in some 'productive' work. They are only permitted to attend to their churches on Sundays. With so many churches closed, ministers are drafted into other work and sent to other parts of the country. The Religious Affairs Bureau, which is not a church organisation, but a Government department for the control of the churches, has insisted that ministers guarantee that they will obey the Government in everything. Here are some of the guarantees they have had to give: That they will co-operate in the Government's religious policy, expose freelance evangelists and underground home services, improve their own political (i.e., Communist) study and organise similar study classes for laymen in every church. There are many other points of a similar nature on which they must give guarantees.

"Let no church leaders who are invited to Communist China think that they have been invited by the Chinese Church, for it has no authority to invite. It can only do so at the bidding of the Government, and then everything is carefully planned even to the answers that must be given to the questions which the Communists know will be asked. But it will all have the appearance of freedom and spontaneity. We know because we have had long talks with reliable Chinese who have actually been put through their paces by the Communists for such occasions.

"Remember that in dealing with Communists and their State we are dealing with dedicated people who will stop at nothing to achieve the objectives in which they believe. Morality does not count and they will use our fairminded attitudes to promote their own ends whether we be church people, educationalists, politicians, trade unionists or just starry-eyed idealists. They will also use our weaknesses of ambition, pride, lust, bitterness, avarice and love of flattery, maybe without our knowing it, to achieve their immediate and long-range objectives.

"In our desire to be fair and 'objective,' about Communism and to live in peace with our neighbours in the world, we must not be blind to the unchanging determination of Communist leaders to hoodwink us, to divide us and so to conquer.

"Communism has five major objectives at present in the world: (1) To consolidate China; (2) To win India; (3) To divide Europe; (4) To keep the pot boiling in Africa; (5) To isolate America. Here in Asia their grand objective is masterly in its conception. They aim to link the tremendous manpower of China with the industrial might of Japan and the great natural resources of Indonesia. If they achieve these objectives they will be well on their way to winning the world. They have China, Indonesia is going their way and they want to bring Japan into their control by 1960.

"The answer to all this is not anti-communism, but that does not mean being unreal about Communism itself. We need to recognise that it is basically opposed to freedom, morality, the life of the spirit and all that Christianity stands for. But we also need to bring the answer to communists and others who sincerely believe it is the only way to bring social and economic justice to the world. We need to realise that Asia and the world is nearer to being taken over by this ideology than ever before, and that we must find the answer in time."

—("The Vigilant", Melbourne).

NEW ARCHBISHOP MUST "COMMAND RESPECT"

The appointment of a new Archbishop of Canterbury within the next few years is envisaged in the latest edition of "Crockford's Clerical Directory." By tradition, the author of the preface, officially described as "a person of distinction in the Church of England" remains anonymous.

The preface says: "It is very possible that before the next general election, Mr. Macmillan will have to nominate a new Archbishop of Canterbury." Discussing "The kind of leadership the Church will need in the next decade," it continues: "Let it be said first what is not needed. The Church does not want a colourless, quiet, efficient administrator. The Lambeth administration has largely been remodelled by Dr. Fisher, something that needed to be done and has been well done, and his successor need not be greatly worried by such matters.

Two Tasks Ahead

"The new archbishop must, of course, have a reasonable competence at business, but he need not have more, and it would indeed be a disaster if he were thought of as primarily an administrator, nor should he be a man who will make frequent pronouncements.

"Two principal tasks lie ahead—reform and evangelism. The revision of the Canon Law is only now approaching its most difficult stage, one at which the relations of Church and State are inescapably pressed upon the public attention.

Courage to Speak

"The archbishop who presides over this, which is the final stage, must know clearly where the Church is going, and must be a man who can distinguish between what is important and what is not, a man who will have the courage to speak plainly to extremists of all kinds in the Church and also the Ministers of the Crown and to Parliament."

With canon law revision went liturgical revision. The archbishop must be, in this respect, a man who was himself aware of the need of reform, not a man upon whom it had to be pressed.

"The archbishop... need not be a popular speaker, broadcaster or television figure, but he must be a man who, when he speaks, commands respect because he has something of worth to say.

Older Precedents?

"It is doubtful whether more than one or two members of the present Episcopate answer these requirements. If the Prime Minister were to come to the conclusion that there is none, he might well break with precedent and look abroad, or follow older precedents and choose among those who are not bishops.

"The Church to-day, as in 1942, needs the fresh air that William Temple brought to Lambeth. It should be possible to find a man who has some of his greatness and fewer of his defects."

The preface also states: "The Lambeth Conference ought not to be allowed to continue in its present form... for the next conference there must be some drastic reorganisation of plan involving either a reduction of the field to be covered or some extension of the time allowed.

"We also suggest that the secrecy which is supposed to envelop the proceedings should be reconsidered. The deliberations of the various committees may rightly remain private, but there should be some lifting of secrecy as far as concerns the debates which determine the resolutions of the conference."

In a reference to the death of Pope Pius XII and the election of Pope John, the preface says: "The late Pope was a man of great personal piety and austerity, but on whose pontificate disappointed many of the hopes with which its beginnings were surrounded.

"In the definition of the Dogma of the Assumption, he raised yet another barrier between Roman Catholics and other Christians, and in the last years of his life particularly he gave to the Papacy a character of personal absolutism almost without precedent.

Many Changes

"His successor already has made many changes, and seems determined both to spare the Papacy of much of the glamour of remoteness that has surrounded it and to remind Roman Catholics that the Pope is, after all, a bishop among bishops. It is the assumption that St. Peter was given powers different in kind from those given to the other apostles that is the root of the separation between Rome and the rest of Orthodox and Catholic Christendom.

"How far any Pope can retreat from that position is doubtful, but history shows that the Roman Church is capable of repudiating almost any position that has become untenable, and Pope John has at least given indications of a new spirit in his attitude to non-Roman Christians.

"It is also clear that his ideas are meeting obstruction, and English Churchmen would be very unwise to rest their hopes too much upon the liberal currents flowing from Germany and France.

Powerful Hierarchies

"The English, American and Spanish hierarchies are still very powerful, and the more realistic among us will not be surprised if they can obstruct even a Pope.

"Anglicans should be eager to welcome every move that is made from Rome, but they must realise that issues have to be settled with the Roman Catholics in England. Relations have been very difficult in the past and they are still not too easy. It is necessary for us to bear in mind that Roman Catholics have memories of persecution and exclusion from public life.

Genuine Desire

"It is true that a good many English Roman Catholics are insulting in their language and behaviour towards Anglicans, but there are also those who regret this unmannerliness and whose desire for better relations between the two Communions is genuine and sincere.

"While there is no predictable possibility of union with Rome we should, nevertheless, look out for and welcome all possibilities of co-operation. Even in England, the Roman ice can be thawed by friendliness, and Anglicans should be quick to respond to the geniality of the new Pope."

—"Irish Times," 8-7-1960.

[As things are, the World generally regards the Archbishop of Canterbury as the mouth-piece of English-speaking Protestantism—the significance of his office is more than Anglican. So it is a matter of general interest to speculate about the future, and as the "Irish Times" says, the editor of "Crockford" surveys the prospect widely. To us it seems extraordinary to suggest that of the eighty to ninety diocesan and suffragan bishops of the provinces of Canterbury and York "it is doubtful whether more than one or two members of the present episcopate answer the requirements." The fact is that many a man grows to fill his office (e.g. Archbishop Garbett of York). Another fact is the gift of God's grace for the work: is that to be overlooked?

Maybe the fault is not in the man but in the supposed requirements, which are more likely to be assumed than analysed].

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 97.

"To-day industry and commerce are outbidding government administration, educational and cultural spheres of life. Recruiting campaigns for every type of business and profession are being extended to reach the teenager as well as the student and the under-graduate."

But, the Bishop said, that the response to them came not only from those who were attracted by the material incentive such as good pay and early retirement, but also from a sense that one could serve the Church in every field of activity.

—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph", 1/7/'60).

* * *

Roman Catholic Enquiry Centre

It is claimed that, since 1954, 143,532 people have replied to the newspaper advertisements put in by the Roman Catholics; of these 77,392 have actually taken the course, and they state that 5,561 are known to have been received into the Church of Rome as a result. Last year alone, they claim that 25,679 replied to the advertisements, and out of these 13,109 enrolled for the postal course of instruction. Rome maintains that they only accept for tuition non-Roman Catholics who are either unable or unwilling to receive personal instruction.

[We feel sure that a large proportion of the enquiries is made up of those who want to know what Rome says, but have no purpose of going over: We ourselves would readily enquire, had we not already the information].

* * *

A New Bible Dictionary (Inter-Varsity Fellowship)

For nearly two years work has been proceeding on the Inter-Varsity Fellowship's new Bible Dictionary, publication of which is provisionally planned for the autumn of 1961. Some 140 contributors are involved, representing twenty-five countries, and already nearly 1,000 articles have been received. In major entries especially, the Editors have gone to great pains in the allocation of work, so that established scholars could give the benefit of their researches over the years.

In the Old Testament field Prof. A. Van Selms, of Pretoria, writes on Law, Prof. N. H. Ridderbos, of Amsterdam, on Isaiah, Mr. D. J. Wiseman on Assyria and Babylonia, and Prof. J. L. Kelso, of Pittsburgh on Fortification and Siegecraft.

Prof. R. V. G. Tasker contributes the article on Matthew's Gospel, Dr. J. N. Geldenhuys that on Luke, and Prof. N. B. Stonehouse on Canon of the New Testament. Prof. E. M. Blaiklock is responsible for many of the articles falling within the classical field, including those on Art and Architecture in the New Testament.

Among the theological subjects, Dr. Leon Morris contributes Atonement, Dr. R. S. Wallace writes on Man, Dr. J. I. Packer on Incarnation, and Prof. John Murray, of Philadelphia, on Sin.

In line with the editorial policy of supplying such modern information as is available under individual entries, there is a treatment of the recent discoveries of Hazor, for example, and Prof. F. F. Bruce contributes an assessment of the latest findings in connection with the Dead Sea Scrolls.

A bibliography will be appended to each major entry, many illustrations are planned, and it is hoped to include new maps drawn up under the direction of Dr. J. M. Houston, of Oxford.

In a number of articles two scholars are collaborating, and four are participating in an 18,000-word entry (the longest in the book) on Text and Versions. In more specialized subjects, contributions have come from, among others, an ornithologist, a zoologist, a botanist, a geologist, and a teaching medical doctor.

The Consulting Editors are Professor F. F. Bruce, Dr. J. I. Packer, Professor R. V. G. Tasker, and Mr. D. J. Wiseman. The Organizing Editor is Dr. J. D. Douglas, the Librarian of the Tyndale Residential Library at Cambridge. It is many years since an entirely new Bible Dictionary reflecting the evangelical position has been published. It is the aim of the Editorial Panel, not only to meet this need, but to make this Bible Dictionary a real contribution to scholarship.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	-----	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	-----	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	-----	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	-----	5/- "

NOTICE.

*Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-*

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	— —	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	— —	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	— —	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	— —	—	0 4
The Confessional	— —	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing
"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

THE WORLD NEEDS

THE WORD OF GOD

"this gospel must first be published
among all nations".

TO SUPPLY THIS NEED . . .

many missionaries, ministers and Christian workers at home and abroad
look to the

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY,
7, BURY PLACE, LONDON, W.C.1.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 10.—LXIX.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"—Rev. F. H. Kinoh, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,

BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free.

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	109
The Bible and the Roman Church	112
Editor's Chair	114
Everyone an Archaeologist in Israel	116
Comment	117
The Perfecting of the Redeemed	118

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Symbol of Solidarity

On Reformation Day, October 31st last, the rebuilt Reformation Memorial Church at Worms, Germany, was dedicated, states a news dispatch from West Germany. The first Church was built in the 18th century on what was generally recognized to be the site of the council at which in 1521, before the German emperor and princes, Martin Luther refused to recant his teachings and made his famous declaration: "Here I stand. I can do no other. God help me." Its capacity of 5,000 made it Germany's largest church. In 1945 it was destroyed by bombs and at first there was little prospect of raising the $500,000 needed for reconstruction. But the Worms parishes set up a fund and started patiently to collect money.

The response to their appeals was unexpected. Donations began to pour in from all over the world, from 20,000 Christians in African villages, Eskimo settlements, poor evangelical communities in Latin America as well as from Germans and even from U.S. employees in Germany. A number of West German cities and most states made substantial contributions. The new church stands as a symbol of solidarity among all the Reformation churches which contributed to its reconstruction.

—("The Sentinel", April, 1960).

* * *

Chinese Communists Attack the Family

One of the most sinister features of the present Communist regime in China is the attempt to break up family life, which has been one of the strongest forces in Chinese civilization for many centuries. Thousands of former housewives are conscripted to work in factories and street services, as well as for the mass production of iron and steel, and various trades. They have to eat in community mess halls, while the children are taken to community nurseries run by committees. A correspondent of "The Times" states that the people are left with little choice, for in the interior towns as soon as the mess halls are opened they have to surrender their kitchen utensils. If the zealots have their way, it is said, all personal property will belong to the commune. The Communists deny that the family is "a living unit." The old family system, considered as a financial unit, will be demolished. "The relation between husbands and wives will then be that they only live together but eat separately because they may not work and study together. Although the parents and children will not live together all the year long, they will still see each other frequently. This could be called a new family system, but it is no longer a basic unit that organizes society. The family will not exist as a cell forming the society after the extinction of its influence as a production unit, economic unit, and educational unit." The people's admitted preference for "a small family, so as to love its warmth and to enjoy themselves in the natural happiness", elicited the retort that this is "a stubborn prejudice formed because people have been accustomed to that kind of life for so many years."

—("The Christian", 20/8/'60).

* * *

War on E. German Churches—Progress of atheist campaign

Bonn, July 27.

The East German authorities have announced with some pride that 135,000 boys and girls took part this year in the atheistical "Youth Initiation" classes and ceremonies, in which they take vows to the State. They comprise 88 per cent of all children of school-leaving age. The ceremonies take place at Easter and have been instrumental in causing a disastrous drop in church confirmations.

Some approximate figures may indicate the extreme difficulties of the Christian churches in an East German state in which organised religion is being slowly strangled by a mixture of periodic pressure and active propagation of atheistical doctrine. The following are the most operative:

1. This year only one out of every 10 children of school-leaving age was given church confirmation; 15 years ago four children out of five were confirmed, and only 4 per cent of the people of Eastern Germany were registered as having no religion.

2. Youth initiation has meanwhile increased from 44 per cent in 1958 to over 80 per cent last year. The East German regime's target for 1961 is 90 per cent and will probably be reached comfortably.

3. The number of church baptisms has dropped by roughly half since last year. This is due to the institution of "State Naming Ceremonies" in which parents dedicate their children to the service of the state.

4. The numbers of people leaving the churches are increasing all the time. An example quoted by West Berlin sources is that of the Evangelical Parish of Halle. More than 5,000 people have openly declared their abandonment of all connections with the church during each of the last two years.

5. Attendance at church services is decreasing. In medium sized towns there are usually only 50 or 60 people in the congregation at Sunday morning service. This has happened without the East German State taking steps to prevent people physically from going to church.

The active propagation of atheism is being continually stepped up. One of its most recent manifestations has been the publication of a new official "Guide to Atheism" which states that religion, "like other capitalist creations," must disappear. The book has been produced by three editors and 29 contributors, most of whom are members of the Socialist Unity Party.—"The Guardian," 28-7-1960.

* * *

Discoveries in a Biblical City—Wealth of Material

Amman, July 21.

Late Bronze Age remains have been discovered in the 4,000-year-old biblical city of Gibeon, now named the village of El-Jib, five miles north-west of Jerusalem in the Jordan sector, by American archaeologists headed by Dr. James Pritchard, of California.

The director of Jordan's Antiquities Department said the excavation of this ancient Hivite city dating back to the iron and bronze ages was particularly important because of the large amount of inscriptional material that had been found.

He said a wall more than three feet thick surrounded the biblical city and the expedition had found jars, pottery, lamps, arrows, dishes, scarabs, copper daggers and dolls. It had also unearthed tombs, skeletons, knives, and seals, huge stone walls, a stone-paved road, a well more than nine feet deep, and a cave with five entrances.

Dr. Pritchard, of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, Berkeley, California, discovered the biblical pool of Gibeon last year during a similar expedition.—Reuter.

* * *

Research into Crime—Helping cause of Justice

By our Legal Correspondent

Professor Leon Radcinowicz, the director of the Institute of Criminology at Cambridge, opened the first scientific and general meeting of the newly formed British Academy of Forensic Sciences, with a presidential address at the London Hospital Medical College.

Professor Radcinowicz said that in the last fifteen years there had been intensified interest in criminology. Under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, the Home Secretary had been empowered for the first time to give financial assistance to those engaged in the study of crime. The present Home Secretary had appointed a statistical adviser and had set up a Home Office research council. There was also the advisory council on the treatment of offenders—a standing body ready to deal with problems of crime and punishment, and to receive research material.

It was no longer permissible to approach crime on the basis that it was the result of one single cause; that unilateral approach had to be abandoned. Factors tending to lead to criminality acquired a different meaning to research workers. Economic factors, for example, did not have the meaning to-day that they had 50 years ago.

Underdeveloped

It was also important that the criminologist realised that his researches could influence the criminal law, but at the same time that the independence of the criminal law should remain. Criminology should help the administration of criminal justice and should not replace it.

Professor Radcinowicz said that the forensic sciences presented a composite group. There was the traditional subject of forensic medicine, or medical jurisprudence, which was taught with inspiring example at Edinburgh University. But this example had not been maintained and demonstrated the underdeveloped state of the teaching of, and research in forensic sciences.

There was also forensic psychiatry, forensic psychology (the study of attitudes of all those who took part in criminal proceedings), and police science. All these topics were barely studied either in the schools of medicine or in the law faculties. It was these matters to which the conference could usefully turn its attention.—“The Guardian,” 23-7-1960.

[The causes of criminality and crime will always be misunderstood if man is studied from merely biological, economic, or psychological points of view. The root of criminality (whether in crimes amenable to the law or not) is in rebellion against God. Wrongdoing is as common among the affluent as among the poor, and multitudes, hard pressed economically, are honest and upright.

Ignorance of God's commandments is one thing, but deliberate rejection of them is another. If, as Professor Radeinowicz says, “it was no longer permissible to approach crime on the basis that it was the result of one single cause” we assume that he refers only to isolating a single social or economic factor. But if he rejects the basic moral factor, that “the heart of man is desperately sick” (Jer. 17. 9, R.V. “Utterly corrupt” Berkeley version; “desperately corrupt” S.R.V.) he is missing the realities of the problem. The whole duty of man is “to fear God and keep His Commandments” (Ecclesiastes 12, 13)—if that is forgotten academic researches will produce no remedy].

* * *

Mystery grows over opening of Miracle Letter

What has happened to the third secret of Fatima? It is a secret which many Roman Catholics believe is a prophecy of the future of mankind. Millions of people had expected that it would be revealed on May 13. Now, surprised and disappointed, they are waiting and hoping.

May 13 was the 43rd anniversary of the first of the Madonna's reported revelations to three children in Fatima, a village in Central Portugal.

The Madonna was said to have made three revelations.

The first forecast the end of World War One. The second said that unless Russia was converted to Catholicism the world would suffer years of chaos.

And the third?

Lucian Abobora, the only survivor of the three children, wrote down the secret and gave it in a sealed envelope to the Bishop of Leiria, whose diocese includes Fatima.

She stipulated that the envelope must not be opened until 1960.

Where is the envelope now?

The bishop is reported to have handed the letter to the Pope. But Vatican officials say they cannot confirm or deny this.

Disappointing

Lucia is now a nun. She is known as Sister Maria of the Sorrows, and she lives in a convent near Coimbra, Portugal.

Only close members of her family are allowed to visit her. Her eldest sister, Maria, who saw her this week, said: “We did not talk about the secret—but I don't believe it contains anything important.”

Many people believe that the secret may now be revealed on October 13—anniversary of the last of the Madonna's revelations.

But a church official at Fatima—which is now becoming a rival to Lourdes as a religious centre—said: “I am certain the secret is not being revealed this year, because people would be very disappointed by it.”

Some Catholics are sure the secret includes a prophecy of world peace.

“It probably just says something like: ‘Pray for a peaceful world.’”

—“Sunday Express,” 7-8-1960.

[While we believe that the events associated with Fatima are psychological, and not at all an expression of the mind and word of God (though it is every Christian's duty to pray for world peace and for the conversion of atheists and materialists everywhere and not only in Russia) we would like the contents of the letter made known. As long as they are undisclosed many people will have highly imaginative notions about them. “Truth is great: let it prevail”].

* * *

Control of Exorcism

The Bishops of the Church of England have been asked by the House of Laity in the Church Assembly to take control of Exorcism, that is, the freeing of a possessing spirit and was known and practised among the Jews and in Ancient Greece. It is said to be common in many parts of Africa, and is sometimes associated here with spiritual healing. It calls for great care, for the whole subject lacks a solid basis of Christian authority. Mr. A. T. Macmillan, an elder brother of the Prime Minister, moved in the House of Laity that episcopal control of exorcism should be agreed and the resolution was carried by a large majority. The purpose was to make clear to Convocations that the laity will support them in dealing with this obscure matter, and particularly since it has received unanimous support, and recommendation from the Archbishops' Commission. Mr. Macmillan stated that he did not want to go into the question of demonology but he accepted two propositions as true. (1) Evil spirits and demons exist that do, in certain cases, affect human beings. (2) The casting out of evil spirits is part of our Lord's commission to His Church. The knowledge of possession and exorcism reveals the dangers of misuse or amateur use. There is no canon dealing with the position. A draft canon should be formulated. Before exorcism was authorised the case should be submitted by the priest concerned to the bishop of his diocese. Some opposition was expressed on the ground that such belief was regarded as unchristian and near to witchcraft. Official action would be deplorable. A delicate matter was involved containing obscure truth to be most carefully weighed.—"The Christian," 22-7-1960.

[We can make no claim to an understanding of "demon possession" and the practice of exorcism. We realise, nonetheless, that the problem may be confused and obscured by a sceptical approach or by lighthearted disregard. We note that the above extract says "the whole subject lacks a solid basis of Christian authority." But did Our Lord not say of one instance of demon possession "This kind goeth not forth save by prayer . . ."? He authorised casting out devils, and He ordered prayer for the purpose. We recently heard an experienced medical man (China and E. Africa) refer to demon possession as almost a commonplace condition, one he had frequently met with. Perhaps we fail to identify it in our midst].

* * *

Two Archaeological Cuttings from "The Christian."

Ancient Shechem

The third season of archaeological excavation at the Tell Balata site of Shechem, the Biblical city in the Nablus area, has yielded further valuable information. The work is being un-

—(Continued on p. 119.)

THE BIBLE AND THE ROMAN CHURCH

It may seem to some readers that this is a very well-worn theme. We do not apologise for it because we claim that as intelligently understood, "the Bible and the Bible only is the religion of Protestants." This famous phrase of Wm. Chillingworth the seventeenth century theologian is not preposterous. It was used of the Anglican faith in the Caroline age, and used by men who knew that the apostles had been led by the spirit of God to write in the same way as the writers of the Old Testament, so that "whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." The Apostles wrote the truth of Our Lord's Incarnate Life and its lessons and their application to the faithful and to the world. The Church was led to realise or recognise the unique character of certain writings, and other Christian writings, good in themselves, but not bearing the seal of the Holy Spirit, fell into the background.

We have in the New Testament all necessary truth for salvation. In it we have God's revealed Will. Traditions in the church may give us customs, observances, interpretations, but they cannot add one iota of saving truth to Holy Scripture. That is the sense in which we understand Chillingworth's phrase. We shall not delay to discuss the view that what is not commanded in Holy Scripture is unlawful, or the view that what is not prohibited by Holy Scripture may be allowed, for these are large questions and deserve full consideration. We content ourselves with the point of view we have stated.

* * *

It is well-known of course that Rome gives Tradition an equal place with the Bible as a source of religious doctrine. So the Bible is insufficient, and its shortcomings as a vehicle of truth have to be supplemented from Tradition. When Tradition fails us, as in the instance of the recent dogma of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, recourse is had to "the mind of the Church," to popular opinion, or to the supposed propriety or fitness of the doctrine being formulated.

* * *

This is in sharp contrast with the Protestant principle of the Bible as the treasury of revealed truth of which it may be said "whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby is not required of any man to be believed as requisite to Salvation."

It is perhaps well to point out that the major doctrines taught by Rome are in the Bible, and the Bible is cited as the authority for them—e.g. the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Holy Spirit. Of other doctrines specially distinctive of Rome we may specify Transubstantiation, the Immolation in the sacrifice of the Mass, Purgatory, the Assumption, Papal Infallibility. These demonstrate the gulf between "the religion of Protestants," and Western Latin Christianity of to-day. We see no sign that the gulf is likely to be crossed or bridged.

A very sensible and useful brief study of our topic is "The Bible and the Roman Church" by J. C. Macauley, published a few years ago by the Moody Press, Chicago, and sold here at 4/- or 4/6. We turn to one chapter "Does Rome suppress the Bible?" and find reference to the difficulties of the Bible Society in Spain, and to the hostility to New Testament distribution in French Quebec. Macauley says "Rome will answer: you are distributing Protestant Bibles and your translations are corrupt." His reply is "I say to Rome, why not distribute your own Bibles so that the Protestants will not have to distribute theirs?" He adds that Rome ought not to talk of corrupt texts of the Bible when we know the history of Pope Sixtus V's edition of the Latin Vulgate Bible, and which on account of errors had to be withdrawn, and reissued with corrections by Clement VIII.

* * *

We are aware of the existence of Modern editions of the Bible in Spanish and in French, the result of diligent Roman Catholic scholarship—what is needed is not just that these editions exist, but that they be cheaply available and enthusiastically pressed upon the public for which they are intended. If Rome concentrated on getting the New Testament into the homes and hands of all its people immense moral and spiritual good would be achieved.

Macauley also tells us of the burning of New Testaments. This is a piece of exhibitionism because no scholar will deny that the so-called Protestant New Testament is a fair and trustworthy translation of the original Greek. The two recent French translations of the Bible, the Maredsous version of the Belgian Benedictines, and the "Jerusalem" Bible of the Dominican School of Bible studies in Israel are, in text and notes, very similar to modern Protestant versions, e.g. R.V. and S.R.V. This is a development of recent years which is very significant, and shows that the bad old habit of vilifying the Protestant versions is being given up. The recent translation into English by Monsignor R. A. Knox which in its title page takes to itself the description "Authorised" is much closer to the Protestant than to the Douay Rheims version.

* * *

Macauley has a chapter on "The Perpetual Sacrifice" in which he quotes a Roman Catholic scholar who wrote that Our Lord made Himself the Sacrificial Victim in the Upper Room. The Cross at Calvary served to make what was done in the Upper Room a public act. This is a theory which appears to us to be opposed to the teaching of the Epistles which constantly speak of the Cross as the occasion of the Atonement, and never suggest that the Upper Room was the place of Our Lord's self-offering for the sin of the World. This view is, we think, made necessary as a result of the special theory of the Mass worked out in later days. Macauley clearly sets out the New Testament evidence which answers all that. He specially emphasises the lessons of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

* * *

The position given to the Blessed Virgin in the Roman Church is another point of contrast with the New Testament. It is beyond dispute that Holy Scripture teaches us nothing at all about the science of Mariology which is now parallel with Christology. "Through Mary to Christ" we would gladly acknowledge as far as Christ is the supreme object of our worship "our Lord and our God," but we find no evidence that we need anyone to mediate between ourselves and Christ. The word of the Blessed Virgin is enough for us—speaking of Her Son she says "Whatsoever He saith unto you, Do it."

As to Marian dogmas—Pohle-Preuss the eminent Roman Catholic scholars say "The dogma of the Immaculate Conception is not expressly enunciated in Sacred Scripture." Fr. S. J. Hunter is quoted as meeting this difficulty by saying "This circumstance will have no weight against its acceptance except with those who assume, without a scrap of reason, that the whole of the revelation given by God is contained in the inspired Books." That circumstances, we say, weighs with Protestants. The serious aspect of the matter is that the claim is made that the dogma is necessary to salvation. Were it held as private opinion we would say little as we must respect private judgment; but, as defined, we must consider it a barrier to unity, and evidence of the true wisdom of holding that the Bible is enough for the Christian.

The Word of God in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments will survive all traditions—"the word of the Lord endureth for ever, and this is the Word which by the gospel is preached unto you," St. Peter (1. 1, 25).

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

What is hope? Is it an illusion if we hope for better things, for everlasting life, for the vision of God? Hope is intimately connected with the meaning of life and with the ultimate purpose of all things. When we think of it in this way we see that hope is a true foundation for intelligent life, and it speaks to us of significance in all things. By contrast the man who says that he thinks that the only rational basis of life is unyielding despair is talking nonsense.

When we are young we look forward, and the forward look is full of hope. That is how it ought to be of course—ambition and optimism and confidence in the fulfilment of our purposes should give shape and colour to life as we enter upon its responsibilities and opportunities. On the other hand, as we grow older we tend to look back—memories rather than hopes engage our thoughts, and the past, rather than the prospect claims our attention. Naturally as life goes on our experiences increase, and we have more and more to recall, but this ought not to dim or set aside our hopes. The nearer their fulfilment in the world of spirit the more we should draw from them inspiration and stimulus. The soul which is done with is the soul which has lost all incentives: for it hope has ceased to be a dynamic spiritual power.

* * *

How do we define hope? It is not an abstract thing but one which is made up of substantial expectations. If it is a sort of spiritual atmosphere in which we live we must consider it an aspect of the life of faith. If it is an expectation of moral and spiritual improvements and transcendences which we believe to be the Will of God, then it still remains faith, but faith unfolding itself as particular circumstances and events in the future, and matters in which we believe ourselves to be involved.

* * *

The heathen world has always had its hopes, and much of the heathen hope has reached beyond the grave. The non-Christian religious world has also its hopes. Only the atheist repudiates hope and in his self-esteem builds, as he says, upon unyielding despair. We cannot enter now upon a discussion of the non-Christian hope, but content ourselves with saying that the general and special providences of God are His decisions, not ours. We have received the light of the Gospel and by the discipleship we display our eternal hopes are measured. They have not our privileges, so our thoughts of them must be charitable.

As for the atheist who believes that he must be an atheist—does he not hold his position in what he thinks is the interest of Truth; is not the search for Truth a search for God? It may be very different with the crude and crass materialist who wants no God because he wants no obligations or duties or the moral law. No intellectual pursuit engages him; self-will is his only law. If so, there is nothing in him which is suitable for eternal life. Hope then becomes irrelevant: in such a person it rises no higher than hope for better luck or more effective willfulness.

* * *

But the Christian hope! Here we enter upon a new world of thought. We look through and beyond the veil of material things and in faith see the King in His beauty and the land that is afar. For whom is this hope? For believers. How do we know that? We know it from the plain statements of Holy Scripture—

“Being justified by faith, let us have peace with God through Our Lord Jesus Christ through Whom also we have had our access into this grace wherein we stand, and let us rejoice in hope of the glory of God." (Rom. 5, 1.) or "The God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing that ye may abound in hope, in the power of the Holy Ghost." (Rom. 15, 13).

* * *

What is the foundation of our hope? We need to be able to show the ground-work and explain that our hope has a solid basis which may be intellectually and spiritually examined, and not merely emotionally. We put forward God's written Word as the basis of our hope. It is open to investigation. The students of Semitic languages and of Greek can have their say, and the experts in the origins and growth of religions can pursue their studies. We desire that their studies should make them personally believing men who contribute something worthwhile to Biblical knowledge. Their labours however do not affect the purpose of God—"Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that through patience and through comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope." (Rom. 15, 4) and "Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work." (2 Tim. 3, 16).

God has caused all Holy Scripture to be written for our learning—we are to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, with the object of embracing the blessed hope of everlasting life given to us in Jesus Christ.

So the Christian hope is essentially the Biblical hope. We look at the Bible and ask "What does it all mean?" The answer is "It means forgiveness, peace, new life, heaven." That is our hope.

* * *

Our hope in its Biblical strength is not vague or uncertain. The man who is in the habit of catching the 8.45 train every week-day morning for many years does not approach the station each morning in a mood of profound pessimism, unrelentingly sceptical of the train's arrival; and the man who has seen time after time the Biblical view of life vindicated in the histories of men and nations, does not reject the hope set before him in the same volume. In it we read—"... we may have a strong encouragement who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us; which we have as an anchor of the soul, a hope both sure and steadfast..." (Heb. 6, 18, 19).

* * *

Hope has to do with things not seen. When we talk of present realities we are not concerned with hope; but when we look forward we are. What our senses grasp now is not the thing hope looks for. We keep in mind the words of St. Paul "hope that is seen is not hope; for who hopeth for that which he seeth? But if we hope for that which we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." (Rom. 8, 24, 25).

Here St. Paul makes the practical distinction, and shows that hope is not made nor marred by the visible things around us. The realities apparent to the senses are by no means the only realities. The world of thought is an undeniable reality, and why not the world of spirit?

We may link with this the familiar words of the epistle to the Hebrews which demand quotation.

"Faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen." (Heb. 11, 1).

The things "hoped for" are not material things, but spiritual; and they belong to man's spiritual life and end. Faith brings them near, and reason too can vouch for them. If we deny that we drain the world of meaning. It seems to us harder to believe that the world is meaningless than to believe that it is full of purpose. "The one far-off divine event" towards which all things are moving is no absurdity, no mirage, no bit of "wishful thinking," no escapism. It is an affirmation of both faith and reason. The Christian has no need to apologise to the modern world for his hopes, but he has constant need to commend his hopes to others by showing how worthwhile they are in his own life. We need to declare not only the difference Christ has made to the world, but the difference He has made to us, and more, the difference He has made in us. That will be the effective display of our hope.

* * *

How shall we express in words the full measure of our hope? It is not possible to do so, for the future realities, now unseen, exceed our powers of description because they exceed our knowledge. But we can move far in the true direction if we heed the apostle's words in 1 Timothy 1, 1—"Christ Jesus our hope," or in Col. 1, 27 "Christ in you, the hope of glory."

Our Lord Jesus Christ is enough. We need not struggle with words or labour to define the indefinable—let us say of our hope "It is Christ," and let us say of Heaven "We shall be there," and let us state its whereabouts "we shall be with Him."

When St. Paul wrote to Colosse he began by saying how he thanked God because of the Colossians' faith, and he thanked God "because of the hope which is laid up for you in the heavens," a hope which is everywhere "bearing fruit and increasing." Christ our hope is something to uplift us now, as He will raise us up hereafter. Christian hope is closely related to Resurrection—new birth and new life are assured to us in Him. God, says St. Peter, "begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." (1 Pet. 1, 3).

* * *

Our Lord in His glorious appearing will satisfy us utterly—that is "the blessed, the happy, hope" (Titus 2, 13).

* * *

In the meantime, Holy Scripture teaches us to use our hope to increase holiness, to work to spread the Gospel, to bear the trials of life, to have a happy death, and throughout life to experience and enjoy full salvation.

EVERYONE AN ARCHAEOLOGIST IN ISRAEL

The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the fabulous library of the Monastery has given the Israelis fresh zest in their search for the past.

Every man and woman in Israel is a would-be archaeologist, and in the excavation for new settlements is alert to discover relics of the past which give the newcomers a sense of being rooted. The oldest prehistoric site yet unearthed in the Middle East is near a collective agricultural village in the Jordan Valley. It was revealed by a bulldozer clearing a piece of land. The fossil bones of 35 different species of animals, including elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus and turtle, the flint tools and instruments made of water-worn pebbles, and a few fragments of human skull four times as thick as the skull of modern man, are proof that the site was inhabited by men in the Pleistocene age, between a quarter and a half million years ago.

Israel has been described as a paradise of the prehistorians; and the caves of Mount Carmel and the Galilean hills have yielded several skeletons of primitive men but there has been nothing hitherto approaching the age of this antiquity. Only in Africa, Algeria and Tanganyika have comparable sites been explored.

Cache of letters

The other important find has been the cache of letters, written by or for Bar-Kochba, the commander of the desperate Jewish rebellion in the time of the Emperor Hadrian, 135 A.D., to his commanders in the field. Some years ago two proclamations signed by him were found in an almost inaccessible cave in Jordan by English archaeologists. That put the Israeli scholars on their mettle, and they started to explore possible hide-outs in Judea. Dr. Yadin, the editor of some of the scrolls had a hunch that certain wild spots might have been retreats of the rebel command. He was justified. Fourteen letters on papyrus with four inscribed wooden tablets, tied up in a goatskin container with a woman's comb and some cosmetics, were in a cave, hidden there presumably by the wife of an officer. Most of the letters were in Aramaic, the popular language of the Middle East in the first centuries, but two were in Greek, which was spoken by intellectual Jews of Palestine as well as by gentiles. They are mostly brusque orders about supplies, and several are signed by "the Prince of Israel."

Another expedition of scholars in the happy hunting ground of the Judean wilderness lighted on a small parchment scroll with verses from the Book of Exodus. The cave where the scroll lay contained arrow heads and shafts, wooden and clay implements, and also coins of Trajan. That Roman Emperor, who fought the Jewish rebels, died 117 A.D.; and the scholars feel sure that here was another hide-out of the Jewish zealots. A vastly bigger collection of coins, Roman and Tyrian—nearly 5,000 of them—was unearthed last winter by a Druze farmer as he was ploughing his land on the Carmel. The theory of the experts is that the coins were meant for the Temple in Jerusalem, and was part of the offering sent by the Jewish communities in the northern part of the land, and buried when the collector found his way to Jerusalem barred by Roman soldiers.

Before the Captivity

Much older than these is a Hebrew inscription written with a pen on a potsherd. It was discovered in the excavation of a Judean fortress in the southern section of Israel, and is dated back to the days of the first Temple, that is, before the Babylonian captivity. The opening words: "May my Lord, the Prince, hear the words of his servants," are the formal address used also in the famous potsherd letters, unearthed 25 years ago at Lachish by an English expedition. Those fragments recorded part of the story of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion, which is told in the Book of Jeremiah. The new potsherd, when all the writing has been deciphered, may throw more light on that episode. The knowledge of every period in the history of Israel and of the Jews in the land grows from month to month. The Children of Israel today are the people of the spade as well as the people of the book.

—"The Guardian" 23-7-1960.

COMMENT.

THE ECUMENICAL COUNCIL

It is now said that the Vatican's Ecumenical Council will be held in 1962. Publicity already given to the supposed programme of the Council leads us to understand that Christian unity will be a main object of the deliberations. The primary intention is to encourage "the return" of Eastern orthodox churches to communion with Rome. We have lately commented on this, and said that the influence of Russian orthodoxy can scarcely tell in favour of union with Rome. We do not know what sort of relationship now exists among the orthodox churches some of which are on one side of the Iron Curtain, and some on the other. It is reasonable to think that the churches within the Soviet bloc will decline the Vatican overtures, and they are the churches in Soviet territory, in Rumania, in Hungary, in Bulgaria. We can probably add to them the orthodox churches in Poland, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. What likelihood is there that these will submit to Rome? If they will not it is, we think, certain that the rest, Greece, Turkey, Cyprus, and the near East, will also refuse.

Additionally, we must recognise that Rome rarely shows any understanding of the principles of those who dissent from her. She has no desire to study why we and the orthodox do not submit. No doubt a Roman Catholic spokesman would say that there is no need to study error—that they have the whole truth, and we have only fragments of it, and the fragments we have are held in an environment of ignorance and error which takes their value from them. The few Protestants who talk hopefully about Rome coming round to us and unity becoming a possibility are, we say, simply unaware of the real situation. We cannot believe what we know to be wrong, and Rome cannot give up what she holds to be true. Here is the impasse. God in His purposes can change, and may change, the hearts and minds of men, but until He does we cannot see the possibility of union.

* * *

Orthodoxy may, as a system, look very like Rome. Its ceremonial and sacramental observances are very different from traditional Anglicanism, and still more from Lutheranism or Presbyterianism. We ought not to judge orthodoxy by these externals, but should look to its inner attitudes. It claims to be simply "Christianity," unaffected by papal authoritarianism, and adding nothing to the ancient Catholic Creed of the undivided church, i.e. it adds no doctrines such as were appended to the Creed by Pope Pius and the Council of Trent, and it does not accept the dogmas of nineteenth and twentieth century Rome. As well as this, Orthodoxy disclaims the influence of the Protestant Reformation. That was an affair of Western Europe, a crisis for Rome which was already out of fellowship with the East. We may deeply regret that Orthodoxy has not revived within its boundaries the truths which are the special glory of the Reformation, but that is a fact of history, and the day may come when these truths are brought once more to the forefront.

For Orthodoxy as for Protestantism the rise to sovereignty and infallibility of the Bishops of Rome is theological error and must be rejected.

* * *

What then is to be expected in 1962? Is the proposed Council to be abortive? By no means, for Unity is but one among many undertakings the Council will have before it. Indeed the publicity given to the Council in the World Press, and in religious journals, was concentrated upon what seemed to be "news," and this left in obscurity the many domestic matters a church must attend to. The definite refusals of Orthodox and Reformed to compromise with Rome, which we anticipate, will not make the Council useless. We give here a Press cutting (from the "Irish Press," 12th September, 1960) which makes this plain—

Ecumenical Council in 1962

His Holiness Pope John yesterday announced that he thought the Ecumenical Council of the Church would probably be held in 1962.

Asked whether other Christians would really return to the fold of the Catholic Church, Pope John said Catholics must do their best to have their errors of behaviour and those of others revised, so that it could be said that the House of the Father is one.

The Catholic Church would open her doors and say, "If you want to, come with sentiments of brotherhood."

The Pontiff said the Council's principal aims were: "A general reorganisation, bringing things up to date; a clarification and deep study of Christian doctrine, and a better definition of the Church's constitution and moral development, so that the Church would be extended to the whole world."

* * *

Ought not evangelicals, Anglican and others, to take this opportunity to organise systematic prayer that in this Council—

1. God's Will may be done.
2. God's Word may be supreme.
3. God's redeeming purposes may not be hindered.
4. The Church on earth may be freed from errors of doctrine and defects of practice.
5. The unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace may be discovered.

These are positive, not negative themes of prayer, and prayer ought to be positive.

What every believer prays for is "that God's Will may be done"—are we always sure that that is what we truly want? Do we not usually want something less, and something of our own?

We are certain that when God's Will is done it will be in complete harmony with His Word, and then we shall find that "of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (1 Cor. 1, 30).

THE PERFECTING OF THE REDEEMED.

Can moral and spiritual perfection be reached now? Is "sinless perfection" more than a delusive phrase? Are those who claim it not deceiving themselves? We are entitled to ask questions of this sort when we meet with the opinion that a believer can reach a stage in which he can claim to have committed no known sin for a long period.

We shall never belittle the ideal, or discourage any who long for and ardently seek perfection; but we want to be sure that our idea of perfection is not associated with an inadequate thought of God. The Christian must look not to his own heart, or longings, or motives, but to the revealed character of God when he wants to seek perfection. "Be ye holy, for I am holy" is a divine instruction which can only be understood in relation to ourselves when it is properly understood in relation to God. He says "I am holy"—from that we are to learn what holiness is. When we learn what holiness is we can examine our own consciences and spiritual progress.

* * *

What is holiness? Separation from evil is not only the obvious but the basic definition. So defined, our problem is to see how far we can honestly say we have parted company with evil. Long ago we read of a godly divine of the church of England, who wrote of himself "other men have sinned, but Lancelot Andrewes is sin itself." You may say that this was a gross exaggeration; a condemning of self so complete as to suggest an element of melancholy pride in being so fallen. But we can learn such abhorrence of sin that the moral recoil of conscience from it may be just what Andrewes felt.

* * *

John Bunyan wrote of his sinful addiction to bell-ringing. We may smile at the quaint conceit which made bell-ringing so reprehensible: but who, unless Bunyan himself and Almighty God, can say they read the record of the soul in such a circumstance? Richard Baxter, when small, stole apples, or wished to: we laugh at the trifling confession, but only Baxter, taught by grace, could know the delicate points of spiritual honour, and the shadow a small sin would cast upon his ideals. Let the world to-day call these men morbid, and explain their spiritual state in psycho-analytical jargon—the upward path and the pursuit of holiness belong to a world in which many analysts are strangers. The spiritual world, the world of eternal persons is infinitely older and immeasurably more real than the notions of normality explained in the textbooks and the magazines.

* * *

Sin, and a fallen state, must be the point at which we begin the course of the Christian life and try to go on to perfection. We speak of sin as the point of beginning because Christian progress is only possible where there is a correct start. The burden of sin must be shifted, and the new and risen life realised before the genuine life of the children of God is entered upon. The new heart, the cleansed conscience, the living hope all speak to us of the spiritual freedom without which we cannot advance. Separation from evil, then, is the emancipation we need, and at this point progress begins.

* * *

Do we need a definition of sin? Lawlessness, transgression, missing the mark, unrighteousness, defilement and many another word may be brought forward, and we need to watch that we don't allow the abstract ideas in these words to divert us from recognising the day-to-day fruits of pride and self-will which can do more lasting damage to us than more notorious faults. Do we need a further definition of holiness? Holiness, in contrast with the standards the world accepts as normal, is Christlikeness. If separation from evil is the negative aspect then Christlikeness is the positive aspect, and it becomes the goal.

* * *

When we set our course for the life of holiness and go on to perfection, what then? While we are in the body we shall never totally escape temptation, and if there is temptation there is the possibility of yielding. We may trust in our final perseverance, but that does not mean perfected holiness here and now.

Did Our Lord not tell us "to watch and pray"? He knew what was in man.

St. Paul wrote "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

The possibilities are there even though we depend, not on our own victories, but on the promise "... guarded by the power of God through faith unto salvation" (1 Pet. 1, 5.)

The possibilities exist because flesh is sinful (even in the regenerate). St Paul wrote in Rom. 7 "In me, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing." He warned us not to have confidence in the flesh (Phil. 3, 3), and Our Lord emphasised our frail condition, "that which is born of the flesh is flesh" (John 3, 6).

* * *

Further, our good intentions may not serve us well because we have only partial knowledge of God and lack wisdom. "We see through a glass darkly"—"as in an enigma"—"through a dim window, obscurely" (J.N.D.)—"we know in part" (1 Cor. 13).

* * *

Holy Scripture also reminds us of the continuance of a sinful nature. The forgiven sinner is still a sinner. We say this because otherwise we would falsify the word of God in 1 John 1, 10 "If we say that we have not sinned we make Him a liar, and His Word is not in us"—also in 1 John 1, 8 "If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us."

In this life we do not attain to a faultless condition.

* * *

Holiness, separation from evil is our glorious prospect; and while not in us now, holiness is ours in Christ, for His holiness, like His righteousness, is ours by faith and the eternal purpose of God. The more we realise that His perfection is shared with us, the more we shall try to be worthy of it.

"The Lord our Righteousness" is the promise in the prophet Jeremiah that foretold the standing of the Christian and warranted the challenge "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" (Rom. 8, 33). We make bold to claim that if the robe of Christ's righteousness covers us now, the sanctifying power of His spirit must act in us now, for "of Him (i.e. God) are ye in Christ Jesus, Who was made unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (1 Cor. 1: 30).

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 112.

dertaken by the Drew-McCormick expedition of the United States, with thirty members. The recent finds were announced on Monday by the director of the Jordan Antiquities Department. It is estimated that civilization came to Shechem about 1750 B.C. Traces of a palace were found; also evidence that about a century later Shechem extended further to the Northwest and that a temple fortress was erected with walls. Its massive remains are the most imposing monuments in the country. This temple dominated the city when Abraham and Jacob visited it in their journeys through the land. It was on the plain here that God appeared to Abraham (Gen. 12:6) and where he built an altar under the oak of Moreh. Here, too, Jacob re-entered the promised land (Gen. 33:18, 19), and bought a field. Later, Joshua made "Shechem in Mount Ephraim" one of the six cities of refuge (Josh. 20:7). Here, too, Abimelech was crowned king (Judges 9:6). The most interesting single find from the Samaritan city was a small pot containing coins, the latest of which is a coin of Ptolemy IV, the Egyptian king who lost the country to the Seleucids about 195 B.C. Since then there has been no settlement on the central mound.

—("The Christian", 26/8/'60).

Light From Dead Sea Scrolls

The fresh illumination which many parts of the New Testament have received from the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls was the subject of a scholarly appraisal by Dr. F. F. Bruce, Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis at Manchester University, in a lecture at Cambridge last week. He said that it would be difficult to think of any part of the New Testament which had received no illumination of some sort from the scrolls, which represented what had survived of 500 books. Dr. Bruce stated that when the first Qumran discoveries were made the chief interest was concentrated on their potential criticism of the Old Testament. While their importance in this respect remained great, it had become increasingly clear that their importance for New Testament origins was even greater. Scholars rendered a dis-service to the cause of historical research when they propounded theories which outran the available evidence and presented them to the public as if they were established facts. But when all the possible comparisons and contrasts had been drawn and duly weighed, it would become clearer than ever that the real differential of Christianity was the person and achievement of Christ Himself—to Christians no revolutionary conclusion but one which was worth restating none the less. Since the lecture was delivered the Jordan Government has announced its decision to keep the Scroll fragments in the country of their origin, and to repay the donors to whom they would otherwise have been distributed. Dr. J. M. Allegro, another authority on the Scrolls, states that there are other scrolls and fragments still in the hands of their Bedouin discoverers, and that many more will almost certainly be found.

—("The Christian", 12/8/'60).

Lutherans Gain

About one-third of all the Protestants in the world are Lutherans. The total number of Lutherans is estimated to be 71,135,068. A year ago the over-all figure was 70,753,389, showing a net gain of 381,679. These figures have been released by the Lutheran World Federation headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland.

A total of 37,252,486 Lutherans are found in Germany alone, constituting more than one-half of the world total. Roughly eighty per cent. of all the followers of Martin Luther are found in Europe. There are approximately 8,000,000 Lutherans in North America, including the Caribbean Islands.

—("The Vigilant", 14/7/'60).

[It is to be noted with deep regret that the Lutherans in the East German People's Republic are now facing a determined effort on the part of the Communists to undermine the faith of the young people].

Protestant Witness Service, Toronto

The service of Protestant Witness commemorating the 400th anniversary of the Protestant Reformation in Scotland, held at the band shell in Exhibition Park, the following afternoon, Sunday, July 10, was a most inspiring event.

The sermon was given by Rt. Rev. F. H. Wilkinson, M.A., D.D., Bishop of Toronto, and it was an inspiring exposition of the beneficial effects of the Reformation on the development of the democratic state and the concept of human freedom. Referring to the struggle imminent in men's minds today, the Bishop stated that beneath all the conflicts and tensions that exist between peoples and nations in the world is the supreme and destiny-making battle for the soul of man being waged by the Christian churches and countries and the powers of atheistic communism. He said that one of the tasks to which God is calling people now is that of adventure toward greater unity among all Christian churches.

—("The Sentinel," July-Aug. 1960).

[This report from the Toronto paper is illuminating. We note the occasion to commemorate the Scottish Reformation—and the preacher, the Bishop of Toronto. It was a happy recognition that there is a unity in the Reformed faith which differences of organisation have not undermined].

Many R.C's Become Methodists

The Director of the Statistical Office of the Methodist Church in the U.S., has released some figures that should prove encouraging to Protestants, states The Sunday School Times. The following paragraphs are taken from an article in Together:

"The number of Roman Catholics who become Methodists is almost four times greater than the number of Methodists who take membership in the Roman Catholic Church. This four-to-one ratio roughly corresponds to the current ratio between respective church memberships — 34.5 million Roman Catholics and 9.5 million Methodists."

"Those figures, however, are subject to interpretation. Roman Catholic practice is to include all members of 'Roman Catholic families,' whereas Methodist church rosters usually list only active members. Then, too, Methodist figures are only for the Methodist Church, and do not include Wesleyan Methodist and other related Methodist bodies with almost two million adherents."

The same article states the reason given by 403 Methodists for changing to Roman Catholicism: they were married to Roman Catholics. Only 39 changed over because they had come to the conclusion that they preferred Roman Catholic doctrine and practice. Of the Roman Catholics becoming Methodists, 737 said this was the result of marriage, while 829 said they preferred the beliefs and practices of Protestantism.

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	—	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	—	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	—	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	—	5/- "

NOTICE.

*Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish
to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription
for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-*

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

			s.	d.
William Bedell	—	—	0	3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	—	0	3
Doubts of the Sons	—	—	0	4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	—	0	4
The Confessional	—	—	0	3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND
AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

Doors of Opportunity

are opening for the

DISTRIBUTION OF GOD'S WORD

in

SPAIN, FRANCE, INDIA N. AFRICA, WEST INDIES

And many other countries

—o—

All who cherish the Bible as the word of God, and desire its world-wide circulation, are invited to co-operate prayerfully and practically with the

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice
save to answer as did the Prophet of
old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this
work of bringing the Gospel of
Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to
our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 11.—LXIX.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

"God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth."

—John iv. 24.

"Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church's wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses."—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,

Church House,

Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification", "Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d. Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev. A. J. Claassen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos. Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas Connellan—Fr. Connellan's sketch of autobiography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS	Page
Passing Events	121
R.C. View of Salvation on Non-Catholics	122
Rome's Married Clergymen	123
Editor's Chair	126
Holiness	128
"Ben Hur"	130

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Samaritans Appeal

The Bishop of Kensington and several other Church leaders are seeking help for the last survivors of the Samaritans, the last survivors of that ancient race which, until 722 B.C. formed the Kingdom of Israel. There are now only 330 Samaritans living at Nablus, in Jordan, at the foot of their Holy Mountain, Mount Gerizim. They are in great poverty, and their economic situation is made all the more difficult because of their strict observance of the Mosaic Law. Their basic need, apart from immediate relief of illness and malnutrition, is education for the children and training in trades and handicrafts for the young people, to enable them to find employment. They want to build a school and vocational training centre, and to have three of their young people, trained as teachers. Particulars from the World Service Trust, 13 Prince of Wales Terrace, London, W.8.

* * *

Burma's Drive For Buddhism

Rangoon. — Prime Minister U Nu of the Union of Burma has appointed an advisory commission for making Buddhism the State religion. The commission will make a tour of Burma to visit more than 40 towns to interview leaders of Christian, Hindu and Islamic communities before making a report to the Government.

Purpose of the interviews with non-Buddhist religious leaders will be to "enable them to express freely their fears, if any, regarding establishment of a State religion and to suggest how their rights should be safeguarded."

Appointment of the commission fulfils a campaign promise made by the Prime Minister before his recent election. Buddhism has had a strong revival in Burma recently. Some observers have seen the Government's support of its resurgence as a move to thwart Communism, to strengthen the regime and unify national consciousness and culture.

— ("The Vigilant", 14/6/'60).

* * *

In France A Meeting of Former Priests

Since the end of the second world war, many priests have left the Roman Catholic Church in certain European countries. In France, their numbers is estimated to be between one and two thousand; in Italy, there is a much larger number.

What becomes of these ex-priests? It is difficult to say.

The majority of them seem to remain outside of any church whatsoever, but a minority of them have found their way into Protestant churches. In France more than forty of these former priests are now connected with the Reformed Church, whether as pastors or as members. A dozen or so of them are connected with other Protestant churches; others have turned to the Orthodox churches or to the Christian Catholic Church.

The former priests who now form part of the Reformed Church of France have set up an organization for fellowship and mutual help which operates in two directions: disinterested help to any priest in spiritual or material difficulty; readiness to keep the Reformed Church in touch with the latest information on movements within the Roman Church.

A group of some twenty of these former priests held a study session in France last April, and out of their meeting came an expression of the desire for a better co-ordination of help for priests from Italy and Spain who take refuge in France with a view to finding a solution for their problems. Several centres of welcome are now functioning for them in France.

— Adapted from

"La Vie Protestante" of Geneva.

* * *

The Evangelical Alliance

Plans are being worked out by the Evangelical Alliance to make a worthy contribution to "Bible Year" in 1961, which marks the 350th anniversary of the Authorised Version of the Bible. Four main projects are envisaged, each emphasising by different ways and means "The Authority of the Scriptures." There is to be a tape-recorded course introducing the subject of Bible study; Ministers' Conferences, where the main theme is to be "The Inspiration and Authority of the Scriptures," are planned for various parts of the country; a

—(Continued on p. 131.)

A Roman Catholic View of the Church's Teaching about Salvation of Non-Catholics

(From a Roman Catholic paper quoted in "The Vigilant")

"Marianne," of Melbourne writes: "Dear Father: I wonder if you would mind helping me by setting out as simply as possible the teaching of the Church in the matter of the salvation of non-Catholics. The reason I ask is this — My employer, who is not a Catholic, is convinced that Catholics believe that only Catholics will be saved, and that all others outside the Church will not be saved. I have tried to point out that such an idea is incorrect, that Catholics do not believe anything so uncharitable or so ridiculous. I've told him that anyone who sincerely believes that his own religion is the true religion, and who lives a truly good life according to the dictates of his own conscience, has as much chance of salvation as any Catholic. However, I have also pointed out that anyone who, after investigation, found that the Catholic religion was the true religion and who then did nothing about the matter would be rejecting salvation.

"My employer does not believe me, and he quotes (or probably misquotes) Mgr. Ronald Knox as having said that 'only people wearing an identity disc with R.C. written upon it would be in heaven'. Now, Father, this comes from a fairly well-educated man, distinguished in his profession and very well-meaning. He imagines that we claim an exclusive right to heaven, not understanding that in gratitude for the glory and wonder of our Faith we have an extra responsibility to lead good lives, and that if we do not, and if we dissipate the graces and opportunities for merit in which our Faith is so rich, we are most likely to lose salvation ourselves. I do hope you can help me, Father, to help this man."

Reply: This is a good letter, "Marianne,"; you have an excellent grasp of the Church's teaching concerning the salvation of non-Catholic Christians.

I would alter only one line in your letter. It is hardly true to say that people outside the Church have "as much chance of salvation as those inside," since they lack many graces available to Catholics through the ministration of the Church. And this makes it harder for them to reach salvation.

Otherwise I agree with your letter and I will only try to back you up and help you to explain the matter to your employer.

You say, and you say well, that the Catholic Church does not teach that only those who have practised the Catholic religion on this earth will save their Souls. The Church is most conscious of the text of the Bible which says that "God earnestly wills the Salvation of all men," and the Church holds for certain that no adult will lose his soul except he sins seriously against the dictates of conscience, and that with full knowledge and deliberate consent.

You say, "Marianne," that your educated and distinguished non-Catholic employer refuses to believe this; that he quotes Mgr. Knox as saying "that only those with R.C. identity discs will be found in heaven." Now couldn't you ask him to produce this supposed statement of Mgr. Knox in black and white, and see if it is true? I'll bet you he has it jumbled up. Then I'd advise you to give him the following official Catholic statement of Pope Pius IX to read. Pope Pius said (and I quote):

"Faith compels us to hold that nobody can be saved outside the Apostolic and Roman Church, for the Church is the one ark of salvation and anybody who refuses to enter it must drown in the deluge. Nevertheless, we hold for certain (said Pope Pius) that if people are found to be ignorant of the true religion, with an ignorance that can be truly called invincible, then they will not be blameworthy in the eyes of God. And who is there among us (continues the Pope) who is competent to judge about the lack of knowledge found among peoples and regions of such tremendous diversity and cultures?"

Now this is an official statement of a Catholic Pope. It certainly does not condemn to eternal damnation all those outside the Catholic Church.

Let me explain the statement. Firstly, Pope Pius says: "Nobody outside the Apostolic and Roman church can be saved, since the Church is the only ark of salvation." This is an objective statement; it leaves out subjective dispositions. It is based on Our Lord's teaching that there is one Spiritual Kingdom on this earth, one "way of salvation," and this, in our humble and firm belief, is the Catholic Church.

Secondly, the Pope brings in subjective dispositions, and he proceeds: If people, through invincible ignorance, fail to acknowledge the Catholic Church, yet live up to the dictates of conscience, these people will be blameless in the eyes of God. And God, who alone knows men's hearts, will not condemn them.

Your employer, "Marianne," might say: "But don't these two statements disagree with one another?"

If he does, then you must try to explain that anybody who tries to believe in God, keep the moral laws, and accept Jesus Christ — even if he fails to appreciate the full claim of the Catholic Church — is regarded by us as an "implicit" member of the Church. (Many non-Catholics, of course, are also baptized.)

And, therefore, we hold that all who come to heaven — no matter under what identity disc they may have paraded on this earth — will acknowledge in heaven that they saved their souls through grace dispensed by the Catholic Church, the only true "way of salvation."

—R.C. "Advocate"

[We print the above because we find that many Roman Catholics are under the impression that non-Roman Catholics do not go to Heaven. Happily, many do know the truth, and are glad of it.]

But we as Protestants must not acquiesce in the view that 'invincible ignorance', and that alone, keeps us out of the Apostolic and Roman Church. We positively declare that not ignorance, but knowledge, keeps the evangelical Protestant in his evangelical faith. He knows his eternal security in Christ, and that is enough.]

ROME'S MARRIED CLERGYMEN

If you were to say to the average person you see in the streets of Dublin or in the rural parts of Ireland that the Roman Catholic Church permits married men to officiate in its priesthood, he would recoil in horror and incredulity from what he considers a piece of Protestant profanity and indecency. As is well-known, it is a matter for vulgar and obscene jest among Roman Catholics of a low social level that Protestant clergymen are generally married men. Respectable Roman Catholics find this hard to believe, but it is something kept alive year after year, and every Protestant clergyman in Dublin city is accustomed to it. That clergymen of the Church of Rome, even if very few, may live in the holy state of matrimony must therefore appear to the ignorant as an impossibility.

It is not an impossibility, but a fact beyond dispute. We do not here refer to the clergymen of the Eastern Uniate Rites—it is known to some Roman Catholics in the West that there are subjects of the Pope in Eastern Europe and Western Asia who do not follow the Western patterns of worship and Canon law. They follow the pattern of Eastern and Orthodox churches, but they differ from the big majority of Eastern Orthodox in that they are a minority which accepts the rule of the Bishop of Rome. The big majority of the Orthodox deny the Papal claims. As one of the features of Eastern Orthodox Christianity is its age-long recognition of the right of the parish clergymen to marry, those Easterns who are in communion with the Pope have married clergy. But we are not writing about them: we are writing about Roman Catholic clergymen who belong to the usual Western or Latin section of the Roman Catholic church.

* * *

At this point someone may say that the Church permits a married man to receive Holy Orders as a priest, but on condition that his wife if living shall enter a religious Order permanently. This was the situation in the well-known instance of Mr. and Mrs. Connolly. Mr. Connolly, a Protestant clergyman (Anglican), and Mrs. Connolly turned Roman Catholic; and after a time Mr. Connolly believed that he had a vocation to the Roman Catholic priesthood. In consequence of this Mrs. Connolly entered a convent. After some time in the priesthood Mr. Connolly decided to abandon his clerical duties and return to Protestantism. He accordingly tried to persuade Mrs. Connolly to rejoin him. She refused, and we believe he took legal steps to compel the convent to restore her to him. Mrs. Connolly had probably had enough of her husband, and had found a way of life which satisfied her, and she wanted no more changing and confusion. We gathered that she became an important leader and administrator in her Community. Connolly's instability leads us to think that she was the firmer and more consistent character.

But the Connollys are not the people we have in mind. We refer to priests whose wives have not gone into religious Orders but have remained with their husbands.

* * *

To remove this question of celibacy of the priesthood from the realm of futile argument, let it be remembered that celibacy of the secular clergy is a rule of church discipline and Canon law. It is not a theological question, or a dogma.

* * *

The priests we refer to can be read about in a recent book entitled "We Are Now Catholics," published in 1958 by the Mercier Press, Cork. It is a translation by Norman C. Reeves of a book by four contributors in Germany, and edited by the Revd. K. Hardt, S.J.

Fr. Hardt in the preface says that the four writers were all in the Protestant (Lutheran, Evangelical) ministry for many years. They were not obscure people: one had been professor in Bonn, another was concerned in church administration in the Land of Hesse: another was eminent as an historical scholar. Naturally Fr. Hardt emphasises the grace which led them to their goal. It is no part of our policy, as readers well know, to build up arguments in favour of Rome, or to hold up to admiration such Protestants as go over to Rome. But we direct attention to such men because their acceptance into the priesthood while remaining with their wives is a truly remarkable thing. It ought to be widely publicised, because in controversy at vulgar levels it has been made a reproach to Protestantism that it allows the marriage of the clergy. Rome does so too, even if the instances are few and special. We are tempted to say in the words of Acts; that some must be "much perplexed concerning whereunto this would grow" (5, 24).

It is emphasised in the preface that the going over of these men to the Roman Catholic faith was "after mature consideration and a lengthy inner struggle." These are precisely the words we would use to describe the experiences of those who have travelled in the opposite direction; but that is a separate matter. Here we are interested in a narrative, or series of narratives because of novelty, and the novelty is not in the theological reasonings but in the status of the men involved.

* * *

Take the first—Rudolf Goethe. We recall that we made some reference to him some years ago in relation to the very point before us, that he was accepted into Rome's priesthood as a married man. Now we have his own sketch of autobiography, which shows him to have been reared in very devout evangelical Lutheran surroundings. In his student days he read the sermons of "Robertson of Brighton," (does anyone remember to read him to-day?), and valued them greatly.

He had years of pastoral work and a chaplaincy on the Western Front in the first World War. Later he worked in evangelical youth movements. He came into touch with a remarkable religious mystic and through her met his future wife. Troubles of the Hitler regime came, and Goethe was moved to a new district. In a new church he began to emphasise sacraments more, and developed greater ceremonial, and in his family circle it became a custom for some members "to storm the Queen of Peace with their ardent petitions" at "the Lady Altar" in a local church.

As war-time and Nazi difficulties grew Goethe says that he got nearer to "the Catholic Church." He became more interested in liturgical revival in Lutheranism, and took part in the renewed life of the Confessional Church.

The Lutheran "High Church" movement led him in a Romeward direction (though others perhaps did not follow the same path), and his wife more and more centred her devotions in Roman Catholic Churches.

After the war Goethe worked in Church commissions of education till he was sixty-eight. Then he writes "It was revealed to me that the Holy Father had considered conferring ordination upon married Evangelical pastors who had deserved well of the cause of Christian re-union. The ordination was not to interfere with the full maintenance of the existing sacramental marriage." He became a Roman Catholic in 1950, and was ordained priest in 1951 at the age of seventy-one. "A great storm arose in the press of almost the whole world on account of this ordination." He adds "some people were anxious about the maintenance of priestly celibacy. . . . But one ordination does not affect it. (others have followed. Further ordinations are to come). The privilege applies only to an existing marriage. . . . We are to be employed chiefly in extraordinary spiritual ministrations."

* * *

Martin Giebner is next. He went as a student to Tübingen University, and felt spiritually rather neglected. There and in Leipzig University he felt a lack "of reverence for God's revelation." That was one of the regrettable features of liberal theological teaching in the first quarter of the century. It did much harm to the men and to the Churches.

After some years as a pastor he became sympathetic to the Berlin High Church movement, founded in 1918. Among its objects was to give the church an episcopal Constitution (not as a mere state superintendency then usual in Germany) and to encourage richer vestments and liturgical forms. There was an intellectual conflict as to whether this was in the true Lutheran tradition or not. A more valuable aspect was its theological orthodoxy.

Giebner, led by these influences, doubted the validity of his Lutheran ordination and sought to receive "valid" orders. He was given ordination by Dr. Heiler, a Lutheran professor who had been made a bishop by "the Gallican Church," a very small body in France which claimed a succession of valid orders from the Syriac-Jacobite patriarchate of Antioch, (particulars of this "Gallican Church" can be seen in Brandreth's "Episcopi Vagantes")

Apart from this concern over orders which came from a dubious source, we note that Pastor Giebner was much perturbed by the modernistic attitude of many of the accredited teachers in his church. It may be worth saying that in a truly evangelical circle the attractions of Rome will be small.

Pastor Giebner seems to us to have gone through phases of faith such as we find in Tractarian, Puseyite, and Anglo-Catholic opinion. He ended in Rome. Perhaps a more exact parallel would be the Englishman, Dr. Orchard who was once a Congregational minister at Weigh-house Chapel in London. Orchard went over to Rome as a logical necessity of his position. He too had secured some mysterious ordination which he considered "valid" years before he submitted to Rome.

We have not gathered from the narrative whether Pastor Giebner is married or not. He received Roman Catholic ordination in 1953.

* * *

George Klünder follows. He too came under the influence of Dr. Heiler, and longed for "lived-in" churches and fuller ceremonial and devotional life. We cannot be sure that the man who, because he wants a fuller and richer devotional life, goes over to Rome, is indulging his own tastes rather than expressing a deep theological conviction. He may think he is responding to the appeal of truth when he is in fact subconsciously yielding to aesthetic influences. What is notable in this section is the information given about the life, organisation, and currents of opinion in German Lutheranism. We see little ground for questioning Dr. Klünder's descriptions, but think that his reaction from the externals of Lutheranism may have injured his ability to understand that Christianity must primarily be an inner religion—the relationship of the soul and God must come first. When that comes first there can be no intermediary other than the Son of God Who died for us. Doctrinal truth, rather than the emotional perfection of a system, is what matters.

* * *

The fourth who figures in the book is Heinrich Schlier. His introduction to Roman Catholic thought was partly by way of pamphlets bought from church bookstalls. Later he read weightier works. It is odd that many of us who have read many of the volumes named by Schlier received very different impressions from them. If they led Schlier to his new church, they were just as effective in repelling other readers from that church! How do we explain that? We cannot account for the varieties of human experience, but we mark a phrase used by Schlier because it seems significant—"My longing for the 'Catholic.'" This phrase belongs to the sphere of emotion, rather than of reason or intellect. Truth is not an emotion.

* * *

But in honesty we must recognise that there was more than a feeling at work. Dr. Schlier was discouraged in his Lutheran pastorate by the indifference to the great truths of the Gospel he often met with—a theological policy, that of "demythologising" the Gospel, "calculated to rid the faith of the Evangelical Church of any substance" as he says, has become popular as a sequel to much readily accepted Modernism. Let us candidly admit that many doctrinal and Biblical laxities among us serve to weaken our witness and reduce our power and deprive us of valuable men. This does not prove that Rome is right; only that she is positive on those very matters upon which we ought to be positive too.

* * *

Our purpose at the outset was to show from impeccable sources that the Roman Catholic church in Western Europe can allow within its fold as active clergymen in good standing priests who are "good married men." Years ago the former Roman Catholic bishop of Cork, Dr. Cohalan described the Protestant clergy as merely "good married men." He seemed to intend to give the impression that being "good married men" they could be nothing more than mere laymen, not Christian ministers in the genuine sense. How wrong he was! And who demonstrated the wrongness? No one less than Pope Pius XII when he empowered the bishop of Mainz to ordain Rudolf Goethe (and others).

Here once again we see a "Protestantising" of Rome, such as we have noted now and again in our pages, e.g. Evening Communions, increasing use of vernacular languages in the services, bigger efforts to circulate Holy Scripture. This is "Protestantising" in practice: we wish that we could discern it in doctrine. It will come, for if the Word of God is given free course it will have its effect.

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

 Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

UNION WITH ROME.

At the risk of being charged with being too pre-occupied with this subject we again offer a consideration of Church unity and the See of Rome. If a reader wonders why we survey afresh this familiar topic we reply that it is a matter which is constantly being brought forward. Indeed one of the remarkable facts of our day is the attention given to church unity. The Vatican is much concerned with it; and since the Lausanne Conference on Faith and Order in the 1920's the Protestant and Orthodox churches have taken it up with eagerness and hope. The present organisation of ecumenical affairs is the "World Council of Churches" which has often assured the Pope that he will be welcome if he cares to join. "Keeping the door open for Rome," as the phrase goes, may be a generous expression of christian charity, or it may be an idle gesture. We prefer to think of it as christian charity and to interpret it as an invitation to conference. Rome is usually extremely ignorant of the truths for which evangelical churches are distinguished; and we have found, in Ireland at least, an apparent reluctance to study the reasons why the evangelicals take this stand.

* * *

What we have noted is that a Roman Catholic enquirer is apt to say that the divisions of non-Roman Catholic Christianity are enough to repel him from deeper investigation — he argues that divisions mean that there is error. The evangelical answer is that the divisions are not basic, and that problems of church order, admittedly real enough, are not fundamental. We do not argue that forms of worship are tied in with the question of salvation — basically the evangelical christian, high or low, Presbyterian or Lutheran, understands his fellows and thinks about God and our Redeemer in the same way. Whether they accept or reject the phrase "Justification by Faith" they acknowledge its truth.

We therefore need to emphasise that the divisions of real Protestantism are not exclusive, and do not go very deep. The unity we possess is not external: that may be admitted, but the truly inward nature of the Christian religion comes prior to all outward manifestation. This is the very fact which enables churches of many different traditions to co-operate, and no longer to outlaw each other.

If the Roman Catholic enquirer asks why we can meet together in spite of our differences it is easy to show him that he has over-estimated the significance of the differences. Now when we have said that, we can imagine a friend saying "if the differences are so small why be so concerned about church unity among evangelicals?" We reply that we want closer fellowship and we want an outward expression of the spiritual understanding of each other which we already have. We want above all to cease inflicting the historic differences of European and American churches upon the new Christian peoples of Asia and Africa.

* * *

Long and patient conference among Protestants brought about the union of churches in South India, and is evidently going to produce the same fruit in North India soon. No doubt there will be similar developments elsewhere. At home we may be slower, but the more we meet the more we are brought into friendship and recognition of each others' spiritual assets.

* * *

We believe that discussion of differences is better than chill refusal "to hear the other side." As atheistic materialism spreads in many parts of the world, blotting out old heathen and other religions it is wiser for professing christians to abandon mere hostility. Rome can do itself no conceivable good by pretending that Protestants do not exist as a religious force, or, if they can't be ignored, by pretending that they are not Christians. Where Rome gains a victory over the Protestant cause (e.g. in Spain or Colombia) it has been a victory for pride and prestige: it has not added to her inner strength or spiritual vision.

So then, we believe that there is a point in our not refusing to shut the door. We are ready however to say that Rome will stay outside. If Rome came in it would suggest that there is room and need for discussion of the points that separate; and Rome claims that she alone has complete truth, and we must submit because where we differ from her teaching we are necessarily wrong. That is one effect of the dogma of Infallibility which we must remember. As a consequence we cannot share the easy and naive optimism of some people who think that union with Rome is a possibility of the near future. Is it conceivable that the Protestant Churches in the World Council of Churches or in any other alliance will collapse like a house of cards if a Roman overture is made to them? Is it conceivable that Rome will rescind those many dogmas and practices which evangelical Protestants disown on the ground that they have no certain warrant in our Rule of Faith which is Holy Scripture? We can hope that conversations with Rome might abate prejudice, intolerance, and bigotry. We can pray that a more Christian view of human life and of reverence for all men might replace the assumption that Protestant faith is unimportant and must be ignored.

* * *

At this point we may remind ourselves that conversations of an interesting but nugatory sort took place thirty or more years ago between unofficial Anglicans and unofficial Roman Catholics at Malines under the patronage of the late Cardinal Mercier. The report of these conversations is in print, and it is to-day a theological curio. The talks between two little coteries were ended by a Papal direction; and it was made plain that the terms or conditions of union with Rome were not for bargaining—only submission could be accepted.

But that was thirty years ago, and in 1960 we sense a very slight change of attitude. It is not dogmatic weakening but what we may describe as a more realistic sense of what is required to-day. Rome is aware that its traditional attitude to the reformed churches has achieved nothing. The reformed churches show no inclination to apologise for themselves and to recant. With Holy Scripture as their warrant they know that they can show that original Christianity was somewhat different from the Roman Catholicism of to-day, and that they have the sounder grasp upon original Christianity. The Vatican has, accordingly, appointed in the last few weeks a special secretariat for christian unity. One of its members is the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Liverpool, Dr. Heenan. According to the "Church Times" of 14th October, Archbishop Heenan 'will make the first contact with other Christians in Britain, in an effort to establish closer liaison between them and the Vatican.'

The same paper tells us that the Archbishop of Canterbury has welcomed this venture, describing it as "another sign of the times."

Various Church of England worthies have welcomed it, and one of them is quoted "This does not mean that reunion is in sight—we have still a very long way to go—but this is a decisive step forward."

Archbishop Heenan is quoted as saying of Pope John XXIII that "he is all for having the greatest co-operation which is compatible with truth—in other words, no compromise in doctrine, but as close a unity as possible for good works."

* * *

Do we not see in Archbishop Heenan's words the essential problem? He spoke of "truth," and we too must speak of "truth." Truth is the paramount thing, but how often is it emphasised in ecumenical circles and discussions? Ten years ago it was not a condition of eternal salvation that we should believe in the corporal assumption of the Blessed Virgin into heaven. It has since become a condition. A hundred years ago the same could be said of Papal Infallibility. It was not then a revealed truth! In 1870 it was made a condition of salvation. So with many other beliefs—is it possible for reformed churches to withdraw the witness of four hundred years; to deny and repudiate their martyrs; to say to-day or in the future the very opposite of what they claimed yesterday was the truth of God?

We might sincerely admit that in some things we were mistaken, for we, fortunately, do not claim infallibility. Can we foresee a time when the Roman Catholic Church may be ready to withdraw its post-Reformation dogmas? The co-operation Pope John XXIII desires should not be refused as long as it is lawful for us to have it. But we should not be content with mere bits of co-operation occasionally sought. We should ask for a definite change in the policy of several Roman Catholic states in the matter of civil and religious liberty. Let freedom and fair play be given to Protestants in Spain: let rights of conscience, public worship and witness be secured throughout South America and elsewhere, and then it will be possible for non-Roman Catholic churches and peoples to co-operate. This is not, we think, a polemical or unreasonable requirement.

* * *

While the "Church Times" lays emphasis on co-operation, the correspondent of "The Guardian" (17-8-'60) who reported on this new Vatican Secretariat describes it as an office with a double function—"It is to enable non-Roman Catholics to follow the work of the forthcoming second Vatican Council and to help churches not in communion with Rome to arrive at unity with the Roman Catholic Church."

We are not able to say if this is an official description of the purpose of the new Secretariat. If it is, it may turn out to be a new office of propaganda.

The same newspaper correspondent says "No church should feel that the World Council of Churches in any way seeks to act for the Churches in such matters, for each church takes its own decisions in full freedom. The World Council of Churches has no authority to enter into formal or informal conversations with the Roman Catholic Church about Church union." It may be well to keep this in mind, for ecumenical enthusiasts may be tempted to run on ahead and embarrass themselves and their churches.

One of the Roman Catholic observers at the meeting of the World Council of Churches last August at St. Andrew's, Scotland was the Revd. Bernard Leeming, S.J. He has just published a book entitled "The Churches and The Church" (Darton, Longmans and Todd 35/-). It was reviewed in the number of the "Church Times" we quoted above. We learn that the book treats of the World Council of Churches and the ecumenical movement. The reviewer wrote this sentence—"As might be expected, Fr. Leeming is unable to suggest any hope of radical changes in the Roman attitude, or to hold out any prospect of accommodation between views of the "Church which unhappily remain diametrically opposed." Here in Ireland we are perhaps freer from illusions than many elsewhere, so we wish that our optimistic and ingenuous friends elsewhere will take the responsible opinion of Fr. Leeming to heart (and to head as well).

Our discussion is inconclusive but we hope we have expanded the problem a little.

HOLINESS.

Lately we had an article on the subject of holiness, and some aspects of this groundwork of fellowship with God were discussed. We have now a further article which may be a supplement to the former one, and add a little to our knowledge.

* * *

Caution, and a knowledge of the weaknesses of human nature allied with the virtue of humility which is repeatedly commented in the New Testament, must lead us to hesitate to make large claims for our holiness or progress towards perfection. As a consequence we recognise that—

We shall always be exposed to temptation, outside and within.

Human nature is sinful through and through.

Since our knowledge of God is incomplete, if not faulty, we shall always be exposed to the sins of ignorance.

Are we therefore to content ourselves with a rather low spiritual level? Are we to say that spiritual ideals and aspirations are not for us? Must we confess that perseverance on the upward path can accomplish little or nothing?

We think of prayer: is it always to be a half-hearted and half-sceptical address to God? Is it to be little more than the survival in daily life of an old habit? If so, let us recognise that our prayer habit is not a genuine activity of the born-again spirit, but only a superstition. Candour is what we need, and if we want to grow in grace we must take seriously and examine thoroughly our spiritual state. We know many who have given concentrated attention during their spare time to improving their golf, especially in those parts of the game in which they were falling short—ought not the professing Christian to take his Creed, his prayers, his reaching out to God, his "seeking the things that are above" (Col. 3.1, "seek for things above" Berkeley version) more seriously to heart, and strive more? If we have faith intermittently embarrassed by doubts, then we may usefully consider a modern English theologian's phrase—faith is "standing by the noblest hypothesis" (our recollection of the exact words may be imperfect, but we give the sense). Faith builds up. Faith makes life affirmative and positive, and not merely negative. We know that if we are to amount to anything in ordinary life we must be affirmative and constructive—this holds good in the spiritual life too.

So then, self-examination (1 Cor. 11, 28 "Let a person have a self-examination" Berkeley Version; "let a man prove himself" R.V. and J.N.D.) is the obvious duty. Let us see if we are striving after the highest and living up to the truest: if we are, we will soon transform "the noblest hypothesis" into the greatest of faith's certainties.

* * *

Contentment with lower levels of life, and the accompanying smugness or complacency, will certainly not allure us to brighter worlds, nor encourage us to wholehearted discipleship—we are all called to holiness, and not just the Christian élite among us. What is the incentive or inducement? The vision of God; the “well-done” of Christ; the self-respect (of which pride is the inferior imitation) which will not descend to unworthiness; the integrity of the Christian soul; the duty of a right example and pattern of life, and much else will draw us. Above all, the Cross, and the Word of Our Redeemer “I, if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto Myself” (John 12, 32) will be a means to the overcoming life.

* * *

Let us say firmly that it is possible to resist every recognised temptation. If the main step towards holiness is to overcome temptations and tread them down, then it is within the possibilities of our nature to do so, provided that our nature is regenerate and responsive to grace given.

We are familiar, all our lives no doubt, with the words of the apostle James—“Resist the devil and he will flee from you” (Jas. 4, 7). We must not separate this from its context which is most significant in the battle against sin and in the pursuit of holiness—“Draw nigh unto God, and He will draw nigh to you.” There we find one of the secrets of holiness.

* * *

The trials and temptations are real, not illusory, for we dismiss at once the notion that they are only the errors of mortal mind. We must learn to face them as weighty challenges to our faith and allegiance. Grievous they may be, and wellnigh intolerable, but it is worth keeping before us the words of St. Paul “God is faithful Who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make also the way of escape that ye may be able to endure it” (I Cor. 10, 13). The possibilities of spiritual progress are not necessarily frustrated by temptation.

Again we recall a word we have known longer than most Scripture teachings—“Sin shall not have dominion over you” (Rom. 6, 14). We take these words to be a promise, and “He is faithful that promised” (Heb. 10, 23).

Further, we can withstand in “the evil day” if we “take up the whole armour of God”: without it we are defenceless, but with it—breastplate, greaves and helmet; sword and shield we are sure to win. “The fiery darts of the wicked” are the manifold and repeated efforts of evil to drive us out of our spiritual stronghold and to expose us to greater dangers. They need not win.

* * *

Now if we can put up successful resistance to temptation and trials of our faith we can do more. We can turn to positive achievement. Active discipleship is the way of holiness as it is also the way to carry the war into the enemy’s camp. Everything done in the name of Christ is a positive and telling blow against evil. We might strike out against evil in a self-righteous spirit: that may be admitted, and so we need, as we have written above, to examine ourselves, our motives and objects. We counteract the tendency to self-righteousness, which is an enemy of true holiness by remembering how we are to strike out against evil—“Do all to the glory of God” (1 Cor. 10, 31). There is the secret, for the victory cannot be our own exclusive triumph—note the passage 2 Cor. 2, 14 “Thanks be unto God Who always leadeth us in triumph in Christ” (“Thanks be to God Who invariably leads us on triumphantly in Christ” Berkeley Version).

This subordination of the self ought not to be a mere momentary act in order to obtain a single advantage. It ought to be habitual—hence St. Paul marks out that other essential of the path to holiness—“Walk worthy of God unto all pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work and increasing in the knowledge of God” (Col. 1, 10).

* * *

Thus far, perhaps, we have laid emphasis on the manward aspect of the pursuit of holiness; and some may say that holiness is a state or standing in which the believer is when he is by faith “in Christ.” We do not for a moment question the standing of a Christian, but seek to unfold the possibility of inner holiness. That necessarily involves recognition of Him Who is the Spirit of holiness (Rom. 1, 4). It cannot be overlooked that the Spirit of God is, in God’s Word, constantly called “the Holy Spirit,” or “Holy Ghost.” In the Authorised Version we may count on the occurrence of “Holy Ghost” over eighty times, and that by no means exhausts the reference to “holy” or “holiness” as associated with the Spirit of God.

We know well that the meaning of holiness is “separation from evil, and separation unto God,” hence the Spirit of God being named “holy” so constantly shows us the intimate connection between holiness in us and the activity of the spirit of God in our behalf.

Repeatedly we are told of “being filled with the Spirit,” so that hearts and minds are not empty and idle and open to the invasion and occupation of sin. We are told to produce "the fruits of the spirit" and we know that to do this is full-time employment. A man might derive transient and low enjoyment from the common forms of self-indulgence, in fact countless millions do, but enduring and noble joy comes to us from the happy cultivation of the fruits of the Spirit. They bring substantial blessings to all around, and even the unregenerate will agree that if they were more plentiful the world would be better. Holiness is not world-avoiding, but world-overcoming.

"The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance." (Gal. 5, 22).

If we begin to practise these virtues it will be said that we are laying ourselves open to misrepresentation, exploitation, peril—but we are not to judge by immediate results and reactions: we are to go on in faith and await the long-term results. The soldier who dislikes his first experiences of military life and its dangers may not drift off home: he must stick it out; and hence St. Paul says to us "Suffer hardship as a good soldier of Christ Jesus" ("As a noble soldier of Christ Jesus share our hardships"—Berkeley Version: "Take thy share in suffering as a good soldier of Jesus Christ" J.N.D.; "Put up with your share of hardship as a loyal soldier in Christ's army" J. B. Phillips).

* * *

"Walk in the Spirit" (Gal. 5, 25) is again one of the most familiar sayings in the New Testament. It means that we are to organise our lives and conduct upon sound spiritual principles. We are to consider life's problems and questions, and opportunities and hindrances, and joys and sorrows from the Christian standpoint. Our thinking must be the thinking of those who are "in Christ": we must see life here from the standpoint of eternity. We must, as our great Bishop George Berkeley put it "see all things in God."

To "walk in the Spirit" is to show unfeignedly that we have turned from the world, the flesh and the devil, to serve the living God. It means the life of faith and prayer, of forgiving and overcoming, of witnessing, not by word only but by deed. As we are "living epistles seen and read by all men" (which is a paraphrase of St. Paul's words in II Cor. 3, 3 "Ye are our letter, written in our hearts, known and read of all men"), we cannot complain if the outside world forms its opinion of Christ and His Church from us. By observing those who claim to be Christ's rather than by investigating the documentary credentials and early history of our faith, the outsider reaches his conclusions, for or against Christ. The example of true (not pretended or self-deceiving) holiness will count positively in evangelising "them that are without." Can we fail Christ more completely than when we neglect or ignore His Command "to preach the gospel to the whole creation?" The whole being of the professing Christian preaches continually for, or against Christ. Some may answer that this is unfair, and that we are only earthen vessels and unprofitable servants—if we seek more the aid of the Spirit of holiness we shall be holier, more genuine, more loving, and correspondingly more effective in our witness.

"Walking in the light" as St. John says, is walking with Christ, Who is the true light that lighteth every man. His path, which we may follow with Him, is the path of holiness.

* * *

A final word is this, that we can never separate realised holiness from the power of the Precious Blood—"the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin" (1 Jn. 1, 7), and this is holiness. Positively considered, it moves into deeper and more absorbing love of God, for holiness without love may be discussed in a theological text-book, but in the Christian's experience it has no reality.

Holiness signifies the cleansed soul's concentration in love upon God. It may begin as a standing assured to us, but it must grow into a loving fellowship as—

"the things of earth grow strangely dim,
"In the light of His glory and grace."

"BEN. HUR"

Many readers no doubt have read the nineteenth century story by Lew Wallace entitled "Ben Hur." There seems to have been a wave of books with Biblical background about the time when Wallace was writing, especially in America. We imagine that the motive was to provide edifying books for the steadily increasing numbers of people able to read. It is certain that a great deal of disedifying rubbish was available and needed to be counteracted by something better (a need which is far more clamant to-day than eighty or ninety years ago).

There were Christian people who strongly disapproved of fictional writing of any sort; but they especially disapproved of fictional writing on themes associated with the Bible or the early days of the Christian faith: yet the demand for reading matter could not be ignored. It was met, and the result was that at one time nearly every household had copies of such books as "The Prince of the House of David" and "Ben Hur." These are probably the best known of such novels, but older readers will recall many others which were read and re-read.

* * *

"Ben Hur" is the one which has survived, though less as a book than as a film. The author, Lew Wallace, was an American soldier in the Union Army during the Civil War which began just a hundred years ago. He was an officer in a Northern regiment, and after the war ended he remained in the forces and was at length promoted to General rank. In later life he settled in Indiana and was a well-known figure in public life. He wrote other things as well as "Ben Hur," but they are long forgotten.

Wallace's background was, as far as we know evangelical and Protestant. "Ben Hur," was the work of one who was fascinated by the Gospels and the significance and appeal of the Christ. The hero of the novel, and many other figures in it sooner or later come into contact with the personality of the Son of Man, and learn something of "the truth as it is in Jesus."

This book has now been made a film for the second time (the earlier film was made in 1927). Why? Are we to say that the film magnates have discovered the box-office value of Christianity, or of religion? We recollect the recent furore over the film "The Ten Commandments," and these great themes associated with the most supreme lessons and experiences of the human race ought to impress the mind of each generation. But is "Ben Hur" with its visual presentation of Our Lord before Pilate, and on the Cross, brought before the public to serve a Christian purpose? Are Christians pleased that the entertainment value and interest of our faith have been discovered?

It may be said that great Christian art is the parallel. We do not agree. The great painters and sculptors who used Biblical subjects have a place in Christian tradition. They are interpreters; but the film is different, if only because the living performers cannot eliminate self. It is their personality which presumes to interpret the Redeemer. How can it be reconciled with the ascended and glorified Humanity of Our Lord now reigning in Heaven that sinful men should treat Him as if He were a character in a Shakespeare play, and they could bring Him before us to be seen with the eye of flesh? He can, in truth, be seen only with the eye of faith to-day.

* * *

"Ben Hur" has been on view in Dublin. We are informed in M.G.M. News that "the Catholic Press" in Britain "received it with tremendous enthusiasm." We hope that it is fully recognised that the book of the film had a Protestant background, and we hope that some who go to view the spectacular film may seek to learn more and turn to the New Testament, and study it. If this happens (and we shall never know) it would go far to teach us that good may occasionally emerge from situations which are dubious. Still, our conviction remains that the place to hear Christian truth is the house of God, not the cinema, and we dislike any re-enacting of the personality of Our Lord and of the occasion of His dying for us. The darkness that came upon the land during the hours of the Crucifixion is a symbol of the reverence, silence and secrecy of the final hour: that is what we must respect.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 122.

National Rally of Witness is being arranged to take place at the Royal Albert Hall, London, on October 24th, 1961; and the Alliance also hopes to have a share in a stand at the Ideal Home Exhibition at Olympia in March next year, focusing attention upon the Word of God—"The Ideal Book for the Ideal Home." Further details concerning these activities will be made available later.

* * *

Ultramontanism

The Ultramontane view can be summarized in a single, concise, and luminous proposition; but out of this proposition are evolved a doctrine and a view that embrace not merely religion and the Church, but science and the state, politics, morals and the social order—in a word, the whole intellectual life of men and nations. The proposition runs: The Pope is the supreme, the infallible, and consequently, the sole authority in all that concerns religion, the Church, and morality; and each of his utterances on these topics demands unconditional submission—internal no less than external.

—F. V. Dollinger.

[Dr. F. Von Dollinger was of course the great Munich historian of the last century. He strenuously opposed the dogma of Papal Infallibility decreed at the Vatican Council in 1870. He had much to do with the once well-known volume "The Pope and the Council" by "Janus," and was the friend and adviser of the German "old Catholics" who left the Papal Communion in protest against the new dogma].

* * *

Evangelicals In Brazil

In the current issue of the missionary quarterly Frontier, Sir Kenneth Grubb writes on the astonishing progress of Evangelical Christianity in Brazil, a modern go-ahead country, larger in area than the United States, and with a mixed population of sixty-five millions. Sir Kenneth reckons that there are now about three million persons in the country who claim attachment to the Evangelical community. In the quick-growing city of Sao Paulo alone there are 30 places where small Evangelical groups meet, or the Gospel is preached. One of the most fascinating developments is that of the Pentecostal Churches. There are Pentecostal congregations which bring together on a Sunday over 5,000 people, and do it with astonishing regularity. Most of the congregations belong to the Assemblies of God, and they represent a community of over half a million people. One reason for the progress of the Gospel in Brazil, in the opinion of Sir Kenneth, is that the Portuguese-Brazilian character is less prone to religious fanaticism than the Spanish; more open, more easy-going, and more tolerant of new doctrines. At the popular level, it is also more sentimental and more mystical. It is refreshing to learn of a country in which church membership is growing faster than the increase of population.

* * *

Church unity step by Pope—"Affection for Anglicans"

By a Sunday Times Reporter

The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Liverpool, Dr. John Heenan, is now awaiting detailed instructions from the Vatican before making informal contacts with non-Roman Catholic denominations in Britain. This follows the setting up by Pope John, last month, of a secretariat for Christian unity in an attempt to establish greater co-operation between the Roman Catholic and other Christian Churches.

The secretariat consists of ten members from eight different countries, all personally appointed by the Pope. It is headed by 79 year old Cardinal Bea and its secretary, Monsignor Willebrands, of Holland, has extensive contacts in non-Catholic churches.

The British members are Dr. Heenan and Father Gerard Corr, a Servite priest. Dr. Heenan told me he had received his document of appointment from the Pope and was now awaiting detailed instructions.

"When I was in audience with Pope John in August he expressed a great affection for the Anglicans. He is all for having the greatest co-operation which is compatible with truth. In other words, no compromise in doctrine, but as close a unity as possible for good works. That is the Pope's personal outlook."

Many Obstacles

At the moment the Vatican discourages undue optimism about quick results and expects the path to Christian unity to be slow, since there are many obstacles to overcome.

But the formation of the secretariat does make it possible for other denominations to have informal talks with the Roman Catholic Church, and provides for the first time a machinery for the results of such talks to be passed on to appropriate Vatican offices.

When the secretariat was set up, Cardinal Bea wrote: "Nothing can show better to what extent the Roman Church has at heart the mutual understanding between Churches and to what extent it is prepared to encourage this."

In his diocesan letter for this month the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Geoffrey Fisher, wrote that he regarded the secretariat as "Full of godly promise."

"Where there was ignorance and suspicion, there is now increasing sympathetic interest, and in some quarters a manifest desire to enter into the spirit of this movement to see what God can teach us all through it."

—"Sunday Times" 9-10-1960.

[We comment on this elsewhere in this number of "The Catholic." The proposal is very significant and calls for very cautious study as well as recognition of a new attitude.]

* * *

America—A Question

"Is the Church losing Latin America?" asks "The Reformer"—which then goes on to say... "Half the world's Catholics may be lost to the Faith!" This is not wishful thinking on the part of Protestants. It is taken from the headlines in a Roman Catholic home weekly. Roman Catholicism is losing hold, while Protestant Christianity is advancing by leaps and bounds. This is good news, for there has been defeatist talk for a long time. Now the Bible is at large in South America, and, as in Reformation times, the Bible is speaking for itself. Here, too, there have been martyrs, and the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church, as Tertullian told us long ago.

—"The Bulwark."

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	—o—	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND
AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

THE WORD OF GOD . . .

AMONG ALL NATIONS . . .

Pagans, Moslems, Jews, and other strangers to the Gospel, need its gracious Light and Truth.

To enrich them with this precious gift is the earnest desire of those who by their prayers and gifts contribute to the work of the

TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRELAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from
A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.

WITH THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE HOPE TRUST.

FOUNDED BY REV. THOMAS CONNELLAN.

No. 12.—LXIX.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1960.

PRICE THREEPENCE

A MONTHLY PAPER IN DEFENCE OF THE
DOCTRINES OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND
PROTESTANT CHRISTIANITY

“God is spirit, and they that worship him
must worship him in spirit and truth.”

—John iv. 24.

“Restraint within appointed limits, not unchecked development is the true characteristic of the Church’s wisdom and humility; not the accumulation of new doctrines, but the deep and earnest practical realisation of the all-sufficing doctrine she already and from the beginning possesses.”—W. ARCHER BUTLER.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION, 5/- POST FREE.

Publishing Office - - 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Church Education Society for Ireland.

FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

to help Parochial Clergy to maintain their small Protestant Schools, from which State Grants have been withdrawn owing to insufficient average.

Subscriptions gratefully received by

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Important Pamphlets

"MARRIAGE, MY CHOICE"—Venerable Archdeacon Hammond, Th.D.

"SHOULD I JOIN THE CHURCH OF ROME?"
—Rev. F. H. Kinch, M.A.

"PURGATORY"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"THE REFORMATION"—"L.C."

"CLONARD SERMONS"—Canon H. O. Lindsay.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGAL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION

for over sixty years has sought to spread
the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland.

Read Fr. Connellan's Autobiography.

1/3 Post Free.

"Hear the Other Side."

Fourteenth Edition.

Read Canon Herbert Lindsay's Sermons.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered"

This Office, 6d. Post Free.

THE IRISH MISSION

IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND.

At present there is a great opportunity for circulating the Scriptures in Ireland. The mission, by the medium of Colportage, is seeking to make the most of this.

We ask all interested in the future wellbeing of our country to help us by their prayers and gifts.

REV. F. RUPERT GIBSON, B.A.,
Church House,
Fisherwick Place,
BELFAST.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN BALE IN IRELAND IN 1553"

1s. 3d. post free.

A Bishop tells the story of his efforts
to further the Reformation in Ireland.

Publications Which Will Interest You

SIMPLE INVESTIGATIONS OF GREAT TRUTHS
(Studies of "The Rule of Faith", "Justification",
"Holy Communion and The Mass") 48 pp. 6d.
Post Free.

FROM DARKNESS INTO LIGHT, by the Rev.
A. J. Claesen—(the story of a former Roman Catholic Priest). 48 pp. 3d. Post Free.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the Rev. Thos.
Connellan. 8 pp. 2d. Post Free.

ALEXANDRO GAVAZZI, by the Rev. Mariano
Rughi—(the story of an Italian Priest, Patriot
and Reformer).

HEAR THE OTHER SIDE, by the Rev. Thomas
Connellan—Fr. Connelan's sketch of auto-
biography, just reissued 1/-.

ST. PETER AND ROME, by J.B.S. (An historical
inquiry into the Claims of Rome based on Peter's episcopate). 52 pp. 4d. Post Free

CONNELLAN MISSION OFFICE,
5a TOWNSEND STREET, DUBLIN.

CONTENTS

	Page
Passing Events	133
Things on which Protestants and Roman Catholics Agree	133
"O Come, All Ye Faithful"	136
Editor's Chair	138
"Till He Come"	140
Index	143

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Prejudice and the Presidency

[The following letter appeared last month in "The Guardian". While we normally avoid strictly political matters, we felt that the writer had a point of view which calls for serious consideration. The American Presidency is perhaps the most important position in the free world, and while we believe that Mr. Kennedy will do his best to serve his people in the spirit of his promises if elected, we think all opinions and criticisms should be heard.]

Sir,—You deplore the religious bigotry and political prejudice now manifest in the American presidential campaign. So do I. But whereas you lean backwards in ascribing it to the Protestant bigots of the fundamentalist South, I take a much more neutral position, for I cannot for the life of me see how you can overlook and condone the most bigoted and powerful organised body of the United States to-day—the Roman Catholics. If Senator Kennedy loses the election, it will certainly be because many minority groups and professed liberals cannot stomach what organised American Catholicism stands for.

First, Senator Kennedy is a pure product of this organised Catholic faction. There is nothing neutral about the Catholics of Boston and Massachusetts. They voted him in as Senator precisely because they felt that he represented their interests and their beliefs. Politics are completely polarised in his State, and this is due almost entirely to the political prejudices of the Catholic hierarchy in it. There is nothing in Senator Kennedy's political background to show that he can succeed in shaking off the overriding priestly influence that has so far fostered his career.

Secondly, anyone who has closely followed the political and religious propaganda of the central Catholic body in the United States over a number of years—the National Catholic Welfare Conference, with headquarters in Washington, DC—can only testify to the fact that its prime object is to intensify and profit from religious bigotry and political prejudice throughout the country. It seeks to make the United States completely Catholic. There is nothing neutral or liberal about it. The proportion of Catholics who resist its guidance in American affairs, internal and external, is a minute fraction of 1 per cent. There are few anti-clericals among American Catholics; the contrast with France or Italy is extraordinary. The intellectual feebleness of so-called educated American Catholics has long been one of the most deplorable features of American civilisation.

—(Continued on p. 142.)

THINGS ON WHICH PROTESTANTS AND ROMAN CATHOLICS AGREE

The Ven. Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, Th.D.

I should be sorry to think that anyone who listens to these broadcasts would get the idea that Protestants can see no good in the Roman Catholic faith or that it is sufficient to regard anything as part of the belief of Roman Catholics in order to condemn it. We must all steadily set our face against unintelligent prejudice of this kind. It reminds me of an old controversy that probably very few of you have heard. Jonathan Edwards, the famous New England Divine, wrote, "A Careful and Strict Inquiry on The Freedom of the Will," in which he replied at length to Dr. Whitby's "Discourse on the Five Points of Calvinism." Meeting the objection that the agreement between the stoic philosophers and Calvinists "shows the Calvinistic doctrine to be heathenish." Dr. Jonathan Edwards replied with well-deserved sarcasm "as though it were a sure way to be in the right to take good heed to differ from them" (p.203). There are some people like these old controversialists to-day—

It is enough to say a doctrine is taught by the Church of Rome to condemn it. They do not even stop to ask if it is peculiar to the Church of Rome. Label it Roman Catholic and that is all you need "as though it were a sure way to be in the right to take good heed to differ from them." I find this very common. It is not confined to one party. Prejudice takes the place of reason in every type of man. In order to remove this dangerous opinion I would like to talk to-night on some things on which Protestants and Roman Catholics agree. The first point of agreement on which I wish to touch is one that received attention in a pamphlet by a Rev. Henry Johnston, S.J., of Melbourne. He tries to answer the question, "Is the Catholic Church Intolerant?" Naturally Mr. Johnston means the Roman Catholic Church. On the point at issue he has many excellent things to say. I will only select one. He imagines that the difference between Protestants and Roman Catholics is that the Roman Catholic Church teaches "Believe what an infallible Church teaches," while the Protestants teach "Believe as you choose." Now, says Fr. Johnston, we all know that our opinions are likely to be mistaken, therefore what another man chooses to believe may be as likely to be right as what you choose to believe, i.e., Protestant's tolerance on points of faith is the index of his uncertainty. On the other hand a Roman Catholic is certain that he has an infallible guide and he cannot but repudiate anything that runs counter to his opinions, when his opinions are taken from his guide. Hence the Protestant looks on him as intolerant, whereas really he is only quite confident. Here are two things on which I find myself in complete agreement with Fr. Johnston. I agree with him that a system which claims to be in possession of an infallible guide must be unalterably opposed to every other system.

* * *

But suppose for a moment that I am not convinced that the guide is infallible? Suppose I think the guide is not only wrong but mischievously wrong? Would not the argument swing round on him? If the Roman Catholic Church must be unalterably hostile to an opinion that conflicts with what it regards as infallible guidance, must not others be equally hostile to opinions that claim to be infallible, but which they believe are mischievously wrong? And that brings me to a second point of agreement. Protestants hold that they have a sure guide in the Word of God. Now, is not the Word of God as imperative an authority as the word of the Pope or the word of the Church? Why, then, do some Roman Catholics claim the right of a holy intolerance for themselves and deny it almost in the same breath to their Protestant neighbours? Is it not simpler and more in accord with facts to say that what a man believes he is bound to enforce?

The question is how is he to enforce it? Protestants contend that things of the soul can only be enforced by spiritual means and therefore it is wrong to persecute. A church has the right to exclude people from her communion, but when they leave she should leave them alone. It is here that differences emerge. The Roman Catholic Church claims that her infallible guidance must be accepted in very many departments of life. However, we can readily see that what is called bigotry and intolerance may readily be the working out of a perfectly logical principle.

The Roman Catholic says, "The Church or the Pope says so and that is an end of all argument." The Protestant says, "The Word of God says so and that is an end of all argument." Both are regarded as intolerant by people who hold that the economic condition creates the prevalent dogmatic conceptions. As economics change, the conceptions charge with them. Fr. Johnston has rendered a good service in showing that it is idle to level a charge of intolerance indiscriminately against people with sincere beliefs.

* * *

But there is a wider measure of agreement than in the philosophical presentation of the ground of faith. The most remarkable fact in history is that certain great principles have survived the shock of division which I am setting forth is that these foundation truths held by all sections of the Christian Church have proved their worthy by the very fact of survival and that it would be madness to reject them because they are held by those who differ widely from us. On the contrary, when we find such agreement, it ought to predispose us to consider that particular belief favourably.

* * *

Darwin thought that the general consent of mankind was the strongest argument for the existence of a Supreme Being. Protestants think that the general agreement on the statement in the Creed is the strongest evidence that it represents the teaching of Scripture. We are glad to be able to stand side by side with our Roman Catholic friends on the great fundamentals of the faith. I hope, personally, that the day will never come when we would remain lukewarm in any great crises of faith and morals simply because the conflict is carried on by Roman Catholics. I have personally to acknowledge great services rendered by them to the cause alike of public morality and of scriptural truth. I would earnestly protest against the statement of Dr. Rumble when he says: "You recite the same Creed but you do not believe it in the true Catholic sense. Catholics recite and accept the Apostles Creed in practice, Anglicans recite it." That seems to me untrue and unkind. That some Protestants differ from me as to the exact meaning of the Creed may be true, but I would not feel justified in saying: "They recite the Creed, but do not accept it." But I must not be drawn aside from my main purpose. Protestants and Roman Catholics, despite very many serious differences, have a strong body of common belief and either side does an ill service to truth by denying that fact. I received a letter from a Mr. Myers, who, after very kindly commenting on my broadcasts continues: "I have always in mind, however, that in one direction you are definitely in agreement with the Roman Church. I refer to the Virgin Birth story. This crystallisation of a 'fairy' story is a great source of strength to that Church. I know that you hold to the truth of the story from a report of . . . a sermon published in the "Herald" some years ago, but I still feel that your logic was not very convincing on that occasion. An overdue new order in the Christian Church would put these teachings right . . . you continue to cripple your anti-Roman propaganda, and turn out young fledglings with untenable theories." I presume, of course, that Mr. Myers means by my logic, my reasons, as my logic is exactly the same as his.

* * *

I am glad that he perceives that I am resolutely on the same side as the Roman Catholic Church on this matter. I have not changed my opinions since I preached the sermon to which he refers. I still believe in the words of the Creed "born of the Virgin Mary." I unite with Rev. Martin J. Scott, S.J., in saying: "If that profession of faith was true in the Apostolic era it is true now. If it was false then, all Christianity is false and revelation a sham (Virgin Birth, p. 271). Others may not think so, but it seems to me as it seems to Father Scott "That is as clear as words can make it." I turn therefore to the questions Mr. Myers proposes. "Does not," he says, "the Virgin Birth story make Jesus nothing but the caricature of a man?" My answer is that Mr. Myers assumes here that for the reality of human nature a double parentage is necessary. Leaving out altogether the miracle-working power of God, that is contrary to the facts of nature. Perfect creatures have been formed with all the powers of a normal being, in that order, where there has been only a single parent. This is a simple matter of fact. Parthenogenesis where observed has not resulted in a caricature. "Is not the Jewish race," asks Mr. Myers, "robbed of its finest son?" The answer is that Mary was certainly a Jewish maiden and the Christian Creed is that our Lord is "Man of the substance of his Mother born in the world." The validity of this argument depends on the validity of the first and that is certainly without ground even in nature. But, continues Mr. Myers, "Is it not a materialistic story, dwelling on the body rather than on the soul?" This assumes that we are wholly conversant with the relation of soul to body and also ignores the Christian Creed that our Lord was "Perfect Man of a reasonable human soul and flesh subsisting." Is there anything more materialistic in a Virgin Birth than in an ordinary birth? In answer to the question "How does Jesus connect with David if he was not Joseph's son?" I would say Mary was also, of the seed of David. There were two links—officially, as the recognised son of Joseph. Actually, through Mary's descent from the line of David. He sets the following problem "If the story is literally true, did not Jesus have an unfair advantage over us: in that he had only one parent to whom the theory of original sin could apply, whereas we had two?" This assumes that our Lord had original sin and also that original sin is communicated from both parents by a material connection. This is more materialistic than any view of the incarnation. It is not necessary to hold that original sin is like a disease. It is a matter of the soul and not of the flesh, hence the question misses the real point. Mr. Myers continues "Is not the original plan of incarnation of souls miraculous enough?" I would answer that this question is irrelevant. There is no comparison of the miraculous. The Incarnation means that God becomes man. This is an act of condescending grace. The question betrays a false conception, namely, that Christianity is simply a play on the marvellous. The next question is even more surprising. It reads: "If the story is literally true, why did Jesus need the same length of time as us, for gestation?" I answer, "Why not?" What peculiar law of cell formation known to Mr. Myers governs the Virgin Birth? Then Mr. Myers asks, "Is not the story an insult to honest parenthood?" No more than the creation of the first man or Professor Haldane's view of the emergence of living organisms from photo-synthesised proteins. If God has ordained honest parenthood, that makes it holy. The fact that He blesses one parent instead of two cannot make dual parenthood unholy or reflect in any way on His normal provision. Then Mr. Myers asks, "Is not this a case where Protestant churches prop up the Roman Church by subscribing to the same teaching; the story being characteristic of Roman Catholic teaching and more in keeping with a celibate priesthood and sisterhood? This means that the Gospels are the peculiar property of the Roman Church, which we cannot admit. The story is characteristic of all Christian teaching. It is in the 39 articles, The Westminster Confession and

The Continental Confessions. It offers no support for celibacy, as the Blessed Virgin was espoused to Joseph and subsequently married him.

* * *

In reply to a further question, it is true that an Anglican Church committee reported a difference of belief in the story of the Virgin Birth. I share the view expressed by many "that belief in the Word made flesh is integrally bound up with belief in the Virgin Birth." Mr. Myers suggests that the story may mean the birth of the first child and that the correct sense of the word was overlooked in translation, and then interpolations introduced to round off the story. This view is not consistent with the two narratives. From different points of view, they unite in asserting the Virgin Birth. The phrasing is too various to admit of any change due to mistaking a word or a few words. All the variations of text we know preserve the central theme in the two stories.

"O COME, ALL YE FAITHFUL:"

Each year is "the year of Our Lord": and all things date from Bethlehem. The Christian's heart and head must "be glad with the yearly remembrance of the birth of Our Saviour." It is essential to claim for Our Lord that He had a birth-day; and for that December 25 will serve as well as any other day. What matter if we are told that December 25 was in old times a winter festival of the sun? It is not that now. We thank our Eternal Father that in the fulness of the time His Eternal Son took our nature and was born of the Virgin Mary. We lay emphasis upon the fact of His physical birth because we reject all docetic notions. Students of theology know how easy it was in a primitive and superstitious age to think that the Christ on earth ONLY APPEARED TO BE truly man, but was not really partaker of our nature. The term "docetic" means "seeming" (Greek "docesis" = semblance), and marks an effort to explain the Gospel story of the coming of Our Saviour. But no attempt to explain the coming of Christ as some sort of ethereal manifestation can by any possibility be satisfactory. Such an attempt would take all redemptive meaning from the Cross, and transform the Precious Blood into a piece of Mythology. We must keep to the written Word of God if we are to value rightly the Incarnate Word. If Christ was not "in the truth of our nature," and if the Word did not "become flesh and dwell among us" the Cross is made of no effect, and becomes an idle symbol, and the Gospel becomes a rosicrucian fairy-tale.

* * *

We refuse the other error which denies the Divine Nature, and thinks of Our Lord as man only. When we read in St. Luke's Gospel and St. Matthew's of the angelic promises, the personal revelation to Mary and to Joseph, the vision of the shepherds of Bethlehem "abiding in the fields and keeping watch over their flocks," the birth in the stable, the coming of the wise men from the East, we see how inadequate it is to call Him no more than the best of men. He is of course our race's noblest son; but he is far more—

"Veiled in flesh the Godhead see;
"Hail the Incarnate Deity,
"Pleased as Man with men to dwell,
"Jesus, our Emmanuel"!

* * *

We must regret that the winter festival has been for centuries a season of secular entertainment, and we must regret that it is increasingly a period of commercial exploitation. To-day the faithful remembrance of the birth of Christ is overshadowed by the incessant demands to buy consumer goods, and to indulge the appetites to repletion. The season ought to be a very happy time — but we put the question "Is it a happy time because for a day or two we put out of our thoughts the grim realities of life and the atomic threats of the mid-century, and let ourselves go; or is it a happy time because we "Hail redemption's happy dawn" and are filled with thanksgiving that the Jesus who was born at Bethlehem received that name of victory—

"He shall save his people from their sins"?

It is easy for us in our careless ways to pursue the shadows and forfeit the substance. The shadows and illusions are the self-centred and worldly approaches to the fact of Christ's coming on earth, while the substance is God's message of peace "to men in whom He is well-pleased."

* * *

The men in whom God is well-pleased are the men and women who come with sincere earnest and penitent hearts to worship and serve the Incarnate Lord. The message of the Nativity is for the faithful: for all who joy in Christ as the Deliverer, the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

* * *

The festive season, as it is commonly called, is thought to be a season of goodwill — is goodwill seasonal? If it is genuine ought it not to be persistent and enduring? By this we can see how much is bogus in the secular celebrations: the bonhomie which scarcely survives Boxing-Day is a very thin and fleeting veneer upon the feelings of the natural man. We do not despise even a momentary suspension of the daily round of distrust and rivalry, but we think that it is no honouring of Our Redeemer that we associate with the yearly remembrance of His Birth much that is cupidity, self-indulgence and salesmanship.

* * *

Contrast with all that the true recognition of the Incarnate Lord—confession of sin and acknowledgement of our need of forgiveness—the prayer of faith and penitence—joy in the knowledge that “God so loved the world that he gave His only-begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life”—realisation that He only is “Our Peace” since He is made of God unto us “Wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption” (Cor. 1. 30).

Do not these realities of Christian truth and experience mean infinitely more than the tinsel Christmases of Commerce?

* * *

There is a story that when the Dutch painter Varelst was commissioned to paint a portrait of King James II he painted on the canvas a symbolic decoration of tulips then the chief flower in Holland. He did this so beautifully that the tulips drew attention away from the face of the king. We may use this as a parable of all that we have said—if worldly interests form a setting for the honouring of the Birth of Our Saviour they can readily become, for worldly minds, the dominant note, so that what should honour Christ ends by obliterating Him.

* * *

It is an Anglican custom or rule to administer the Sacrament of the Lord's supper on the Feast of the Nativity. We cannot say if many among the other Reformed Churches do this. If some think that to remember the Lord's death on the day we commemorate His birth means the introduction of a discordant note we think the answer is that the custom we refer to is a safeguard to ensure that the purpose and object of the Incarnation will not be forgotten—“I am the living Bread which came down from Heaven” (John 6. 51); “I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep and am known of Mine . . . and I lay down My life for the sheep” (John 10. 14); “I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth in me should not abide in darkness” (John 12, 46). In remembering the Saviour's birth we ought to remember why He was born; Why He took our Nature; Why He was made like us in all things, sin only excepted. We ought to see that He was born under the shadow of the Cross, and when we think of Calvary we cannot think of the Nativity without recalling His words that He came to give His life a ransom for many.

* * *

There are accompaniments of the season which are innocent and glad—the Christmas rose, the red-or yellow-berried holly, lights and greetings. We may sing carols or listen to them if we will, and there are readings appropriate to the day—a friend now with God told us years ago that he always read Milton's “Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity” and Charles Dickens's “Christmas Carol”, a good choice indeed. It should be needless to say that the reading of God's Word must have priority—Isaiah 7, 10-15 “The Virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call His name Immanuel” (Berkeley Vers.) etc. Luke 1 and 2, and Matthew 1, 18-25. We should read also John 1, 1-14 and Hebrews 1, 1-24. Those passages enlighten us when we think of the great mystery of God's redeeming purpose.

* * *

Let us remember too that the historic fact of the Incarnation belongs to the past, but there is much which remains to be revealed by God and experienced by men. We must not forget that the Saviour of the World is coming again. His Glorious Appearing is the event towards which all creation moves. For it, His people wait.

We may think the time is long since that day, when he ascended up on high, led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men, but He gives us with the gift of faith, the gift of patience, and two days of God's time have not been spent yet. The events of human history are moving to the predestined pattern: shall we deny the inevitabilities which demonstrate the purposes of God? Jesus said (Luke 21, 31) “When ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the Kingdom of God is nigh at hand” — “lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh.”

The clever among us may dismiss “our hope” as sheer naiveté; but God's Word has been vindicated time after time against the clever men of the past, and it will be again. It says “Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation” (Heb. 9. 28). That Second Advent calls for the readiness and expectancy Our Lord taught us, and it builds within our hearts and minds a sense of purpose and culmination.

Our Lord was born to give us second birth, and so to fit us for eternal glory “O ye heights of heaven, adore Him!

Angel-hosts His praises sing!
All dominions, bow before Him,
And extol our God and King!
Let no tongue on earth be silent,
Every voice in concert ring!

Registered at Stationer's Hall.

THE CATHOLIC.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1960.

All communications connected with the Literary Department and Books for Review should be addressed to the EDITOR, 5a Townsend Street, and should be sent previous to the Twelfth of the month. Articles in harmony with the spirit and aim of THE CATHOLIC are invited. MSS. cannot be returned unless accompanied with a stamped wrapper, with full address.

Business communications in connection with the Publishing Office should be addressed to the MANAGER, Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

Remittances by Postal Order, Money Order or Cheque should be crossed and made payable to the CONNELLAN MISSION, and crossed Provincial Bank.

Twelve Copies and upwards sent for a year (post free) to any single address on receipt of the published price.

Single copy for one year (post free) Five Shillings, payable in advance.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

ARCHBISHOP AND POPE.

Most of our readers know that a hot controversy has developed over the announcement made by the Archbishop of Canterbury that this month he intends to pay a call on the Pope. The circumstances are plain: the Archbishop is about to visit the south-east of Europe and will pay visits to several church leaders, including the head of the Orthodox, (or Greek, or Eastern) church, who lives in Constantinople, and is styled "the Ecumenical Patriarch". This title is itself a protest against the claim of the Bishop of Rome that he is the one true Ecumenical Patriarch, for Eastern Orthodoxy has patiently refused to submit to the Papacy. For long centuries, totalling close on a thousand years, Eastern churches have disowned the claim of Rome to exercise universal jurisdiction over the Church of Christ.

The Archbishop of Canterbury is paying a courtesy visit to the Patriarch because for a long time English churchmen have sympathised with the oft persecuted Christian of the East. Those lands which were once part of the Christian Empire of the East have been for centuries under Turkish and Islamic rule, and Christians were often subject to cruel tyrannies and oppression. In the nineteenth century English churchmen were energetic in their efforts to ameliorate their lot, and the great Prime Minister W. E. Gladstone, protested to the Turkish emperor and obtained some measures of redress and toleration. Later an Archbishop of Canterbury did much for the smaller Eastern churches, Assyrian etc., and students from them were welcomed in England and by friendly aid and encouragement brought to realise the importance of the scriptural presentation of the Christian faith. We have been told on good authority that this considerate approach has led various parts of Orthodoxy to give fresh attention to the study of the Bible. If that is correct we may well be thankful that the spirit of good will has this measure of freedom. We know the phrase "The opening of Thy Words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple" (Psalm 119, 130), and we rejoice over any in Orthodox circles who turn to God's Word for spiritual truth and guidance. It is far better to foster the spirit of reformation within a church than to try to act upon it from without. In short, we do not want to change the Orthodox into Lutherans or Baptists or Methodists or Anglicans: we want Orthodoxy to be cleansed, renewed, inspired and nourished by evangelical principles which are the truths of God's Word.

We think that much may be done in this way (and not only by Anglicans), if we are faithful in prayer, and sympathy towards churches which have endured the harsh rule of Mohammedanism, and have had, at the same time, to endure the encroachments of Rome.

* * *

Rome has always had the ambition to capture Orthodox churches and bring them under its jurisdiction. In the late middle ages when Christian Constantinople (new Rome as it had been called) was facing the threat of Turkish conquest it seemed for a moment that Rome had won, for the Easterns at the Council of Florence practically surrendered to the Pope in expectation that rulers in Western Europe would come to their assistance. But when the Eastern delegates returned home from Florence their concessions or surrenders or agreements (call them what you will) were repudiated and independence was retained.

* * *

From the sixteenth century onwards the policy of Rome in Eastern Europe has been to create schisms in the Orthodox fold. Rome has set up churches in Eastern Europe which in nearly all respects seem to be Orthodox. They use the Orthodox Byzantine (or Constantinople) rites and canons and conform largely to Orthodox customs but acknowledge the infallibility and sovereignty of the Pope and confess belief in the Roman Catholic dogmas. Such churches are found in Poland, Hungary, Rumania, and Ukraine (as well as in areas of Western Asia). We cannot of course say how those inside the Iron Curtain fare to-day, but the policy of Rome is clear enough.

Against this background we must place the plans of the forthcoming Ecumenical Council summoned by the present Pope to meet at the end of 1961 or in 1962. The purpose of the Council, is, as we noted in an earlier issue, first, to revise and reform certain aspects of church life, legal, liturgical etc., and secondly, to try to reconcile the Orthodox or Eastern Churches with Rome, and thirdly, to invite the Protestant churches to abandon their protests, and return to "the fold".

* * *

This is a very large programme and not to be planned in a moment. We have no inside information of course, but we cannot help associating in our mind the papal plans for the Council with the visit of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Ecumenical Patriarch and his colleagues. If the Vatican makes overtures to the Eastern Churches we can scarcely suppose, that they will not be discussed in principle by the Patriarch and the Archbishop. As Anglicanism is not likely to surrender to Rome we believe its influence would tell against any surrender on the part of orthodoxy. This is, we admit, conjecture on our side, but we do not think it unreasonable. In fact, it would be quite extraordinary if the Archbishop did not discuss the situation likely to arise when the Council meets, and it would be odd if the Patriarch did not wish to enter into such a discussion.

* * *

Both the Easterns and the Anglicans are members of the World Council of Churches, and it has frequently been said (though at times more good-humouredly than seriously) that the door is open to Rome, and that the Pope will be very welcome if and when he cares to join. It is quite safe to give that invitation because in the nature of things it cannot be accepted. As things are (and must continue) Rome can only come in as a part of the Church of Christ, recognising the rights of other parts of the Church. But unless Rome changes greatly that is what it cannot do.

Can we expect, as an alternative, that the reformed and evangelical churches, now world-wide, will repudiate their history, disown the Reformation and their martyrs, and figuratively speaking sit at the gates of St. Peter's in sackcloth and ashes? Can we expect the Eastern churches which are superficially far more like Rome than the Protestant churches, to abandon their own position and acknowledge to-day what they have always denied, viz., that they are mere schismatics, in rebellion against the centre of unity God has appointed?

It seems to us then, that the World Council of Churches, with all its faults is not really a conspiracy to lead us into spiritual bondage. It is open to much serious criticism we know, but we believe it is unfair to accuse it of policies which it has not adopted. We believe that it must keep to its avowed objects; that it must not take the place of churches; and that any enlargement of its scope should be very thoroughly scrutinised by its constituent churches.

* * *

What then about the Archbishop of Canterbury's tour to eastern Europe, and visit to the Vatican? The Archbishop intends to stay a few days in Rome. He will be in a city where the ancient, the mediaeval, and the modern are associated as nowhere else in Europe. One of the places of most interest is the Vatican Palace itself. We would consider ourselves foolish indeed if we were in Rome and did not try to visit the Vatican with its vast and incomparable treasures of art and learning. "Yes," someone will say, "we agree so far. The Archbishop could consider the Vatican as a museum and himself as a sightseer, but why go and seek audience with the Pope, a thing no Archbishop of Canterbury has done since the Reformation?" Well, that calls for consideration, and when we think it over we are inclined to say that a person occupying the position of Archbishop of Canterbury ought not to go to the Vatican merely as a tourist or incognito. He and the Pope are aged men. While they have their official positions to uphold, they must inevitably face far deeper and far higher considerations in the near future. Eternity is close to them, and behind the formularies of one creed or another there abides the question, "what is our hope, in death as in life?" If they agree that Christ and Christ alone is our Hope in the hour of death and in the day of judgement they will not be enemies.

Further, the Archbishop of Canterbury is not an obscure person. It would be improper, we think, that he should visit the Vatican as an ordinary tourist. He goes in his full status as Archbishop of Canterbury. He does not go as a penitent disclaiming his own situation and apologising for his pretensions. Reception by the Pope implies some agree of recognition of his status. If the Pope was not prepared to recognise in some degree the Archbishop's ecclesiastical standing he could simply have made it clear that an audience (interview or reception) was not desirable.

* * *

Of one thing we are quite sure: Rome, not the reformers, made unacceptable terms of fellowship. The Most Revd. Dr. Fisher does not go to Rome to surrender the Protestant cause (a matter which is not in his power to do anyway). He can go because he is entrenched in his reformed position and loyal to it. Reception at the Vatican ought to bring about a wholesome change in the attitude of many Roman Catholics towards Protestants. If their ecclesiastical head receives as a guest the world's leading Protestant bishop, it ought to take away some of the bitterness and hostility towards Protestants which we find in many quarters. We may even hope that the visit may lead Roman Catholics to study the genuine claims of reformed churches instead of dismissing them with contempt or indifference. If these claims of ours are studied afresh and with better understanding the results cannot be valueless.

* * *

During recent weeks the newspapers have commented upon the Archbishop's plans, and reporters have invited various religious leaders to give their opinions. Some have shown enthusiasm, some have been merely tepidly interested, and a few have complained. When views are sought we may expect them to be given freely. Such comments as we have noticed were favourable in the main, for most people take the view that the Archbishop must exercise his private judgement in such a matter; and that it is not everyone's business. Some non-Anglicans have given their views, and where hostile to the project have thought it dangerous. Our own view, which we have sought to set before our readers, is not hostile. We interpret the event as something which points to a diminution of Rome's animus against Protestants. Willingness to admit some Christian good in the Churches of the Reformation is a step in the right direction. Nothing definite or tangible may result; and probably nothing tangible should be looked for.

It has been said that no such step was taken before, so why take it now? We can only say that that is a question Dr. Fisher must have examined seriously before he decided to call at the Vatican. He is not going on a mission of betrayal, for even if he had such thoughts he is powerless to betray or surrender anything. We ought not to entertain such a suspicion. We ought to regard him as a man of goodwill, going on an errand of goodwill. He is a man who wants to speak the truth in love, not in enmity.

There will be no surrender, for there can be no surrender. When a man goes over to Rome he brings only himself as a rule. Newman did not split and wreck the Church of England, nor did Manning when he left a few years after Newman — even if a bishop of the Church of England went over (and none has done so for over three hundred years) it could be only a personal and private event.

* * *

We must add also that to visit the Vatican does not mean that one thinks unscriptural teaching and religious error no longer important. They remain important, and we maintain our protest against them. We have read that the present Pope desires his flock to take everywhere a more friendly attitude to Protestants — can this desire be given effect in Spain, Italy and elsewhere? It is not reasonable to think that the Archbishop of Canterbury wants to encourage better feeling and possibly do something constructive on behalf of persecuted Protestants? At all events we shall look forward eagerly to the press reports of the visits to both Ecumenical Patriarch and Pope.

Ought we not to pray that the journey of the Archbishop may be fruitful of spiritual good in as far as it is a testimony to spiritual truth and christian charity?

"TILL HE COME"

St. Paul (in 1 Cor. xi) wrote of the Lord's Supper that by observing it we "show the Lord's death till He come". That tells us that our faith is not only belief that Christ has come (and lived and died here, and rose again), but is belief that He will return. This return is often called "The Second Coming," or "the Second Advent," or "The Glorious Appearing". Whatever way we describe it, the fact is plain, as plain as any promise contained in Holy Scripture, that just as Our Lord came among us in the beauty and simplicity of His nativity at Bethlehem so He will return to us, and for us, in the beauty and grandeur of His royal power—"and every eye shall see Him and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him" (Rev. 1. 7). He will come with glory and with judgment. Older generations used to speak of "the great assize": we never hear the phrase now for people cannot permit themselves to think that they are culpable. The power of self-examination and of self-condemnation has been lost. If a man asks "what must I do to be saved?" God's Word says "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," but the secular world says "see a psychiatrist." Thus divine judgment is dismissed, and becomes an early casualty in the modern confusion of right and wrong.

The strange thing is that no generation has had the opportunity we have of perceiving the depraved and evil state of human nature. In olden times the iniquities of human conduct could be excused (to some degree) on the ground of ignorance and barbarism. In our day the fact is that evil has been the calculated and deliberated choice of the most highly intelligent of the human race—can that go unrequited? We answer "Let God be God" — let Him be the God Who says "Vengeance is Mine; I will repay."

So judgment is, we consider, an essential element in the moral structure of the universe, and hence we declare our faith in the Creeds of Christianity, that "He shall come again with glory to judge the quick and the dead."

Fallen human nature has had the opportunity to repent and to be restored: where that opportunity has been spurned and "the Son of God has been crucified afresh and put to an open shame" (Heb. vi. 6), we cannot assume that the long suffering of God, His righteous law, and His holy will, may be set aside. Our Lord came once, to be the Saviour; He comes again, to be the judge.

* * *

"Till He come" as an aspect of the Lord's Supper is not of course a reference to judgment. It is rather a sweet and intimate reminder of Christ's promises and a foretaste of that Cup which we shall drink with Him in His Father's Kingdom. It is a phrase to evoke the pleasures of anticipation, and in this sense it is a pledge of His faithfulness.

* * *

Possibly a large part of the Christian world seldom reflects on the Advent message of the Lord's Supper — we tend to think of it as a souvenir of the past, the memorial of the Lord's death, and we add to that the consciousness of Christ's present gift to His faithful, the gift of Himself, spiritually present to our faith—

"present in the heart, not in the hands" as the familiar line in John Keble's poem puts it.

We ought to think more, on these solemn occasions, of the Christian expectancy which is implicit in the Supper. We remember hearing that some devout Jews were in the habit of saying at each Passover feast "next year in Jerusalem!" Thus they kept alive the agelong hope of Israel that the land God gave their fathers would once more be theirs—can we not keep before us at the Lord's Table the Advent Hope and consider that each Breaking of Bread may be the last on earth?

* * *

It may be overmuch to say that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is "the connecting link between the First and the Second Advent," but it has its recognised significance as a duty to be observed "in the meantime". The unseen presence of the Host who welcomes us, and ministers to us, will, one day be no longer unseen but manifest. He will be no more among us as one that serveth, but as "the Prince of the Kings of the earth".

* * *

Why do we keep the Lord's Supper "until He come"? One good reason is that it is a means of honouring Our Lord. To some it may seem to be a modest enough way of paying tribute; and perhaps that is why the Sacrament has been enhanced (as men think) by rich externals and ceremonies. But the true homage is the homage of faith and humility, of penitence and love, of remembrance and watchfulness. The soul that says "Come, Lord Jesus," and really means it, is honouring the Redeemer in the way He loves to be honoured. He said "I have called you friends", and real friends want each other's company.

* * *

The Lord's Supper is a showing to the world the fact of Christ's redeeming death — "Ye do show the Lord's death till He come." Thus it is a proclamation that Christ and Christ alone is the Lamb of God Who has taken away the sin of the world. But it is a showing forth in a certain relationship—that is, we relate Christ's death for us to His promise that the Son of Man will come with power and great glory (Mark 14. 26).

In this there is an Evangelistic purpose, for at the Lord's Table the Good News of Salvation is visibly proclaimed.

* * *

We may also reckon among the lessons of the Lord's Supper the one which is a comfort to Christ's people. We tend in this age to be unsentimental and even callous, and our sympathies are short. Probably we have gone too far from the protracted emotional states which used to be in favour, for not everyone in this world can announce his or her ambition.

"Just as I am, young, strong, and free,

"To be the best that I can be"

Many are old, or infirm, or vulnerable in one way or another, and many have endured a great deal the outside world may be unaware of. We have no right to despise those who specially need comfort: did Our Lord not proclaim that He was here

"to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, to set at liberty them that are bruised"? Can He have overlooked His appointed task

"to comfort all that mourn; to give unto them a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that He might be glorified" (Is. 61)?

His ministry then is for all His people — for the vigorous and active who thank God for their power and promise, and for the frail and heavy-laden. For them the Lord's Table has its special comfort and refreshment. Here we have assurance and encouragement, as well as solace. Here we have Hope renewed and find the true antidote to apathy and self-pity. Here "times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord" (Acts 3. 19).

If we meet the sceptical who say "Where is the promise of His coming" (2 Pet. 3) we answer "Here; His Table is the promise." Our answer may not convince them, but it satisfies His people well.

* * *

A time is coming when this pledge of Christ's Return will be obsolete. Many to-day treat it as obsolete for wrong reasons, or no reasons at all. It can only become obsolete when its purpose is complete. That means that in the Second Advent we can no longer "Do this in remembrance of Him" for we shall be with Him and He with us.

Every man should come to the Lord's Table; and every man must have his own conscientious ground for coming. One may differ from another in understanding and in emphasis, but all can; all ought; to agree that "to show the Lord's death till He come" is a duty and a privilege and a joy. If we have the conviction we shall soon have the courage to come. If we come, then let each Communion be a preparation for the Glorious Appearing of Him Who said "Be ye also ready," and "Watch, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh".

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 133.

Thirdly, I do not see why any Englishman or English newspaper can look forward to a victory of organised American Catholicism with any pleasure or favour. You stress the fact that Catholic voters in the United States are now close to 25 per cent of the total, and you imply that they will mostly support Kennedy. What do we gain from this? Organised American Catholicism remains as anti-British as it was just before and during the war. A Kennedy Administration in Washington is likely to be muddled in its thinking and in action as a consequence, in spite of the overwhelming desire of the American public to see a firm policy to cope with the obvious object of foreign policy, the Soviet Union.

I note that you regard the "comparative absence" of religious and racial intolerance as an extraordinary feature of American life. It all depends, as Joad would have said, on what you mean by "comparative" and "absence." I can only fall back on experience. Ask any Jew living in New York, Chicago, or Boston whether he feels that it is absent. Or any Catholic living in the Deep South, except in New Orleans. Or any negro anywhere. Or, for that matter, any Protestant living in Boston, Chicago, or Cleveland.

Finally, permit me to say one thing. I personally think Senator Kennedy is a very decent and liberal man. If he were an English politician I would probably vote for him like a shot, because we are far more sensible and strongminded about our restraints on religious and racial intolerance than are the Americans. I would probably entrust the Premiership to him. But the Presidency of the United States is a very different kettle of fish.—Yours &c.,

S. BARRON.

20 Earl's Terrace,
London W 8.

* * *

Asia and Europe "an expression of opinion" —Europe bound to be "colony for Japan and China soon."

Europe, "wallowing in an incredible wave of luxury," was bound in the near future to become the colony of "resurgent, industrious and vigorous young Japan and China," said Mr. George Bilainkin, the author and lecturer, yesterday. Mr. Bilainkin, who recently made a 50,000-mile Asian journey, told Kingsbridge (Devon) Rotarians that soon Japan would buy from China instead of America.

"Later, but swiftly, must come their union, 750,000,000 angry, bitter folk, remembering the follies of our ancestors and the unforgivable crimes of Hiroshima and Nagasaki," he said. In five or six years Japanese in their millions would find homes and prosperous work in the Asian continent of Australia—"now a quaint oasis of white backwardness for 10,000,000 where hundreds of millions could be happy."

Call for crumbs

The West was witnessing the end of its era in an unprecedented craze for bigger TV sets, cars, fridges and washing machines, while food was wasted and none could be heard heeding the call for crumbs from equally deserving millions in sullen, silent Asia, particularly in India, Mr. Bilainkin went on.

The Japanese did not concentrate on the "shameless parade" of clothes changes twice a year, but on making the best ships, highest masts, superb cameras and lenses and 10s transistor radio sets. The staggering revolution in Japan and China was not heard in the West, he said.

INDEX TO 1960.

A	PAGE	E	PAGE
Africa	7, 60	Eire, President of	1
America, South	7, 23, 85, 132	Education, Irish	20
Australia	11	Eucharist	32
Anti-Clericalism	14	Essenes	45
Anti-Semitism	24, 35	Europe	60
Allbright, Dr.	45	Elizabeth, Queen	69
Acton, Lord	53	"English Martyrs"	70
Andrew, Agnellus Fr.	63	Eire, Protestants	84
Arabs	71	Eire, Colleges in	86
Altar, Sacrament of	88	England, Rome in	98
Archaeology	97, 112, 116	Ecumenical Council	47, 102, 117
Atheism in E. Germany	109	Exorcism	111
Alliance, Evangelical	121
Asia and Europe	142
B		F
Buttevant, Co. Cork	2	France, R.C.	8, 71
Bullinger, Hy.	9	France, Teachers in	14
Ballarat, Bishop of	50	Franciscans and Dominicans	53
Blessed Virgin Mary	53	Fulton, Rev. Dr.	73
Bible, New English	61	Franco Regime	96
Books, Censoring	61	Fatima letters	111
Bible Society	62	France, Ex-Priests	121
Braille	62	Fisher, Archbishop	138
Berrington, Bishop	70
Basque Priests	95
Bible and Rome	112, 113
Bible, Modern R.C.	113	G
Buddhism and Burma	121	Geneva	9
"Ben Hur"	130	Germany, East	15
Brazil, Evangelicals in	132	"Gaelic-Catholic"	19, 24
		Gomorra	25
		General Synod	83
		Geothe, Rev. Rudolf	124
		Giebner, Rev. M.	124
C
Church and State	3
Communism	3, 15, 65	H
Colombia, S. America	5	Hungary	8
China	7, 104	History, Irish	24
Czechoslovakia	8	Holiness	27, 128
Coverdale, Bishop	8	Hammond, Archdeacon	33, 51, 64, 80, 133
Cranmer, Archbishop	9	Hefe, Bishop	34
Cork and T.C.D.	13	Haiti, Republic of	46
Cathcart, Mr. H. R.	23	Heidelberg Catechism	55
Catechising	54	Henry VIII	65
"De Haereticis Comburendo"	69	Hope, The Christian's	114
Converted Priests	71	Hardt, Rev. K., S.J.	124
Council, Ecumenical	102, 117	Heenan, Archbishop	127
China and Communism	104, 109
Canterbury, Next Archbishop of	106
Connolly, Mr. and Mrs.	123
		I
D		India and Missions	13, 87, 126
De Valera, Mr.	1	Italy	14
Definition of "Protestant"	6	Irishman, What is an?	18
Denmark	9	Irish Schools	20
Dublin University	13	Immolation	33
Dibelius, Bishop	15	Ideology, Scientific	37
Dead Sea	25, 119	Indulgences	66
Del Medico, H. E.	44	Israel	71, 72
Davies, Dr. Powell	44	Irish Edition, Douay Bible	80
Decalogue	54	Ireland, Church of	83, 97
De la Sota, Rev. R. J.	74	Ireland's Welfare	86
Douay-Rheims Bible	80
Dictionary, New Bible	108

	PAGE		PAGE
J		Q
Joy	16	Qumran	44
Johnstone, Rev. Dr.	37	"Question-Box, The"	55
Justification	42
Jews	63	R
John XXIII, Pope	76, 83, 126	Red Cross, Irish	2
Jordan Finds	97, 110	Russian Church	2
Justice and Crime	110	Roldan, Fr. J. E.	5
		Rome, Statistical	6
K		Rome, Union with	12, 126
Kerr, Bishop W. S.	26	Reformed Church	13
Kerry, Reign of terror in	49	Royal School, Raphoe	23
Klunder, Rev. Geo.	125	Rome, Contact with	35
Kennedy, Senator	133	Resurrection, The	37
		Reviews	39, 44, 113, 130
L		Roman Catechism	54
Liturgical Reform	26, 63	"Radio Replies"	55
Lutheran Church	40, 120, 124	Ripley, Fr. F. J.	66
Lord's Supper, The	56	"Regnans in Excelsis"	69
Luther, Martin	57, 64	Rathcoole, Co. Antrim	87
Liberty, Civil	64	Romish Practices	95
Light of the World	90	Rico, Rev. Jose	100
Lateran Council	102	Redeemed, Perfecting the	118
		S
M		Statistics	6
Manifold Temptation	10	Spain and N.A.T.O.	14
Madrid	22	Spain, Marriages in	21
Mass, Evolution of the	33	Schoolmaster, Protestant	23
Mariology	30, 32	Sodom	25
Missions	36	Scrolls, Dead Sea	44, 119
Moynihan, Most Revd. Dr.	49	Sameness of Rome?	51
Murder	49	Spain, Persecution in	59, 72, 95
Mormons, Beware of	50	Separatist Churches in Africa	60
Merit	67	Saunders, Fr. S. J.	70
Martyrs	68	Sectarianism	85
Moderator and Freedom	73	"Spanish Catholicism"	85
Moehler, J. A.	89	Simeon, Charles	91
Ministry, Recruiting	97	Samaritans, Appeal for	121
Macauley, Rev. J. C.	113	Salvation of "Non-Roman Catholics"	122
Methodists and Roman Converts	120	Schlier, Rev. H.	125
Married Clergymen, Rome's	123
Malines Conferences	127	T
		Tyndale, William	8
N		Trinity College, Dublin	13
Nichols, Dr. Jas.	39	Trent, Council of	34, 54
Notes to Bible	80	Terror in Kerry	49
National University	86	Ten Commandments	54
		Troy, Most Revd. Dr.	81
O		Transubstantiation	89
Orthodox Church	2, 39, 83, 103, 117	Tradition	112
"Offering, a pure"	58	Toronto	120
Ottaviano, Cardinal	61	"Till He Come"	140
Old Catholic bishops	83
"O Come All Ye Faithful"	136	U
		Union with Rome	12, 75, 126
P		Unity	37, 63, 73, 87
President	1	"Understandest thou what thou readest?"	78
Protestantism, Meaning of	4, 15	"Unified Bible"	84
Priest, Story of a	5, 74, 100	Ultramontanism	131
Proselytising	11
Protestantism, German	11	V
Protestantism, Irish	18	Vatican	12, 26
Philippine Islands	23	Virgin Birth	41
Protestant, Why be a?	30	Vincent de Paul Society, St.	63
"Protestantism, Meaning of"	39	Von Dollinger, Dr. I. F.	131
"Papist Pie"	55
Persecution in Spain	58	W
Pope Pius V	69	World Refugee Year	1
Presbyterian Moderator	73	World Council of Churches	35, 76, 126
President, Methodist	74, 85	Westminster Catechism	55
Pohle-Preuss	113
Perfecting the Redeemed	118	Y
		Year, Refugee	1
		Z
		Zwinglian	57

Two Interesting Booklets

"The Truth Has Made Us Free"
"Some Converts To The Church
of Ireland"

Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 DAWSON STREET, DUBLIN,
DONEGALL SQUARE, BELFAST,
CORK, LIMERICK.

A Good Advertising Medium.

The CATHOLIC goes to all parts of the country and to England, Scotland and the Colonies.

We are prepared to accept prepaid Advertisements at the following rates:—

FULL PAGE	£2 PER MONTH
HALF PAGE	£1 "
QUARTER PAGE	10/- "
ONE-EIGHTH PAGE	5/- "

NOTICE.

Owing to the alteration in Postage Rates we wish to notify all subscribers that the annual subscription for THE CATHOLIC will be now 5/-

CONNELLAN PUBLICATIONS

	s.	d.
William Bedell	—	0 3
Spirit of Martin Luther	—	0 3
Doubts of the Sons	—	0 4
Reformation & Modern Ideals	—	0 4
The Confessional	—	0 3

Order from:—

THE CONNELLAN MISSION,
5a Townsend St., Dublin.

WHITE'S WAFER OATS

Sweet,

Wholesome,

Nutritious,

Satisfying.

Don't be deceived; there is nothing

"just as good."

SOLE MANUFACTURERS—

WHITE, TOMKINS & COURAGE, LTD.
BELFAST.

OBJECT LESSONS

Models, Curios, Books for Children and Adults.

Stamp 3d. for Sale Lists

LIFE-LONG LECTURER DISPOSES

Speakers and Teachers—your good opportunity

Walter Claydon, 2 Spring Gardens,
Minehead, Somerset.

Read

"AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER"

(2/- post free)

"THE CHURCH OF IRELAND
AND THE 1859 REVIVAL"

(1/3 post free, this office)

Both by N. D. EMERSON

BIBLES

BIBLES for Sunday Schools

BIBLES for Day Schools

BIBLES for the Pulpit

BIBLES for the Pew

BIBLES for the Pocket

BIBLES for Presentation

May be purchased at

MODERATE PRICES

From

THE TRINITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY

7 Bury Place, London, W.C.1.

Catalogue Available on Request

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.

Communications to:

THE SECRETARY,

5a Townsend Street, Dublin.

THE REVELATION

"Wylands" artist drawn diagram
suggests interpretation.

Photo-copies: 1/-. Enlargements: 2/9.

CHRIST'S RETURN IN POWER AND GLORY

Folders: 4d.; twelve, 3/9.

Post free from

"WYLAND", BM/LABR,
3 BLOOMSBURY ST., LONDON, W.C.1.

Historical Pamphlets

"THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE CHURCH
OF ST. PATRICK" (Church of Ireland or
Church of Rome)—Rev. W. J. Camier, B.D.

"THE HERITAGE OF ST. PATRICK" (revised
ed.)—Rev Canon C. M. Stack, M.A.

"THE POPE'S CLAIM TO AN ANNUITY FROM
IRELAND"—Rev. W. E. Kenny, B.D.

"HISTORICAL CATECHISM OF THE CHURCH
OF IRELAND."

"MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF IRE-
LAND"—Rt. Revd. R. M. Boyd, D.D.

Threepence each. Obtainable from

A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson Street, DUBLIN,
Donegall Square, BELFAST, CORK,
LIMERICK.